WAR OF THE REBELLION:

A COMPILATION OF THE OFFICIAL RECORDS

OF THE

UNION AND CONFEDERATE ARMIES.

PREPARED, UNDER THE DIRECTION OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR,

BY

Lieut. Col. ROBERT N. SCOTT, Third U. S. Artillery,

AND

PUBLISHED PURSUANT TO ACT OF CONGRESS APPROVED JUNE 16, 1880.

SERIES I—VOLUME XVI—IN TWO PARTS.

PART I—REPORTS.

WASHINGTON:
GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

v. 16'

PREFACE.

By an act approved June 23, 1874, Congress made an appropriation "to enable the Secretary of War to begin the publication of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, both of the Union and Confederate Armies," and directed him "to have copied for the Public Printer all reports, letters, telegrams, and general orders not heretofore copied or printed, and properly arranged in chronological order."

Appropriations for continuing such preparation have been made from time to time, and the act approved June 16, 1880, has provided "for the printing and binding, under direction of the Secretary of War, of 10,000 copies of a compilation of the Official Records (Union and Confederate) of the War of the Rebellion, so far as the same may be ready for publication, during the fiscal year"; and that "of said number, 7,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Executive Departments."*

This compilation will be the first general publication of the military records of the war, and will embrace all official documents that can be obtained by the compiler, and that appear to be of any historical value.

*Volume I to V distributed under act approved June 16, 1880. The act approved August 7, 1882, provides that—

"The volumes of the official records of the war of the rebellion shall be distributed as follows: One thousand copies to the executive departments, as now provided by law. One thousand copies for distribution by the Secretary of War among officers of the Army and contributors to the work. Eight thousand three hundred copies shall be sent by the Secretary of War to such libraries, organizations, and individuals as may be designated by the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-seventh Congress. Each Senator shall designate not exceeding twenty-six, and each Representative and Delegate not exceeding twenty-one of such addresses, and the volumes shall be sent thereto from time to time as they are published, until the publication is completed. Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall inform the Secretary of War in each case how many volumes of those heretofore published they have forwarded to such addresses. The remaining copies of the eleven thousand to be published, and all sets that may not be ordered to be distributed as provided herein, shall be sold by the Secretary of War for cost of publication with ten per cent. added thereto, and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury. If two or more sets of said volumes are ordered to the same address the Secretary of War shall inform the Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, who have designated the same, who thereupon may designate other libraries, organizations, or individuals. The Secretary of War shall report to the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress what volumes of the series heretofore published have not been furnished to such libraries, organizations, and individuals. He shall also inform distributees at whose instance the volumes are sent."

The publication will present the records in the following order of arrangement:

The 1st Series will embrace the formal reports, both Union and Confederate, of the first seizures of United States property in the Southern States, and of all military operations in the field, with the correspondence, orders, and returns relating specially thereto, and, as proposed, is to be accompanied by an Atlas.

In this series the reports will be arranged according to the campaigns and several theaters of operations (in the chronological order of the events), and the Union reports of any event will, as a rule, be immediately followed by the Confederate accounts. The correspondence, &c., not embraced in the "reports" proper will follow (first Union and next Confederate) in chronological order.

The 2d Series will contain the correspondence, orders, reports, and returns, Union and Confederate, relating to prisoners of war, and (so far as the military authorities were concerned) to State or political prisoners.

The 3d Series will contain the correspondence, orders, reports, and returns of the Union authorities (embracing their correspondence with the Confederate officials) not relating specially to the subjects of the first and second series. It will set forth the annual and special reports of the Secretary of War, of the General-in-Chief, and of the chiefs of the several staff corps and departments; the calls for troops, and the correspondence between the National and the several State authorities.

The 4th Series will exhibit the correspondence, orders, reports, and returns of the Confederate authorities, similar to that indicated for the Union officials, as of the third series, but excluding the correspondence between the Union and confederate authorities given in that series.

GENERAL REPORTS.

No. 1.—Extracts from Annual Report of Maj. Gen. Henry W. Halleck, General-in-Chief U. S. Army.

No. 2.—Findings of the "Buell Commission" and accompanying documents.

No. 1.

Extracts from Annual Report of Maj. Gen. Henry W. Halleck, General-in-Chief U. S. Army.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, November 25, 1862.

SIR: In compliance with your orders I have the honor to submit the following report of military operations since the 23d of July last, when, in compliance with the President's order of July 11, I assumed command of the Army as General-in-Chief:

* * * * *

When I left the Department of the Mississippi, in July last, the main body of the army under Major-General Buell was between Huntsville and Stevenson, moving toward Chattanooga, for which place they had left Corinth about the 10th of June.

Major-General Curtis' forces were at Helena, Ark., and those under Brigadier-General Schofield in Southwestern Missouri. The central army, under Major-General Grant, occupying the line of West Tennessee and Northern Mississippi, extended from Memphis to Iuka, and protected the railroads from Columbus, Ky., south, which were then our only channels of supply.

These several armies, spread along a line of some 600 miles from the western borders of Arkansas to Cumberland Gap, and occupying a strip of country more than 150 miles in width, from which the enemy's forces had recently been expelled, were rapidly decreasing in strength from the large numbers of soldiers sent home on account of real or pretended disability. On the other hand, the enemy's armies were greatly increased by an arbitrary and rigidly enforced conscription. With their superiority in numbers and discipline they boldly determined to reoccupy Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and, if possible, to invade the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, while our attention was distracted by the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania and an extended Indian insurrection on the western frontiers.

This plan had very many chances of success, but the timely order of the President of August 4, calling for additional forces, and the patriotic response of the people of the Northwest, thwarted the enemy's well-formed calculations.

General Bragg suddenly transferred a large part of his army from Tupelo, Miss., through the States of Alabama and Georgia, reached Chattanooga in advance of General Buell, turned his left, and rapidly crossing the State of Tennessee entered Kentucky by Munfordville and Lebanon.

General Buell fell back upon Nashville without giving the enemy battle; then followed or rather moved parallel with Bragg, who, after capturing our garrison at Munfordville, turned off from the main road to Louisville, along which General Buell passed, the latter reaching Louisville without any engagement. Another column of the enemy had moved from East Tennessee, after blockading Cumberland Gap, upon Lexington and threatened Cincinnati.

A small force of our raw troops, which had been pushed forward to Richmond, Ky., under Major-General Nelson, were met by the enemy and completely routed.

In the mean time every effort had been made to collect raw troops at Cincinnati and Louisville and to fortify these places against a coup de main. To give confidence to the new levies a portion of General Grant's army was withdrawn from Mississippi and sent to Kentucky and Cincinnati. No attack was attempted by the enemy.

Major-General Buell left Louisville on the 1st of October with an army of about 100,000 men in pursuit of General Bragg. The latter engaged a part of General Buell's army at Perryville about 10 o'clock on the 8th of October. A general battle ensued and was continued till dark. It was mainly fought by Major-General McCook's division. The enemy retreated during the night. The losses were heavy on both sides, but no official reports of the numbers engaged or the losses on either side have been received.

After this battle the main army of the rebels retreated to East Tennessee. General Buell pursued it as far as Mount Vernon or London, then fell back to the line from Louisville to Nashville. Here Major-General Rosecrans superseded him in the command by order of the President.

As the Secretary of War has ordered a military commission to investigate the operations of General Buell in this campaign it would be obviously improper for me to express any opinion unless specially directed to do so.

* * * * *

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. W. HALLECK,
General-in-Chief.

Hon. E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

No. 2.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, November 4, 1862.

General HALLECK:

GENERAL: You will please organize a Military Commission to inquire into and report upon the operations of the forces under command of Major-General Buell in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, and particularly in reference to General Buell suffering the State of Kentucky to be invaded by the rebel forces under General Bragg, and in his failing to relieve Munfordville and suffering it to be captured; also in reference to the battle of Perryville and General Buell's conduct during that battle, and afterward suffering the rebel forces to escape from Kentucky without loss or capture; and also to inquire and report upon such other matters touching the military operations aforesaid as in the judgment of the Commission shall be beneficial to the service. The Commission will sit at the city of Cincinnati. General Buell will be ordered there and have permission to appear and produce and examine witnesses before the Commission.

Yours, truly,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

SPECIAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
No. 356. } Adj. Gen.'s Office, Washington, November 20, 1862.

I. A Military Commission will convene at Cincinnati, Ohio, on the 27th instant to investigate and report upon the operations of the army under the command of Maj. Gen. D. C. Buell, U. S. Volunteers, in Kentucky and Tennessee.

Detail for the Commission.—Maj. Gen. Lewis Wallace, U. S. Volunteers; Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, U. S. Volunteers; Brig. Gen. Albin Schoepf, U. S. Volunteers; Brig. Gen. N. J. T. Dana, U. S. Volunteers; Brig. Gen. Daniel Tyler, U. S. Volunteers; Maj. Donn Piatt, aide-de-camp, judge-advocate and recorder.

The Commission will adjourn from place to place as may be deemed advisable for the convenience of taking testimony and will report an opinion in the case.

By command of Major-General Halleck :

E. D. TOWNSEND,

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 13, 1872.

The Secretary of War has the honor to report to the House of Representatives, in reply to a resolution of the 1st of March, calling for a copy of the proceedings of the Military Commission instituted by the War Department in the year 1862 to inquire into the military operations and conduct of Maj. Gen. Don Carlos Buell, including all letters, dispatches, opinions, and orders on file in that Department relative thereto, that a careful and exhaustive search among all the records and files in this Department fails to discover what disposition was made of the proceedings of the Commission and the papers annexed thereto, and that no record indicative of the nature of the report of the Board or the conclusions reached by it can be found, other than what is contained in the accompanying papers, which are as follows :

Copy of the original opinion of the Commission called to investigate the operations of the Army of the Ohio in Tennessee and Kentucky, under command of Major-General Buell, U. S. Volunteers, with the views of the General-in-Chief thereupon. [Inclosure No. 2.]

Copy of a communication from General Buell of April 10, 1864, addressed to the Adjutant-General of the Army, commenting upon the report of the Board. [Inclosure No. 5.]

Copy of an unsigned communication reviewing the proceedings of the Commission, which was referred to the Secretary of War by the Judge-Advocate-General, at the request of Lieutenant-Colonel Piatt, on the 23d of May, 1863. [Inclosure No. 3.]

Copy of a communication submitted by General Buell to the Commission May 2, 1863, a copy of which was furnished the War Department by him April 11, 1864. [Sub-inclosure No. 1.]

Copy of a communication from General Buell April 11, 1864, transmitting copy last above named, and also a copy of a statement prepared by him for submission to the Commission, reviewing the evidence taken before it, which is herewith. [Inclosure No. 4 and sub-inclosure No. 2.]

Copy of General Orders, No. 29a, Headquarters Army of the Ohio, July 11, 1862. [Inclosure No. 6.]

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 11, 1871.

General JOSEPH HOLT,

Judge-Advocate-General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have respectfully to inform you that the proceedings of the Military Commission convened by Special Orders, No. 365, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, November 20, 1862, which investigated Maj. Gen. D. C. Buell's operations in Kentucky and Tennessee, have been submitted to the Secretary of War April 15, 1863.

The accompanying correspondence of General Buell in review of the evidence before the Military Commission is all that could be found on the files in this office.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

[Inclosure No. 2.]

Opinion of the Commission.

The order convening the Commission requires it "to investigate and report upon the operations of the army under the command of Maj. Gen. D. C. Buell in Kentucky and Tennessee." It further requires the Commission to "report an opinion in the case."

Very early in its sessions the Commission resolved to direct its investigations to the following points:

1st. The operations of Major-General Buell in Tennessee and Kentucky.

2d. Suffering Kentucky to be invaded by rebels under General Bragg.

3d. The failure to relieve Munfordville.

4th. The battle of Perryville and conduct there.

5th. Permitting the rebels to escape without loss from Kentucky.

6th. Inquire and report upon such other matters touching military operations above specified as in the judgment of the Commission shall be beneficial to the service.

The first point really comprehends all the rest; but convenience required such a division of the subject.

The sixth point, it will be perceived, is general, and was made to cover such subjects as—

1st. General Buell's loyalty, against which there is no evidence worthy of consideration.

2d. General Buell's policy toward the inhabitants of disaffected districts into which his operations extended. This we find to have been what is familiarly known as the conciliatory policy. Whether good or bad in its effects, General Buell deserves neither blame nor applause for it, because it was at that time understood to be the policy of the Government. At least he could violate no orders on the subject, because there were none.

2. SUFFERING KENTUCKY TO BE INVADED BY REBELS UNDER BRAGG.

We find that the rebels under Bragg concentrated at Chattanooga about the 22d of July, 1862, for the purpose of invading Kentucky. Prior to that, on the 11th day of June, General Buell, with his Army of the Ohio was ordered by General Halleck to march against Chattanooga, and take it, with the ulterior object of dislodging Kirby Smith and his rebel force from East Tennessee. We are of opinion that General Buell had force sufficient to accomplish the object if he could have marched promptly to Chattanooga. The plan of operation, however, prescribed by General Halleck compelled General Buell to repair the Memphis and Charleston Railroad from Corinth to Decatur and put it in running order, as a line of supply during the advance. While that road proved of comparatively little service, the work forced such delays that a prompt march upon Chattanooga was impossible. The delays thus occasioned gave Bragg time to send a numerous cavalry force to operate against General Buell's lines of supply, which were unnecessarily long. So successful were the incursions of the cavalry that no opportunity was found, after the Memphis and Charleston Railroad was completed to Decatur, to concentrate enough of the Army of the Ohio to capture Chattanooga and execute the ulterior purposes of the expedition.

The massing of the rebel force at Chattanooga compelled a relinquishment of the design against that place; after which General Buell was required to exert all his energies to prevent the recapture of Nashville and the invasion of Kentucky. This he could have done, in our opinion, by an early concentration of his army at Sparta, McMinnville, or Murfreesborough, with a view to active offensive operations against Bragg the moment he debouched from the Sequatchie Valley. Instead of that, he waited until the 5th of September before concentrating at Murfreesborough, from which he retired to Nashville, thereby allowing Bragg to cross the Cumberland River without interruption. The Commission cannot justify the falling back from Murfreesborough to Nashville, but is of opinion that it was General Buell's duty from that point to have attacked the rebel army before it crossed the Cumberland, and it is the belief that had that course been pursued Bragg would have been defeated.

3.—THE FAILURE TO RELIEVE MUNFORDVILLE.

In the relative movements of the armies of Generals Buell and Bragg Munfordville was important on account of its railroad bridge over Green River and its natural strength as a position for battle. Bragg moved upon it by way of Glasgow, and not anticipating great resistance, he dispatched a column in advance of his main body to take it. The column was repulsed by the garrison on the 14th of September. Bragg then moved his whole army against the post. On the 17th of September it was justifiably surrendered. The order to hold Munfordville proceeded from General Wright, commanding the Department of the Ohio, of which Kentucky formed a part. It was given in expectation that General Buell would reach the place in time to save it. General Wright seems to have had no certain information upon which to base his expectation; at the time the order was given he only knew that both Bragg and General Buell were advancing toward it. Nor was there any undertaking on General Buell's part to relieve the garrison or any preconcert of action whatever respecting it. We are of opinion therefore that the orders given the commander of the post should have left him discretion to fight or retire according to circumstances. As it was, the order was to hold it to the last. Had not Bragg moved so quickly on Munfordville he would have been attacked at Glasgow by General Buell, who was moving to the attack when the surrender took place. Defeat of the rebels at Glasgow would of course have saved Munfordville. While General Buell was on the march to Mufordville he heard of its surrender. Relief was then too late.

It is our opinion, therefore, that General Buell is not responsible for the capture of the town, except so far as his failure to attack Bragg south of the Cumberland River made him responsible for the consequences of that failure.

4.—BATTLE OF PERRYVILLE AND CONDUCT THERE.

General Buell left Louisville about the 1st of October with a force superior, in our judgment, not only to Bragg's army, but to the armies of Bragg and Kirby Smith united. His routes were well chosen and the advance of his columns admirably regulated. His immediate object was to attack the rebels and destroy them; failing in that, he was to drive them out of Kentucky.

Engagement was expected at Bardstown, but Bragg sullenly retired toward Perryville, at which place it would seem from his orders and instructions to corps commanders General Buell next intended to attack him on the 9th September [October]. Positions for the formation of the line of battle were defined in those orders.

Accordingly, on the morning of the 8th, Gilbert, with his corps, was in position in the center; McCook, with his corps (less Sill's division), arrived on the left about 9 o'clock, and Thomas, in command of the right wing (Crittenden's corps), reached his position and reported his arrival to General Buell about noon.

About 2 o'clock in the afternoon the enemy poured a heavy column of attack upon McCook, effecting, in our opinion, a partial surprise. The contest, however, was obstinate and bloody and ended by night-fall, at which time McCook's right had been turned and driven back with serious loss. The duration of the battle was about five hours.

There can be no question about its being the duty of somebody to assist McCook. As his right had been posted not exceeding 300 yards from Gilbert's left and as the severest fighting was on McCook's right we cannot see why Gilbert did not re-enforce him when so requested. He should have done it, it for no other reason than because McCook's discomfiture exposed his own flank. Nothing but positive orders fixing and holding him in his position can justify his failure. If such there were, they have not been heard of in the testimony. Moreover, it is clear that all General Buell's orders were in preparation for attacking the next morning, not in anticipation of being attacked that day. In this latter event therefore the exercise of discretion could not have been improper if the action taken had been promptly reported to headquarters, particularly as General Buell was not on the field for instant consultation. As it was, assistance did not reach McCook until about dark.

front on the Springfield road. He was not on the field or along the line during the day, and had no intelligence of the attack on McCook until 4 o'clock in the evening. About 2 o'clock a heavy and furious cannonading was heard at his headquarters, and coming out of his tent he said, "There was a great waste of powder over there," and directed General Gilbert, who was with him at the time, to send an order to the front "to stop that useless waste of powder." It is clear to us that General Buell did not believe a battle was in progress, and that he supposed the firing heard was from some reconnaissance. On this point it is our opinion that he should either have been on the field in person ready for emergencies and advantages, or have taken and required to be taken every precaution for the instant transmission of intelligence to his headquarters. As he had an organized signal corps with his army, this failure was all the more culpable. And in this connection we are of opinion that General McCook's failure to send up instant notice of the attack upon him in force was equally culpable.

We find that during the greater part of the attack on McCook Gilbert's corps was unengaged, while Thomas' wing had not so much as a demonstration made against it. We have reason to believe also that all Bragg's army at Perryville at the time was flung upon McCook, and that his lines of retreat by way of Harrodsburg and Danville were so exposed that after 4 o'clock they could have been to a great degree, if not entirely, cut off if Crittenden's corps had been vigorously pushed forward for the purpose. In our judgment the opportunity slipped through General Buell's absence from the field or on account of his ignorance of the condition of the battle. We are very sure that if he could have ordered supports to McCook at an earlier hour than he did order them the attack would have been repulsed with less loss to himself and greater to the enemy.

5.—PERMITTING THE REBELS TO ESCAPE WITHOUT LOSS FROM KENTUCKY.

It cannot be said that the rebels escaped without loss from Kentucky. Besides their killed and wounded at Perryville they were compelled to destroy a large quantity of stores which had been collected at Camp Dick Robinson.

The morning after the battle it was very early discovered that Bragg had retreated from his positions near Perryville and that his army had for the most part gone in the direction of Harrodsburg. Leaving all his sick and wounded and some material at Harrodsburg, and being joined by Kirby Smith, he hastened across Dick's River to Camp Dick Robinson. There he destroyed and abandoned the stores mentioned and resumed his retreat. In these movements the march of his columns was hurried; that part of it from Perryville to the river was confused and disordered. Our opinion is that if General Buell had taken up a vigorous pursuit as soon in the morning of the 9th as the retreat was discovered the check received by the rebels at Perryville would have been turned into rout, with all its consequences. But the manner in which they were followed to Harrodsburg can hardly be called a pursuit. General Buell should have endeavored, by energetic movement of his whole army, to crush them somewhere between Perryville and Dick's River.

From Camp Dick Robinson Bragg had but two roads left him by which he could hope to escape from Kentucky. Dividing his forces at Crab Orchard, one portion of them could go out by way of Cumberland Gap, the other by way of Somerset. Had General Buell intercepted him on these lines, as we think he could have done, from either Perryville or Danville, Bragg would have been compelled to give battle, with the same results, we doubt not, as if he had been defeated before crossing Dick's River.

The evidence establishes that General Buell received information on the night of the 11th that Bragg had crossed the river to Camp Dick Robinson; yet he made no determined movement with the main body of his army until 12 o'clock in the night of the 13th. From the morning of the 9th to the night of the 11th he waited to learn whether his enemy would cross the river; that being definitely known, he lost two days before taking any decisive action. Finally, on the night of the 13th, as stated, he started Crittenden's corps through Danville toward Crab Orchard. It was then too late; Bragg, with his column and all his train, had passed the point of interception. To this delay we are compelled to attribute the escape of the rebels from Kentucky.

LEWIS WALLACE,

Major-General and President of Commission.

DONN PIATT,

Lieutenant-Colonel, U. S. Volunteers, Judge-Advocate.

[Indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,

Washington, D. C., May 29, 1863.

As the Commission has reported no charges against Maj. Gen. D. C. Buell nor recommended any further proceedings I respectfully recommend that the Commission be dissolved, and its officers, as well as General Buell, be ordered on other duty.

So much of the report as states that General Buell's march on Chattanooga was delayed by the repairs of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad and that General Buell's lines of supply were unnecessarily long is incorrect. General Buell had no other line of supply than this road till he reached Decatur and connected with Nashville. General Buell was not delayed an hour beyond what he himself deemed necessary to secure his supplies. Moreover, his lines of supply were those which he himself selected. Indeed there were no others from which to select.

The fault here, as elsewhere, was having too large supply trains and in not living more upon the country. He was frequently urged to subside his troops in this manner. Whether or not he could have done so is not reported by the Commission.

H. W. HALLECK,
General-in-Chief.

[Inclosure No. 3.]

The Commission called to investigate the operations of the Army of the Ohio in Kentucky and Tennessee has seen fit to include the march from Corinth toward Chattanooga of that army within its limit of investigation, although such inquiry is evidently not included in the letter of instructions from the War Department. The operations of the Army of the Ohio commenced with that march, and therefore it is considered properly the correct commencement.

When the rebels vacated Corinth in 1862, when they had accumulated large stores and an efficient force, there appeared no place upon which they could rally in time to oppose successfully the army under Major-General Halleck in the attempt to open the Mississippi and possess ourselves of East Tennessee. To accomplish the latter purpose, General Buell, in command of what has since been known as the Army of the Ohio, was sent in the direction of Chattanooga, with instructions to seize that place and through it East Tennessee. It has been proved on the part of the Government and not denied by the defense that the rebels were not in force at that time in either place, and had General Buell pushed on he would have taken the more important strategic points almost without resistance. Why this was not done General Buell assures us, as I gather from the character of evidence introduced and the direction of the examination, was owing to a lack of supplies and the attempt to repair and keep open long lines of railway through a hostile population, which lines it seems were continually being cut by rebel cavalry and by the inhabitants, organized into guerrilla bands for that purpose.

This explanation or defense the Government claims is not satisfactory. The lack of supplies cannot justify a delay of a month or six weeks for repairs when that time would have enabled the army to seize and occupy a country rich as was East Tennessee, and inhabited by a friendly, loyal population. Raids on lines of communication with outrages of a disloyal people would have ceased with the necessity that caused them. They were inaugurated and continued for the purpose of embarrassing the expedition into East Tennessee. They would have ended with its occupancy.

But the most extraordinary fact pressing in this connection upon the Commission is that the commander of the Army of the Ohio knew at the time that these lines would be useless for the lack of rolling stock, and although an attempt is made evidently to shield himself under the orders of Major-General Halleck, we find no earnest remonstrance that would justify this Commission in regarding such a defense as sufficient. The brief oral instructions claimed to have been received, followed by the yet briefer telegrams, evince a confidence in and a discretionary power given to Major-General Buell which should now bar any attempt at shifting the responsibility. The fact that he knew at the time the hopelessness and absurdity of these efforts is conclusive. If the army had supplies enough to justify the long delay for the purpose of reconstructing lines, which were cut almost as rapidly as they were connected, I hold that he had sufficient to seize and hold East Tennessee, and the better way to get Morgan and Forrest from his rear was to keep them busy at his front. The defenseless state of Chattanooga and East Tennessee would have called for every available rebel soldier, and General Buell's regiment of engineers could have repaired the roads unmolested.

While Major-General Buell was thus engaged the enemy had not only time to strengthen their exposed points but to elaborate the invasion, which changed our operations from offensive to defensive, and eventually forced the army from Battle Creek back to its base at Louisville.

Some time in the first part of August General Bragg crossed the Tennessee at Chattanooga with about 30,000 men. At that time General Buell had his lines extended some 40 miles. The returns found at headquarters (Nashville) give us effective men present for duty 50,000 as the Army of the Ohio, and of these 47,500 were south of the Cumberland, and, the Government claims, could have been massed so as to have forced Bragg to a fight before he left Tennessee.

The case then as claimed by the Government is this: General Buell, in command of a largely superior force of veteran soldiers, well disciplined and equipped, was forced to fall back in long, rapid marches, under great privations, suffering shameful disasters, and with every mark of defeat, from its advance on Battle Creek, in Tennessee, to its base of supplies on the Ohio River.

ARMY OF THE OHIO.

As to the efficient force under Major-General Buell at the time of the invasion I call the attention of the Commission to the testimony of Major Wright and Lieutenant-Colonel Darr, both of Major-General Buell's staff, and the returns found at headquarters in Nashville. From an examination of this evidence it will be found that of the Army of the Ohio General Buell had 47,500 men south of the Cumberland River at the time Bragg crossed the Tennessee. The returns and other evidence introduced by the Government make the force at least 10,000 men [more?]. But I prefer taking the testimony offered by the defense.

BRAGG'S FORCE.

Bragg crossed the Tennessee with about 30,000 men of all arms. For evidence of this fact I refer in the first place to the testimony of the spy Pratt. He was in the employ of General Buell, and had excellent opportunities of observation in the enemy's lines. He informs us that Bragg had of infantry from 22,000 to 24,000. No attempt is made to impeach this man. On the contrary, General Buell in his cross-examination makes him his own witness, and the Commission will find that in his statement he is fully sustained by circumstances and the testimony of other witnesses. Col. M. Shoemaker, a prisoner at the time, saw Bragg's forces cross the Cumberland on the 9th of September, and states that he had about 30,000 men. Colonel Wilder, the gallant commander at Munfordville, refused to surrender until he had seen the forces opposed to him, with liberty to report the number. He estimates Bragg's army at not over 36,000. Mr. G. R. Taylor, a Union citizen of Munfordville, who was within the enemy's lines, gives 30,000 as the outside of Bragg's army. Mr. F. A. Smith learned from one of Bragg's staff at Munfordville that they had sixty regiments, confirming what the spy Pratt had sworn to. I have called attention here to evidence of actual observation. The fact is known to the witnesses of their own knowledge and is free of doubt or speculation. It will be observed that these witnesses are unknown to each other, widely separate, and yet concur in the same statement. To this we may add the Forsyth letter, one of Bragg's staff, introduced by General Buell through the testimony of General Rousseau, that states the entire army in Kentucky, including of course Kirby Smith's, to be 40,000 men, and we may now add General Bragg's report of his operations in Tennessee and Kentucky, which gives his army that crossed as not exceeding 30,000.

Circumstantial evidence comes in to sustain this already well-established fact. General Bragg, after capturing Munfordville, a naturally strong position, which, held by him, would have forced Buell to a fight at great odds or a surrender of Bowling Green and Nashville, suddenly evacuated and fell back to Bardstown. It will not do to say that this resulted from a lack of supplies. Bragg's stores, collected by Kirby Smith, were at Bardstown, and available with their possession of the country at Munfordville. He retreated because he saw the approach of an army nearly double his own. The opinion of officers of intelligence and position in the Army of the Ohio are introduced by the Government, not for the purpose of proving the force under Bragg, but to show that something near his actual strength was known at the time, and it is somewhat remarkable that General Buell was ignorant of a fact patent to his army. General Thomas, for example, said that he could never make out the strength of Bragg's army above 45,000, and of this 10,000 were left to take care of the flank and rear and to threaten Nashville. This force he says was not within supporting distance had Bragg been compelled to fight between the Cumberland River and Munfordville. General Thomas, although introduced by the Government, is made General Buell's witness, and his statements are to be regarded as beyond dispute. General Rousseau, a witness summoned by the defense, says:

My impression is that the strength of General Bragg's army was overrated. I put Bragg at from 35,000 to 45,000 at Munfordville.

Major-General McCook states:

On Monday at Bowling Green I understood the enemy was at Glasgow, his force estimated at about 30,000 men. It was simply the talk among my brother generals.

Brigadier-General Wood:

I am satisfied by information received from various sources that Bragg's army led into Kentucky did not exceed 35,000 men.

Brigadier-General Steedman says:

The opinion is firmly fixed in my mind by frequent conversation with officers at various points on the march that the strength of the Confederate Army was in the neighborhood of 35,000.

General Fry:

From all sources of information Bragg's army was estimated at 36,000. There were rumors that he had 50,000 or 60,000. The most intelligent officers placed it at not exceeding 36,000.

Colonel Streight states:

From facts I could gather they (the rebels) had from 30,000 to 35,000. At Gallatin I learned from General Wood that he had placed them at about 33,000.

I could multiply these evidences of knowledge on the part of subordinate officers, but do not consider it necessary. True, other officers make the estimate greater, but they are men whose opportunities would not justify a positive opinion, such as Generals Granger and Boyle.

It is true that a man by the name of Rapier is introduced, who claims to have counted the forces under General Bragg, and makes them over 100,000. But his story is so improbable and contradictory that it cannot claim reasonable credence. He flies in fear from his dwelling on the approach of the rebels, and yet places himself in full view of their column on the road-side, when for two days from early in the morning until late at night, without rest and without refreshment, he calmly counts and notches upon a stick the regiments as they hurry past upon the double-quick. He makes the force over 100,000 and marches them upon one road. He has no motive for this other than idle curiosity; and, again, Captain Jones produces certain tables, showing that prisoners representing one hundred and sixty regiments had been taken during Bragg's occupation of Kentucky. It would be quite impossible to ascertain through such testimony the number of Bragg's army. It is certainly worthless when brought forward to contradict that of witnesses who speak from positive knowledge. However, General Buell himself saves us further doubt upon the subject. In his telegram from Louisville to General Halleck, shortly before moving out against the enemy, he states their force to be 60,000. This estimate is subsequently asserted by witnesses both on the part of the Government and the defense. General Buell has proven that of this Kirby Smith's, Stevenson's, and Marshall's forces make 30,000, leaving to Bragg the 30,000 with which he drove the Army of Ohio from North Alabama to Louisville.

The Government considers this a subject of careful investigation on the part of the Commission. That an army of veterans, numbering, with the divisions added from General Grant, some 65,000—that, as claimed by the defense, no defeat could dishearten and no marches in retreat could demoralize—that such an army should fall back through shameful disasters, with long fatiguing marches and great privation, bearing every mark of defeat, before half its numbers, makes a new page in our history of shame, and calls for explanation or severest punishment.

SPARTA.

Bragg seems from the evidence to have anticipated that his crossing the Tennessee River would be disputed. Upon what his anticipation was based is difficult to determine. Long after his design, if not his plan, of invasion had been developed the Army of the Ohio was stationed along an extended line, devoted to guarding and repairing railways, in a manner that made it impossible to concentrate for the purpose of opposing his crossing. When, however, this crossing was effected the ablest military minds in the army, other than its commander, suggested a concentration where the rebels could be met as they passed from the Sequatchie Valley to the plains of Middle Tennessee.

Sparta or McMinnville is suggested, but especially Sparta, where they could have been fought with every prospect of success. That Bragg must pass by Sparta was reasonable to suppose at the time, and with the light before the Commission a necessity. Had he retained Chattanooga as his base he could not have passed to the right or the left of our army in position without having his line of communication cut and his army turned upon a line of country where General Buell has been at some pains to prove an army could not subsist. If, on the other hand, he burdened himself with little transportation and only carried subsistence for eight or ten days, thereby cutting loose from his base, which proved to be the fact, his road lay through the Sequatchie Valley out by Sparta, and on the almost direct line to Bardstown, along which route his supplies had been provided. The position at Sparta is, we are assured, naturally a strong one, and offers such advantages that 15,000 might have been intrusted to its defense against the 30,000 of the enemy; but while all seems doubtful on the part of our army, with hesitation in its movements and uncertainty in its future, Bragg acts as if his way were assured to him and success the certain result of his efforts. History of military campaigns affords no parallel to this of an army throwing aside its transportation, paying no regard to its supplies, but cutting loose from its base, marching 200 miles in the face of and really victorious over an army double its size.

SUBSISTENCE.

Why the Army of the Ohio was not massed at Sparta, or indeed at any other point in Tennessee, for the purpose of disputing the further progress of this confident enemy was owing, the defense assures us, to the fact that while our lines were successfully cut our supplies would not justify extended operations. The defense is not tenable. The defense shows us that the Army of the Ohio had twenty days' rations; this, on half rations, made forty days, and in less than forty days the campaign in Kentucky and Tennessee was at an end. But in addition to this we learn that the line of railway from Nashville to McMinnville was in operation, and that from Louisville to Nashville could have been opened in two weeks, with the exception of that through the burnt tunnels, which left a wagon road of about 20 miles. ✓

THE INTENT.

General Buell made no effort to mass his army and meet Bragg, but fell back to Nashville. It is believed on the part of the Government that a key to this extraordinary conduct may be found in the fact that, threatened as he was in front by Bragg and in rear by Kirby Smith, with his supplies limited and his communications cut, General Buell deemed it necessary to abandon both Tennessee and Kentucky and continue or rather renew the contest on the banks of the Ohio. He certainly did not fall back upon Nashville for the purpose of defending that place. Had he believed Nashville threatened from its front, McMinnville or Sparta would have been the point to concentrate for its defense. But the Government has shown that this could not have been Bragg's intent, and that General Buell had every reason to know it at the time. Bragg's objective when he crossed at Chattanooga must have been Bowling Green. The possession of Bowling Green gave him Nashville, while at the same time he was marching in the direction of his supplies. General Buell by massing his forces at some point on the Cumberland, Lebanon for example, could have disputed the crossing of the river and at the same time have carried Nashville. Had Bragg attempted to avoid him by crossing farther up he would have been thrown upon a country so destitute of subsistence that his march must have proved disastrous.

As to General Buell's intention, however, we are not left in doubt. That he fell back to Nashville to gather up his supplies and then evacuate his acts prove. But in addition to this we have the testimony of Governor Andrew Johnson as to what General Buell actually said.

Before calling attention to this deposition it is well to consider, however, the significance of the defense in relation to it. Long before such a charge was ever dreamed of General Buell had strengthened his case in response to it. As if conscious of something that might come up, he has indicated the charge by a defense in advance. But Governor Johnson says positively that General Buell informed him that he considered Nashville of no importance in a military point of view, and it would have been evacuated three months before had his advice been followed. That he became alarmed evidently at the attitude of Governor Johnson, and said subsequently to Generals Thomas and McCook that Nashville must be held at all hazard, is true; but he never changed his intention. And it will be observed that he takes and uses up Governor Johnson's opinion when he says that the place should be preserved on account of its political importance.

This evidence of Governor Johnson's is further sustained by a telegram from General Halleck, which was found lying loose and unrecorded at the Department Headquarters, General Buell informing me in open court at the time I presented it to him that he knew nothing of it, while the dispatch to which it is an answer cannot be found at all. The answer, however, carries the query that produced it. It reads :

WASHINGTON, September 7, 1862.

Major-General BUELL :

March where you please, provided you will find the enemy and fight him.

H. W. HALLECK.

There was little intent of this sort at a time when, as Colonel Fry testifies, there was a sense of relief or rejoicing when it was found that Bragg had really crossed the Cumberland, from the fact, I suppose, that Bragg had not directly sought his enemy and fought him. Had not the telegram read that was sent, "Where shall I march?" And does such telegram indicate a settled purpose of any sort? But, again, on the 14th of September, two days before the surrender of Munfordville, we find him telegraphing to General Halleck, "It has been apparent to me for some time that on purely military grounds the force in Middle Tennessee should fall back on its base;" that is, Louisville. "The political effect of such a move, however, seemed to me so serious that I hesitated to execute it." He was hesitating then when Governor Johnson called and pressed this political view on him. This important dispatch closed with a prayer for instructions. Instructions for what? Had not his course been determined upon? Or was not the general seeking to shield his abandonment of these States under instructions from Washington?

He fell back upon Nashville for its defense, and yet left open the only road by which Nashville could be assailed. He left Nashville on the 7th to get between the enemy and Louisville and keep open his line of communication, yet he delays his march so as to permit an inferior force to get between him and Louisville, and, by seizing Munfordville, make the discomfiture of our army complete by compelling the surrender or evacuation of all the important posts in its rear. Had Bragg have seen fit to make a stand at Munfordville, Buell would have been forced to abandon Bowling Green and Nashville and steal off the best route he could find to the Ohio.

Bragg, with his inferior force and lack of supplies, dared not to remain in Munfordville, and fell back to Bardstown, and six days after General Buell writes to General Nelson at Louisville. This extraordinary letter is so important as proving the real intent of General Buell that I quote it at length. It must be remembered that Munfordville had surrendered, and the paroled officers had sought General Buell and informed him of the exact strength of Bragg's army as being but 36,000 strong and suffering terribly for lack of food, and yet he fled with his brave army of 50,000 from this force, while a like number awaited his coming at Louisville. Under these circumstances this is the advice he gives General Nelson :

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO,

September 22, 1862.

Major-General NELSON :

should be re-enforced to the last man without a moment's delay. My own movements depend so much on the movements of the enemy that I can hardly tell you what to do. If you have only the force you speak of it would not, I should say, be advisable for you to attempt a defense of Louisville, unless you are strongly intrenched. Under no circumstances should you make a fight with his whole or main force. The alternative would be to cross the river or march on this side to the mouth of Salt River and bridge it, so as to form a junction with me. But, as I tell you, so much depends upon circumstances that I must leave this question to your discretion. I only offer you my suggestions in regard to it. This much do at any rate: Send a million of rations down the river, say opposite Brandenburg, to make them safe, to be subject to my order, and have a boat bridge made to be thrown rapidly across the mouth of the Salt River for my use, if I require it. Lose no time. Steamers should be opposite Salt River subject to my orders.

Bear in mind in these arrangements that the enemy will probably have a small cavalry force at the mouth of Salt River. All steamers used for the service referred to should be kept constantly under steam and ready to escape if threatened. Communicate with me daily. I shall probably continue on the Louisville pike at least as far as Elizabethtown. I shall be at Bacon Creek to-night or beyond there if the enemy should be determined to stand at Elizabethtown. Your advance on the Louisville pike, with the means of crossing Salt River, would undoubtedly have an important effect and perhaps give you an opportunity of acting an important part.

I received your dispatch in answer to mine from Dripping Spring.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General, Commanding.

Braxton Bragg defeated the design. He did not march on Louisville nor dare he risk an engagement with the superior Army of the Ohio. He marched off toward Bardstown, where his subsistence was accumulated, and thereby lost the conquest he set out to accomplish. General Buell marched into Louisville, incorporated into his army the raw recruits that had been gathered there, and set out vigorously in search of the enemy. His army from Tennessee, numbering over 45,000, was joined by an army of 48,000, while the enemy he went out to fight had not over 60,000 men. The doubt and hesitation which seemed to paralyze his movements on the retreat from North Alabama to Louisville vanished, and what the clear-headed, energetic general could do was done. Sending Sill's division to hold Kirby Smith in check near Frankfort, General Buell divided the Army of the Ohio on three different roads converging on Bardstown and set out in a vigorous pursuit of Bragg. Bragg retired from Bardstown to Perryville, closely pressed by Buell. At Perryville the rebel leader evidently expected to fall in with Kirby Smith. Kirby Smith was not there, and Bragg found it necessary to check the farther advance of our army until Kirby Smith could come to his assistance. Of this fact General Buell was evidently well acquainted. He warned his subordinate generals of the approaching struggle, and on the morning of the 8th we find the immense army in line of battle, prepared to advance upon the enemy.

And here he fell into the same state of doubt and confusion that marked the retreat from Nashville, and this continued until the rebel invaders were safe out of Kentucky. After getting his force into line by noon on the 8th why he delayed the attack until the 9th we have been unable to understand; nor has the Commission been favored with a reasonable explanation. It was evidently the policy to overwhelm Bragg before he could form his junction with Smith. This junction General Buell had feared from the first moment he began his retreat from Nashville. Here was the long-wished-for opportunity, and yet his army was to be kept in line, suffering for the water which the enemy held possession of, from noon of the 8th till morning of the 9th. What else could Bragg desire? The rebel general evidently misunderstood the design, for observing that McCook, in command of the left wing, had broken his line and was moving in column to the water the soldiers were suffering for, he suddenly threw the weight of half his army upon the one corps, drove it back a mile, killing 918 men and wounding some 5,000.

There are circumstances attending this brief but bloody engagement which baffle comprehension. General Buell, who had approached Perryville conscious of the presence there of the enemy in force, retired to headquarters, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in the rear of his left wing, and, surrounded by a large and well-organized staff, was ignorant of the struggle until too late to render aid, although he heard the furious cannonade that gave token of a combat about 2 o'clock, pronouncing it a waste of ammunition and demanding that it should stop, took no steps, either through the signal corps then in operation or by his staff, to investigate the cause, or, if necessary, to apply a remedy.

What a golden opportunity to annihilate the rebel army then presented itself we now learn. Had the right wing of our army been swung around, the rebel force would have been captured or destroyed. General Mitchell, without orders, marched his brigade through Perryville, and, coming in the rear of the rebels, then attacking McCook's corps, actually took prisoners and captured the ammunition train of the battery playing upon the left wing. All this while Gilbert's corps remained idle spectators of the unequal contest, and not only failed to tender re-enforcements, but when such aid was solicited by subordinate officers and men positively refused.

At 4.30 General Buell learned of the battle and sent an aide to General Thomas ordering the forces under his command to re-enforce McCook. The aide lost two hours in the search of General Thomas, who was found at the front after night when the battle had ceased.

This blow seems to have paralyzed the Army of the Ohio. No further effort was made to find and attack the enemy from the 8th till the 12th. No advance was even ordered, for an army of 70,000 men that is confined in its maneuvers to a space of 10 miles cannot be said to advance. In the mean time the rebels retreated through Harrodsburg past our forces to Camp Dick Robinson. This was a third time a march of this kind was successful. A pursuit was then ordered that resulted in nothing.

After the fight before Perryville had our army been pushed through Danville to Camp Dick Robinson the retreat of Bragg and Smith would have been intercepted. The defense claims that other roads were open to them on which to escape. It is a singular fact that in the opinion of the defense a road is always open to the rebels, who need no transportation and are not dependent upon the ordinary laws of subsistence; while to us there seems to be but one road, and that is through disaster to our base.

The fact is the route through Camp Dick Robinson to Cumberland Gap was the only available one to Bragg. On this their supplies were collected, and from the nature of the country at Crab Orchard the pursuit would have to cease. Had Bragg have been forced back to the center of Kentucky, depending as he would have to on the country for supplies, the move must have been fatal to him. Already disheartened by the reception given them by the people of the State, had he been forced to open plunder of that people for support the effect in both a political and military point of view must have been disastrous. But as the road into Kentucky had been strangely left open to him, so was the road out of Kentucky made easy.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
May 23, 1863.

Respectfully referred to the Secretary of War by the request of Lieutenant-Colonel Piatt.

J. HOLT,
Judge-Advocate-General.

[Inclosure No. 4.]

BALTIMORE, MD., April 11, 1864.

General LORENZO THOMAS,
Adjutant-General U. S. Army :

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of the communication which I addressed to the Commission which investigated my military operations in Kentucky and Tennessee. As I received no information in regard to the action taken on the original, or the disposition made of it, I request that this copy may be filed with the record.

I inclose also a printed copy of the statement in review of the evidence which I prepared to submit to the Commission. I request that it also may be filed with the record.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

[Sub-inclosure No. 1.]

BURNET HOUSE, Cincinnati, May 2, 1863.

TO THE COMMISSION:

On examination I have found the record of the Commission to be deficient and inaccurate in several particulars of greater or less importance.

It will be remembered that at an early stage of the proceedings I proposed an examination of the record for the purpose of correcting such errors, but the Commission deemed it best to defer the examination until the investigation should be closed. I desire now to call attention to the most important of them.

While the first witness, Colonel Lytle, I think, was giving his evidence the Commission was cleared, at the motion of one of the members, for some purpose not stated at the time. After the Commission had been in secret session some time I was invited in, and the president directed or intimated to the judge-advocate to swear me to secrecy in regard to the proceedings of the Commission. I declined to be sworn, and the Commission was again cleared. The judge-advocate subsequently came out and informed me that it had been determined that the investigation should be continued without my presence. I objected to this decision, and the judge-advocate returned to the Commission, and I presume stated my objection. He subsequently returned to me again, and informed me that it had been concluded to admit me to the sessions of the Commission, but that it had been decided that I should not cross-examine witnesses, though I could introduce witnesses in the defense. I objected to this also. I returned to the Commission and stated in person my objections to its decisions. I was asked by the president whether I based my claim to be present and cross-examine witnesses on the privileges belonging to a party accused. I answered that undoubtedly the pending investigation implied some sort of accusation or imputation against me, but that I did not think it necessary to say whether I considered myself in the light of a party accused or not; that for the present I based my claim upon the instructions of the Secretary of War under which they were acting, which stated that I would "be permitted to appear and produce and examine witnesses before the Commission."

Without coming to any final decision on these questions the Commission adjourned.

The following morning I submitted a written statement of what I considered to be my right with reference to these several points, and that statement was sustained by the Commission. It is proper that these facts should appear on the record, and I request that they may be placed there.

It will be remembered that some discussion took place at the time with reference to the rights which I claimed. It is impossible for me now to repeat the precise words in which I presented them. If there should be any question in regard to these several points then I desire to establish them by evidence, in order that the record may be corrected.

The other errors, as far as I have observed them, I have noted in my copy, and they can be pointed out more conveniently by referring to the record.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

BALTIMORE, MD., April 11, 1864.

The above is a true copy of a communication submitted to the Commission which investigated my military operations in Kentucky and Tennessee. I request that it may be filed with the record, because I have not been informed what action was taken upon or what disposition was made of the original.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

[Sub-inclosure No. 2.]

Military Commission.*

The investigations of this Commission have not gone further back than shortly after the evacuation of Corinth by the rebel army in May last, and it might perhaps be expected that this review of my command in Kentucky and Tennessee would not go beyond that period; but I have for more than a year remained silent under misrepresentations which have misled the public mind with reference to the administration of my command. I deem it proper, therefore, to sketch briefly the history of the army I recently commanded and of my connection with it for the period anterior to the time to which this investigation has extended. It is proper also as bearing on subjects that have been investigated, because many circumstances connected with it shaped or affected the subsequent operations under my command.

In the early part of November, 1861, the condition of affairs in Kentucky became the subject of the most anxious solicitude to the Government and throughout the country. One-third of the State was in the possession of the rebel forces, under whose protection a provisional government was inaugurated at Russellville. It was supposed that the Union element was confined for the most part to the old men; that the mass of the young men were on the eve of joining the rebel cause, and that nothing but extraordinary exertion and judicious management could rescue the State from the vortex toward which the excitement of revolution was rapidly carrying her. This was certainly an unjust reflection on the loyalty of the State, but there is no doubt that the presence of a large rebel force rendered the occasion critical.

It was unexpectedly announced to me about the 9th of November that I was to be charged with this weighty responsibility. I received general instructions from the general-in-chief, Major-General McClellan, on the night of the 12th, and on the 15th of November I assumed command at Louisville of the new Department of the Ohio, embracing the States of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, that portion of Kentucky east of the Cumberland River, and the State of Tennessee.

The enemy, under the command of General Sidney Johnston, was in possession of Bowling Green, with, according to the best information, about 25,000 men, his advance guard extending to Munfordville. Including Hopkinsville and other points his force north of the Cumberland amounted probably to 35,000 men. He had a small force at Fort Henry, on the Tennessee River, and Fort Donelson, on the Cumberland; and he had railroad communication with Columbus, on the Mississippi, where he had a large force, and with Nashville and all points south and east. These facilities enabled him to concentrate at any point in a very short time all the force in the Confederacy not required for defense elsewhere. At that time he could hardly be said to be threatened in any quarter except in front of Washington. The coast expeditions had not been inaugurated, and our force in Missouri was not yet prepared to operate beyond the limits of that State. He had also a small force, not probably exceeding 2,500 men, under Humphrey Marshall, threatening the northeastern part of Kentucky through Pound Gap, and a considerable force, under General Zollicoffer, at Cumberland Gap and on the road north of it. These last had recently been compelled to fall back from an attempt to invade the central part of the State, but they were still in a position to renew the effort. In addition to this the population was in a state of great disquiet. Bands were constantly organizing to join the rebel ranks and intimidate the loyal people, and in some parts of the State the Union element scarcely dared to express itself.

Kentucky at this time was the point which offered to the enemy the best prospect of advantage. His intention to have possession of Louisville within a limited period was constantly avowed. The disloyal element confidently expected it, and if the Government force had not been speedily increased the attempt would no doubt have been made. As soon, however, as the re-enforcements began to arrive he commenced fortifying strongly at Bowling Green and other points.

In reality the effective Government force which I found in Kentucky consisted of two divisions, about 23,000 men, on the Cumberland Gap road and the Nashville road, and about 4,000 men on the Big Sandy, in the northeast part of the State; but there were besides some forty or more Kentucky regiments or fractions of regiments scattered over the State in recruiting districts that were more or less available for local service. Very many, in fact nearly all, of them were not yet mustered in; many without arms, equipments, or proper organization; some of them embracing various arms of service—artillery, cavalry, and infantry. In the whole force were included about eight field batteries and four regiments of cavalry. The latter were all without any suitable arms; some had pistols only and some muskets. There was not, I believe, a carbine in the hands of the troops. In the infantry arms of two or three different calibers could frequently be found in the same regiment, and many of these were of foreign make, and unfit for service from various defects which rendered them unsafe or unreliable. The troops were but little instructed some of them not at all, and four or five general and perhaps as many staff officers embraced the whole military experience in the department. Officers having no rank whatever were acting as generals and staff officers under conditioned promises of appointment, and the supplies and equipment were in many respects deficient and defective. There was not transportation enough not already employed to serve 20,000 men two days' march from a depot or line of railroad.

The first thing to be done was to organize, arm, equip, and mobilize this heterogeneous mass, and this was both a difficult and tedious work. The Kentucky troops had to be collected from remote quarters and the fractions consolidated and organized; a work which the Military Board of the State had commenced before my arrival. Supplies of every kind had to be procured; a difficult matter, owing to the quantity suddenly required to supply the enormous force the Government was calling into service. In a word, pretty much everything necessary to make an army of soldiers had to be done. But little assistance could be obtained from abroad. Experienced staff officers could not be obtained. I expected two regular batteries from Missouri. About the 1st of January two companies of artillery, without batteries, making together about 70 men, with one officer, reported to me. The expectation of a regiment of regular cavalry resulted even worse than that. After my arrival at Nashville two companies reported, with about 70 men. New regiments began to report occasionally very soon after my arrival, and from the 26th of November to the 1st of January several regiments that had seen some service joined from Western Virginia. About the last of December some fourteen raw regiments were received from Ohio and Indiana. The force was afterward further increased from time to time. In the mean time the enemy had also received considerable accessions to his strength.

The organization of the troops into brigades and divisions was effected without delay as fast as they arrived. It was made a rule in the organization not to group the regiments by States, but to represent as many States as possible in each brigade; an arrangement which was attended with the happiest results in the discipline and tone of the army.

move very light and depend on receiving supplies by the Cumberland River after getting through. In organizing my troops I disposed them so that they could be directed upon either or both of these objects. By the last of December I had collected troops enough to organize four divisions—about 40,000 men. I had thrown one division forward to Munfordville, one to Bacon Creek, on the same road, one near Green River, on the New Haven turnpike, and had one at Lebanon. Many of the Kentucky troops were yet scattered and not mustered in, but in some cases two or more regiments had been brought together for local service, with as many regiments added from other States, as at Calhoun, where there were perhaps 6,000 men for the protection of the Green River country, and at Columbia perhaps 3,000. Other new regiments were rendezvousing at Bardstown for organization and preparation for service. As yet the most strenuous efforts had not succeeded in obtaining the necessary means of transportation for an advance.

About the middle of December Humphrey Marshall again invaded the State through Piketon with about 2,500 men, though his force was represented at 6,000 or 7,000. On the 17th I sent Colonel Garfield to take charge of a force of five regiments of infantry and about a regiment of cavalry and operate against him. Marshall was defeated in two sharp engagements on the Big Sandy, near Prestonburg, and by about the middle of February was driven out of the State.

Simultaneously with the advance of Marshall into Northeastern Kentucky General Zollicoffer made his appearance on the Cumberland River near Somerset. His force was represented at 12,000 men, but probably did not exceed 8,000. The force sent for that purpose and to observe his movements failed to prevent him from crossing. I had previously kept a regiment at Somerset, and ordered the erection of a small work, both to watch that route into the State and to prevent the shipment of coal to Nashville. Zollicoffer crossed at Mill Springs and intrenched himself on the north bank of the river. On the 27th of December I ordered General Thomas to march from Lebanon and attack him, in conjunction with the force already at Somerset, and at the same time sent two regiments of infantry and a battery of artillery to Jamestown to blockade the river, a steamer having already passed up with supplies for the enemy at Mill Springs.

Want of transportation delayed General Thomas' departure until the 1st of January. The weather had previously been tolerably good, but that very day the rainy season set in, and from that time until near the end of March the earth was thoroughly saturated and every stream was flooded. The season in that respect was remarkable. The difficulties of the march were so great that General Thomas only arrived at a position 12 miles from Mill Springs and about 75 miles from Lebanon on the 18th. The enemy came out and attacked him at daylight on the morning of the 19th. The result was a signal victory to our arms. The enemy was pursued to his intrenchments and during the night crossed the river. He lost a considerable number of men killed, wounded, and prisoners, fourteen pieces of artillery, some 1,400 animals, and a large amount of other property and stores. General Zollicoffer was among the killed.

The battle of Mill Springs was at that time one of the most important that had occurred during the war, and the victory was, I believe, the first the Union arms achieved where the forces engaged were so large; but the lack of transportation and the condition of the roads rendered it impossible to follow it up.

Owing to the delay in procuring sufficient transportation for the expedition to East Tennessee I had regarded the campaign against Nashville as the one which it would be necessary to enter upon first in order to save time. I was waiting for the arrangement of the necessary concert between the forces on the Mississippi and my own to commence it, when, owing to the illness of the general-in-chief, and at the request of the President, I wrote on the 3d of January to Major-General Halleck, who was in command in Missouri, and proposed substantially the same plan I had submitted to the general-in-chief, and substantially the same as that which afterwards resulted in the capture of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, and Nashville. It contemplated an advance upon Nashville through Kentucky, a strong demonstration, which might be converted into a real attack, against Columbus, if the enemy should weaken that point to strengthen others that were threatened, and an advance of 20,000 men up the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers under the protection of gunboats. Such a force I deemed sufficient at that time, for the works at Forts Henry and Donelson had as yet no great strength and were but feebly armed and garrisoned. If the expeditions should be threatened by a superior force they were to unite, under the protection of the gunboats, and make themselves secure until released by my advance upon Nashville. At that time I expected that the expedition already commenced against the enemy at Mill Springs would be fully accomplished in ten days and General Thomas' troops in a position to be available for other service.

General Halleck replied to my proposition that he had not spare force enough to undertake it, and suggested the objection that the proposed operation was one upon outer lines, but he offered to make a demonstration from Paducah toward Columbus. These facts explain in part why I was not prepared to act as promptly as I could otherwise have done when General Halleck subsequently commenced his advance up the Tennessee River. He stated also that he hoped in a few weeks to be able to render me material assistance. A mere demonstration, not in sufficient force to take a decided part in the campaign, would have been of no avail, because either my advance must be rapid directly against Nashville by flanking Bowling Green—an essential condition of which would be that I should meet supplies transported up the Cumberland—or else it must be deliberate, and with heavy artillery, against Bowling Green, strengthened as that position was by fortifications on both sides of Barren River, and I had not then the means necessary for such an operation. Besides, I received about the same time communications from the President and the general-in-chief urging the expedition to East Tennessee as of primary importance. I therefore gave my attention to it, intending to start that expedition from Somerset with the troops that were moving against the enemy at Mill Springs. The preparation of transportation was urged forward, and a strong force was set to work to corduroy the road to render it practicable. Nevertheless it was barely possible to subsist the 10,000 men at Somerset. The experiment demonstrated the impracticability of sending an expedition to East Tennessee in such force as to insure success in the present condition of the roads, and on the 1st of February I so advised the general-in-chief in a letter, with full explanations, and expressed my purpose to proceed against Bowling Green.

I had had no communication with General Halleck since his reply to my letter of the 3d of January, but on the 30th I received a dispatch from him, saying, without giving particulars, that he had ordered an expedition against Fort Henry. The same day I had suggested to him by letter a rapid gunboat expedition up the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers to destroy bridges over those streams. Although Forts Henry and Donelson had been considerably strengthened, I believed the gunboats could pass them without any great risk. On the 6th I ordered one brigade from the mouth of Green River and eight new regiments to re-enforce General Halleck's expedition. They did not, however, arrive until after the capture of that place, which occurred on the 6th, but took part in the subsequent operations against Fort Donelson.

General Halleck found great difficulty in the movement against Fort Donelson, although the distance from Fort Henry was only about 12 miles. The enemy had greatly strengthened the works and increased the garrison. Protected as Bowling Green was by fortifications, the formidable river in front, and by the condition of the roads, I apprehended that my operations against that place could not be rapid enough to prevent the enemy from re-enforcing Fort Donelson so strongly as to endanger the success of General Halleck's operations. Upon consultation with him, therefore, I commenced on the 13th the movement of three divisions to re-enforce him by water, which would not only make the reduction of the place certain, but give force enough to operate against Nashville on that line, while the rest of my force was threatening Bowling Green in front. The advance of General Mitchel's division arrived opposite Bowling Green on the morning of the 14th, and found the bridge in flames and the enemy evacuating the place. That officer was directed to cross rapidly and throw a force forward toward Nashville, and the advance on that line was strengthened by a division which was to have gone to the Cumberland.

The operation of passing the river at Bowling Green in its swollen condition was difficult and tedious. The advanced division, General Mitchel's, did not get entirely over for ten days, notwithstanding the energy of that officer. While this was going on the troops in rear were employed in repairing the railroad. On the 24th the river was so high that small steamers were taken over the broken dams and reached Bowling Green with supplies and to assist in ferrying. About the same time a pontoon-bridge was laid, and although the overflow of the banks seriously interfered, yet the troops were able to pass with comparative rapidity.

In the mean time I was informed about the 17th of the surrender of Fort Donelson. I arrived at Bowling Green on the 20th, and on the 21st learned that the enemy had evacuated Clarksville and fallen back on Nashville, and that he had burned the bridges at Nashville. On the morning of the 22d the troops that had crossed the river at Bowling Green, two brigades and a half, started for Nashville, without wagons, very few having yet been got across. With about 1,000 men on cars, which the enemy had not succeeded in carrying off or destroying, I expected to reach within 9 miles of Nashville that night; but a heavy rain destroyed the road in advance of us and I did not reach the river opposite Nashville until the night of the 24th. The remainder of the troops arrived at the same time by marching. I had telegraphed General Halleck, and sent a courier through to Clarksville giving information of my movements, and requesting that the gunboats should proceed at once up the river. I apprehended that they would meet one battery on the way, but they arrived without molestation on the night of the 24th, conveying the transports with the troops of General Nelson and General Crittenden, three brigades; and on the morning of the 25th the troops entered Nashville, and took position beyond the city toward Murfreesborough, the enemy having retired to that place.

The river was out of its banks and the work of crossing was tedious. General Mitchel's division passed over on the 25th and 26th and the other divisions as rapidly as possible, but the whole had not crossed until about the 5th of March. General Thomas' division arrived by water on the 2d. The troops moved by forced marches, without baggage, owing to the difficulty of getting their wagons over the streams. The trains did not, therefore, arrive for several days after. Those that could arrive more rapidly that way were transported by water up the Cumberland.

The strength of the enemy at Murfreesborough, after the evacuation of Nashville, was estimated at the time, and has since been stated by persons who had means of judging at about 30,000 men. This force included what was collected of the troops that were defeated at Mill Springs and the force that had been at Bowling Green and other points north of the Cumberland River, excepting what was captured at Fort Donelson. It commenced moving south from Murfreesborough in a very few days after my arrival at Nashville, and, as is well known, eventually formed a junction with the forces of General Beauregard at Corinth. A pursuit with the hope of overtaking it on its line of march would have been futile for that object even if the force had been up to commence it at once, for every stream was flooded and every bridge was destroyed as the enemy retired. The only alternative was to operate deliberately against some line or point which it was his object to defend, and the Memphis and Charleston Railroad presented such an object. It was the same for the forces that were operating up the Tennessee River, under the orders of Major-General Halleck, more particularly against the enemy's forces that by the recent operations had been compelled to evacuate the principal part of West Tennessee. It was necessary that our forces should act in concert against that object; better still that they should act under one direction; and the order of the War Department, which I received on the 12th of March, placing the whole force under General Halleck's command, was therefore eminently proper. On the 15th I commenced the movement toward the Tennessee River, in pursuance of the understanding which had voluntarily taken place between us before the orders of the War Department were received. General Halleck's dispatch of the 16th designated Savannah as the point where I was to form a junction with the force already assembling on the Tennessee River.

Before leaving Nashville I sent Brig. Gen. G. W. Morgan to take command of a column I had left on the Cumberland Gap road, which was increased to a division by scattered regiments that remained in Kentucky. He was instructed to pursue with energy and discretion the object of taking Cumberland Gap, and for his further progress to be governed by circumstances in East Tennessee or to hold the enemy in check in that quarter if his force should prove insufficient to advance. The operations of this column have been investigated partially by the Commission, and I shall allude to them again in that connection. I also moved General Mitchel's division forward to Fayetteville, 26 miles from Huntsville, for the purpose of seizing the Memphis and Charleston road. The enemy withdrew his troops from that line, excepting small guards, and General Mitchel, on the 12th of April, five days after the battle of Shiloh, entered Huntsville. Various other dispositions and instructions were made with reference to the troops that were to occupy Middle Tennessee during my absence with the main army. The latter numbered about 37,000 men, the former about 18,000.

The march toward the Tennessee River on the 15th of March commenced with one division, preceded by a rapid movement of cavalry, to get possession of the bridges as far as Columbia before the enemy could destroy them. It succeeded with all of the bridges excepting the one over Duck River at Columbia and one 4 miles north of that place. The work of preparing the means of crossing Duck River was urged forward by all possible means and was under the charge of zealous and energetic officers, but it was not completed until the 31st of March. The river, which, at first 40 feet deep, had been gradually receding, was watched day by day, and finally became fordable for cavalry the very day the bridges were completed. The army then moved forward steadily, the advance and myself reaching Savannah, about 90 miles from Columbia, on the evening of the 5th of April. The other divisions followed, with intervals of 6 miles from the head of one division to the head of the next.

The battle of Shiloh, which occurred on the 6th and 7th of April, has been justly considered one of the most remarkable of the war, in regard to the numbers engaged, the reverses of the first day, and the success of the second. The particulars, so far as my command was concerned, have been given in my official report of that battle, hereunto appended,* and it is not necessary to repeat them. I believe that report states in very moderate terms the part which my command took in the incidents of that field. It has been conceded that my army rescued our forces on the west bank of the Tennessee from certain destruction or capture, and the movement which preceded the battle was prompt and even rapid. I marched from Nashville not to rescue those forces, but to form a junction with them to operate against the enemy's position at Corinth; and it was desirable, and General Halleck's instructions required me, to effect the junction as promptly as possible. I was informed that I should find General Grant's army at Savannah, on the east side of the river, and I was surprised, and even concerned, when I heard during the march that it was on the west bank; but I was relieved from anxiety by the information that it was so protected by high water in the streams which interposed between it and the enemy, and nearly surrounded it, as to be perfectly secure.

It is not necessary to go into the particulars of the campaign against Corinth. My command formed the center in the advance on that place. By General Halleck's order one of my divisions—General Thomas'—served with General Grant's command in that advance, and did not again come under my supervision, or actually under my control, until about the last of July. The enemy's works were entered about daylight on the morning of the 30th of May, having been evacuated the previous night.

I come now to the period embraced in the investigations of the Commission, and proceed to a general review of the more material facts which have been developed in the evidence. I shall do this without pretending to offer at present a nice analysis of the testimony, or, as a general rule, even citing that which bears on the points which I claim to be established by it. No other course could well be pursued, because otherwise much time would be consumed in illustrating facts to which no importance might attach, as no specific charges or allegations have been submitted for trial. Such an analysis could only be made by me after knowing what points the Commission may give importance to. That I have no means of knowing now, a vast amount of evidence, oral and documentary, having been submitted without any explained purpose, and which may be important or not, according to the interpretation or bearing given to it. Nor shall I remark upon any of the incidents of this investigation.

The subjects submitted to the Commission by the War Department are as follows:

First. In reference to General Buell suffering the State of Kentucky to be invaded by the rebel forces under General Bragg.

Second. In his failing to relieve Munfordville and suffering it to be captured.

Third. In reference to the battle of Perryville and General Buell's conduct during that battle and afterward suffering the rebel forces to escape from Kentucky without loss or capture.

Fourth. Such other matters touching the military operations aforesaid as in the judgment of the Commission shall be beneficial to the service.

On the 30th of May, after the evacuation of Corinth by the rebel forces, I received a communication from Major-General Halleck, informing me that his first object was to open the lines of railroad centering at that point from our rear and flanks, and directing me to put one of my divisions on that duty on the Memphis and Charleston road east of Corinth. I accordingly detached the division of General Wood on that service. The army of General Pope was following up the retiring enemy in the direction of Baldwyn. On the 4th of June I received instructions to re-enforce General Pope, near Booneville, with two divisions, in anticipation of an attack from the enemy. I accompanied those divisions myself. The enemy, however, continued his retreat toward Okalona; and on the 9th I received intimation that a part of the force under my command would return to Tennessee, and that I could make my arrangements accordingly. At my request I was authorized to start the two divisions (Nelson's and Crittenden's) that were with me in that direction. General McCook's division, then at Corinth, was to remain there until relieved by General Thomas' division, which had also been sent to re-enforce General Pope. General Thomas' division originally formed part of my army, but had been detached from my command since the commencement of the advance upon Corinth. I was informed that it would probably rejoin me at a future day for the movement toward Tennessee.

I stopped at General Halleck's headquarters on my return from Booneville on the 10th, and visited them again on the 11th, and during those visits received his oral instructions with reference to the campaign I was to enter upon. Its object was the occupation of East Tennessee and certain important points on the railroad through that region of country; Chattanooga, Dalton, and Knoxville were points which it was considered important to occupy. I requested that I might be allowed to choose my own route, and at that interview General Halleck assented, though he had been in favor of moving directly on Chattanooga through North Alabama; but on the 12th I received a dispatch from him saying that, on further reflection, he deemed it best that the route he had suggested should be pursued. My own idea had been to strike a little farther north, through Middle Tennessee and McMinnville.

General Halleck desired that the movement should be made as promptly as possible, but it was a condition that the railroad from Corinth east should be repaired, and it was his idea that I should draw my supplies by that route. I did not concur in his views in regard to the advantages of that route, and I immediately gave orders for repairing the roads from Nashville through Tennessee and for procuring supplies in that way, but I placed the superintendence of the Memphis and Charleston road under an energetic and experienced engineer, Brigadier-General Smith, put troops on the route, and gave orders for pushing the repairs as rapidly as possible. Subsequently I suggested the inexpediency of repairing the road. It was for 80 miles parallel with the enemy's front and peculiarly exposed to attack. This objection was realized in the end, and, in addition, it was found impossible to get stock enough on the road to make it of material use even while it was kept open, so that substantially we derived no advantage from it. It however occupied the troops until about the last of June in opening it and detained General Thomas' division a month longer in guarding it, so that that division did not reach Athens and Huntsville until the last of July. ✓

As soon as my destination was pointed out to me instructions were given to my engineer officer, Captain Morton, to prepare the means of crossing the river at Florence, and similar instructions were given to General Mitchel, then commanding at Huntsville, for crossing a portion of my force at Decatur, so as to have the advantage of two roads and two crossings. A very efficient ferry was prepared at Florence and a very inefficient one at Decatur.

General McCook's division marched from Corinth on the 11th and reached Florence on the 15th of June. It was followed closely by Crittenden's division, which had come into the road at Iuka from Booneville. General Wood's was advanced to and beyond Tusculumbia to repair and guard the road, while General Nelson's took its place between Iuka and Tusculumbia. The few boats that were of light enough draught were employed in forwarding supplies by water to Florence, and in order to make up for the deficiency wagon trains were put on the road from Eastport to Iuka to connect with the single half-serviceable locomotive and the few cars that were available on the railroad. The boats were only able to carry from 30 to 40 tons over the shoals, and after a few trips could not run at all; after which wagon trains were started on the north side of the river between Florence and Waterloo, nearly opposite Eastport. The ferry at Florence was ready for use on the 22d of June and the crossing was commenced, but rumors of a movement of the enemy toward Iuka suspended the forward movement from the opposite side until the 25th. Wagon trains were first put across and dispatched to Reynolds' Station, where they connected with the railroad trains from Nashville, to convey supplies over the gap in the road to Athens. General Mitchel had previously been instructed to have supplies for a certain number of days, until the trains should be established, to meet the troops on their arrival at Athens and Decatur. The divisions moved forward in close succession by marches of about 14 miles a day—Nelson's and Wood's as soon as they were relieved from the road by other troops. Wood's division finished crossing at Decatur on the 6th of July. The other three divisions, crossing at Florence, commenced arriving at Athens on the 27th of June. The troops halted at these points momentarily, and their trains were thrown into the gap on the railroad to push forward supplies.

The problem of advancing into East Tennessee was now fairly before me. The force which I brought along numbered between 24,000 and 25,000 effective men, and there were besides about 16,000 more scattered through Middle Tennessee and North Alabama, that I had left behind for service in that region when I marched to form the junction with General Grant's army on the Tennessee River in April. That force, mainly under the command of General Mitchel, has been generally awarded praise for the service it performed and very justly, yet not more than 2,000 men ever appeared on the field of its operations to oppose it. It was not the numbers of the enemy that made its service difficult and creditable, but it was the large extent of country it occupied, the length of the lines it had to guard, and the difficulty of supplying it. Those lines had still to be held in a further advance and with no less force to make them secure, for the force which endangered them had been largely increased by the transfer of a large part of the enemy's cavalry to the north side of the Tennessee River after the evacuation of Corinth and by the organization of an additional force of guerrillas throughout Middle Tennessee and North Alabama and in the southwestern portion of Kentucky.

The limited force available for a further advance into the enemy's country was not, however, at the time of my arrival, the difficulty, for undoubtedly it was superior to the force which the enemy at that moment had in East Tennessee. Experience has shown what might have been deduced from reason, that if the movement could have been made without serious resistance while the enemy was yet inferior in force, it could have had no permanent result with no more troops than I had. The advance of 60,000 veteran rebel troops through a friendly population into Kentucky, where they undoubtedly met many friends, has been considered bold, and must have proved fatally disastrous to them but for their precipitate retreat. I know no reason why 25,000 or 30,000 men should be sufficient to advance with any greater prospect of a permanent advantage into an exhausted and comparatively barren country and in as close proximity to the whole power of the enemy. It was my error to believe at that time that the thing was practicable, and I did not represent it otherwise when I was assigned to the execution of it; but I must say also, in extenuation, that I did not anticipate that the enemy was to be left so unemployed at other points that he could devote his greatest effort against my enterprise. Besides, I regarded it as in the highest degree important and I supposed that no larger force could be spared for it.

However, at the time of my arrival with my army in North Alabama the immediate obstacle to the execution of the first step, the capture of Chattanooga, was that of supplies and the means of crossing the Tennessee River. The means to overcome these difficulties had to be created, for they did not exist. The lumber had to be sawed and a bridge built, and supplies for the troops had to be brought, for the country was destitute of them. The country between Decatur and Huntsville and extending up into Middle Tennessee is a cultivated and productive one; but as far north as the Tennessee line, and even including the southern tier of the counties of Tennessee, it is cultivated mainly in cotton. The planters never produce more than an ample supply of meat and corn for their own use and not always that. Farther north Tennessee produces considerable quantities of surplus provisions, but not enough to supply the demand farther south, as is shown by the fact that large quantities of produce from the Northwestern States have annually found a market at Nashville. The demand upon the surplus provisions of Tennessee had been increased by the rebellion, which cut off the supply from the Northwest, and by the armies, rebel and Union, which during the winter and spring of 1862 fed upon the country to a considerable extent. North Alabama particularly was left in a condition to need the necessities of life, instead of affording subsistence for an army. East of Huntsville the spurs of the Cumberland Mountains run down nearly to the river, leaving only here and there a narrow valley or cove of arable land. The whole country is rough and almost barren, producing no more than is necessary for the support of a poor and sparse population. East of Stevenson, as far as Chattanooga, it may be said to be destitute both of population and supplies. Beyond Chattanooga the productive region of East Tennessee commences; but during last summer it was exhausted of supplies, and the people themselves were, as they are now, notwithstanding the new crop they have since gathered, suffering for food. These facts go to the extent of rendering it impossible for my army to have advanced and depend on the resources of the country. The alternative of drawing its supplies from its principal base, the Ohio River, was imperative, and my wagon transportation was not sufficient to cover breaks in the railroads north of Huntsville and to advance beyond Bridgeport at the same time.

The first essential, therefore, was the opening of the railroads from Nashville; and to that end the force which General Mitchel had been ordered to put at that work was increased by engineer and other troops to the whole force that could be employed. Hired mechanics, under the military superintendent of railroads, an able and efficient man at such work, were also employed, and orders were given to push forward the repairs with all possible dispatch. But the work was much more formidable than had been supposed, and the work which I had expected to see completed in ten or fifteen days was not finished until the 31st of July on the Nashville and Decatur road. The Nashville and Chattanooga road was completed on the 12th of July; the trains started through on the 13th, and were stopped by the attack and surrender at Murfreesborough, by which and by subsequent successful attacks the completion of that road was delayed until the 28th of July.

In order to conceal the object, or at least the progress, of my campaign as much as possible it was desirable not to concentrate my force at a point which immediately threatened the enemy's position until I was prepared to move against him. This was also expedient from the necessity of placing the troops in positions where they could be most conveniently subsisted, and where they could give the necessary assistance in repairing the roads and in guarding them until they should be securely established, and protected at the more vulnerable points by stockades or other defenses which would enable a small force to maintain itself against a larger one. Prior to my arrival in North Alabama, however, General Mitchel had entertained serious apprehensions of an attack on the positions which he occupied in that region, particularly at Battle Creek and along the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and repeated dispatches from him urged the pressing importance of reinforcements to guard against the supposed danger. These reports of a probable attack at Battle Creek were repeated just after my arrival, and rendered it proper to increase the force at that point. McCook's and Crittenden's divisions were accordingly ordered there. They marched from Athens about the 4th and arrived at Battle Creek about the 14th of July. One brigade from the former was put at work on the road from Stevenson to Decherd. Nelson's division still remained at Athens, furnishing a strong working party on that road. Wood's division was stopped near Decatur, where it protected the ferry and the small garrison on the opposite side of the river, the idea not having been yet abandoned of making the Memphis and Chattanooga road vest of that point available for supplying my troops and communicating with the forces about Corinth. With these dispositions, orders were given for establishing the regular road guards and for getting together again the fragments of brigades and regiments previously there, which were found scattered in very great confusion; a brigade was organized to move from Murfreesborough and Tullahoma and occupy McMinnville; intelligent and energetic officers were put in charge of the road guards and road repairs; mills were set to work to get out lumber for a pontoon bridge; horses were ordered for the cavalry, which had been left in Middle Tennessee, and was in bad condition; and various other preparations ordered to enable the troops to move promptly and effectively as soon as the roads were completed so that supplies could be provided.

The first raid of Morgan into Kentucky took place early in July. He threatened Bowling Green and Munfordville about the 8th of July, defeated three companies of cavalry at Burkesville about the same time, and then went to Lebanon, where he destroyed the depot and hospital buildings. Thence he proceeded north through Lexington as far as Paris. He was engaged at Paris and other points during his expedition, but with no important result. He finally recrossed the Cumberland River at or near Mill Springs about the 23d of July and made his way to Knoxville.

The force which made this incursion has been said not to have exceeded 1,000 men, though at the time it was estimated as high as 2,500 or 3,000. It produced a good deal of alarm in the State, and many apprehended that the force would receive large accessions to its ranks and that the sympathizing part of the population would become troublesome, but those apprehensions were not realized. The injury was confined mainly to the inconvenience and suffering inflicted on individuals, and I have no doubt that the effect on the population was to strengthen its adhesion to the Union.

A good deal of censure was cast on the troops and the military officers in the State that Morgan should have escaped without capture or greater loss, but not with much justice, when the circumstances are considered. The objects to be aimed at by my army, after the occupation of Nashville in February, made it necessary to carry forward, for further operations, nearly the whole of the force at my disposal; and, indeed, the high stage of water in the Cumberland River afforded security at that time against such invasions, even if the rebel force had not left that region of country to concentrate for the struggle on the south side of the Tennessee. For these reasons, except the column which was operating against Cumberland Gap, not more than about 4,000 troops, mostly infantry, were left behind, and these were scattered over the principal part of the State, more as a police force and to guard railroads than to prevent invasion.

The probable result of our operations against Corinth developed to my mind the advantage the enemy could derive from the employment of a large cavalry force in Middle Tennessee and Kentucky, and on the 12th of May I advised the Secretary of War of the necessity of having at least five more cavalry regiments in those two States. I was answered that there was not at the time any cavalry to spare for that service, but that an additional force was to be raised, and that a part of it would be sent to me. None came, though authority was given to the officer commanding in Kentucky to raise some cavalry regiments. These, however, were in no condition to render much service at the time of Morgan's first raid. Subsequent events have shown, what might have been evident enough without the experiment, that to prevent such incursions and carry on the operations in front which the progress of our arms had rendered necessary was physically impossible with the force that was available. I had a front extending from Corinth to Cumberland Gap, through a hostile population, a distance of 300 miles; in fact it extended to Piketon, in the northeast corner of Kentucky, 100 miles farther, with lines of communication varying from 200 to 300 miles in depth. To press successfully against the rebel armies along the line of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad it had been necessary to denude the lines and the whole country in my rear almost entirely of troops. The front from Battle Creek to Cumberland Gap it was not possible to occupy at all. Is it astonishing that 1,000 cavalry, familiar with every path, should be able to penetrate this vast extent of country and escape without capture?

Morgan had not yet disappeared from Kentucky, after his first inroad, when Forrest, with a large force, suddenly appeared at Murfreesborough on the 13th of July, surprised and captured the garrison, consisting of some 1,400 men—cavalry, artillery, and infantry—forming part of the force which was about to march from that place and Tullahoma to occupy McMinnville, and did serious damage to the railroad. Two other regiments which had been designed as a permanent garrison for Murfreesborough had been detached and sent into Kentucky on the occasion of Morgan's incursion. The consequence of this disaster was serious. The use of the railroad from Nashville, which had been completed the very day before and which I was depending on to throw supplies into Stevenson for a forward movement, was set back two weeks; the force of Forrest threatened Nashville itself and the whole line of railroad through Tennessee, and the occupation of McMinnville was delayed two weeks. It became necessary to move northward some of the troops in North Alabama to drive out the rebel force and guard against further embarrassment. Nelson's division was ordered by rapid marches to Murfreesborough, one brigade going by railroad through Nashville; two brigades of Wood's division were ordered from Decatur to Shelbyville by forced marches and subsequently to Decherd, to give greater security to Elk River Bridge and guard the important route from the mountains into North Alabama through Winchester. A little later the remaining brigade of Wood's division was ordered to Stevenson to erect defensive works for the depot which was to be established at that point for the movement against Chattanooga. The excitement caused by Morgan's raid into Kentucky had been so great and the call for troops so urgent that I apprehended I should be compelled to send a division there; but to do that was to put an advance into East Tennessee out of the question, and I determined to trust Kentucky to the few troops already there rather than abandon the object for which I had started.

The movement of General Nelson toward Nashville was delayed somewhat by injury to the Duck River Bridge by high water. He arrived at Murfreesborough on the 18th. The enemy left as he advanced, threw himself on the road between that place and Nashville, and captured a guard of about 80 men and destroyed two more bridges. The efforts of General Nelson to intercept him were unsuccessful. After throwing up some field works for a small force at Murfreesborough to protect the depot which it was necessary to establish there, General Nelson started on the 2d of August with two brigades and arrived at McMinnville on the 3d of August. One brigade remained at Murfreesborough, but on the arrival of the force which had been designated to occupy the place that brigade joined him at McMinnville.

The railroad from Nashville to Stevenson was completed on the 28th of July, that from Nashville to Decatur on the 31st, and preparations commenced for an advance. Supplies were pushed forward to the depot at Stevenson, the pontoon bridge was gotten ready to be laid, the wagon trains which had been in use on the Decatur road were thrown across to Decherd, from which point they could be moved rapidly to Stevenson, and the troops, including General Thomas' division, which arrived at Athens and Huntsville about the 31st of July, were moved so as to be in convenient positions for the same object. In the mean time the enemy continued his operations with large bodies of cavalry against our long lines of communication through Tennessee and Kentucky, seconded in Tennessee by the organization of guerrilla bands, which swarmed in every part of the country. These latter were frequently encountered and defeated by detachments of our small cavalry force; but the former, moving in superior force and striking at vulnerable points, were generally successful, and finally on the 10th of August severed effectually our communications between Nashville and Louisville. In addition to the destruction of our lines of communication the effect of these operations and of the formidable preparations which were reported and believed to be in progress for the invasion of Middle Tennessee and the capture of Nashville was to intimidate our friends and embolden our enemies among the people, who not only would not bring in supplies voluntarily, but used every means to prevent us from finding them, so that nothing could be obtained from the country except by means of our own trains under the protection of strong escorts. On the 6th of August I gave orders for fortifying Nashville, to make it secure with a small garrison against any attack from cavalry.

On the 10th of August Morgan again made his appearance at Gallatin, surprised and captured the garrison, amounting to 150 infantry; then moved toward Nashville, destroying several bridges and capturing the guards; then toward Bowling Green, destroying the tunnel 7 miles north of Gallatin and several trestle-works and small bridges in that region. He was, however, handsomely repulsed in some instances by the small force opposed to him in these attacks. Simultaneously with this Forrest, with a large force, moved toward the Cumberland River, to be in a position to support Morgan or threaten Nashville if it should diminish its garrison, which consisted of about 2,000 men. Immediately after the occurrence of the first raid I determined to withdraw my cavalry as much as possible from its service in detachments against the bands of guerrillas which infested the roads and concentrate it in large bodies. By supporting them with infantry, equipped to move lightly, I hoped to be able to drive the enemy's heavy cavalry force from the lines. One of these commands I designed should operate from Murfreesborough and another from McMinnville. An experienced cavalry officer was assigned to the command of the former, with general instructions which allowed him a good deal of discretion. The zeal of this officer caused him to move in pursuit of the enemy with about 700 men before the whole of his command had joined. On hearing of this, and knowing that he was outnumbered by the enemy, I dispatched instructions for re-enforcing him with infantry from McMinnville if he could be reached and to restrain him until he had sufficient strength. The instructions did not, however, reach him, nor could his whereabouts be ascertained so as to re-enforce him. Hearing that Morgan had again appeared in the neighborhood of Gallatin he crossed the river at Hartsville in pursuit, engaged Morgan's force not far from that place about the middle of August, was defeated, and himself and some 150 of his men taken prisoners. The remainder made their escape, in stragglers and small bodies, to Nashville. The strength of Morgan's band at this time was estimated at from 1,500 to 3,000.

Work was immediately commenced to repair again the road north of Nashville, but the continued presence of Morgan's force in that quarter made it impossible to carry it beyond Gallatin, except by withdrawing from the front so large a force as to preclude the idea of an advance, and I therefore determined to defer it until it could be protected by a force which I hoped might come from Louisville of the new troops that were being called out. On the 16th of August I ordered Major-General Nelson to Kentucky to command, and sent with him three generals and some other officers of experience and two batteries of artillery. The position required an officer of his rank, and I had great confidence in his energy and ability.

While the enemy was producing this serious embarrassment by the operations of his large cavalry force, regular and irregular, on our long lines of communication, he was collecting a large army at various points in Tennessee from Chattanooga eastward. For a considerable time the main point of concentration was doubtful and the railroad facilities which the enemy possessed enabled him to concentrate speedily at any point. General Bragg arrived in person at Chattanooga on the 28th of July, by which time his whole force was within easy reach of that point, and from that time reports were current of his intention to assume the offensive. Sometimes they were quite positive that he was already crossing the river at Chattanooga, Kingston, and other points.

The lowest estimate that could be made of the force with which the enemy was prepared to advance, according to the best sources of information, was 60,000 men. That has, I think, been more than confirmed by the evidence before the Commission. Eye-witnesses estimated the force as high as 100,000. My dispatch of the 7th of August to the General-in-Chief, Major-General Halleck, gave information on this subject somewhat in detail and not in a discouraging tone; for I was continuing my preparation to advance, and was, in my own mind, disposed to make perhaps more than due allowance for exaggeration in the information that reached me. I was the more confident when, on the 10th of August, General Halleck authorized me to call on General Grant for two divisions if I should find it absolutely necessary. On the 12th I requested General Grant to send the divisions, intending to use one of them to protect my communications with Louisville and bring the other to the front: but their movements were at first involved in some uncertainty. At a later period I could get no information of them at all, and feared that General Grant had not been able to spare them, as he was himself threatened. One of them reached Murfreesborough on the 1st and the other Nashville about the 12th of September.

Very soon the information of the enemy's intention took such shape as to leave no doubt that he was about to invade Middle Tennessee with a superior force, and to make it proper to suspend the accumulation of supplies at Stevenson and establish a depot at Decherd, as being most suitable for that disposition of my troops which the designs of the enemy, as far as they could be divined, rendered proper to oppose him. The information pointed to Nashville as his principal aim, and justified the conclusion that at least he believed he had force enough to accomplish his object. It was ascertained that the number of my troops was quite accurately known to him. The route which he would take was altogether a matter of conjecture, to be founded on probabilities. McMinnville was mentioned very often, in the information which reached me, as the first point of attack, and they were so frequent that I deemed it proper to strengthen the force in that quarter; but the difficulty of crossing the mountain weakened the probability of an advance in that direction, while an advance into North Alabama was not only spoken of in connection with the enemy's plans, but offered many advantages. By crossing Walden's Ridge into the Sequatchie Valley he had a good, level road down that valley to Battle Creek, which was an indefensible position for us while he occupied the opposite side of the Tennessee River with his artillery. This would keep him in constant communication with his supplies at Chattanooga by means of the railroad on the opposite bank and the steamers which he had; his large cavalry force operating against Nashville and on my lines of communication would compel me to employ at least 20,000 men to protect them even that far, leaving about 25,000 men to oppose his advance in front. If the column from Kingston should advance on Nashville I should be compelled to fall back in the face of even an inferior force for the protection of that place; and thus both Alabama and the principal part of Middle Tennessee could be reclaimed by the enemy without necessarily risking a battle. It is not too much to say that 50,000 men thus employed on this theater of operations, with the superior cavalry force which the enemy had, would be an overmatch for 60,000 operating upon lines of such depth in the midst of an unfriendly population.

Such were the inducements which an advance upon Battle Creek offered to the enemy, even supposing that I was entirely on the north side of the Cumberland ridge, say at Decherd; but in fact he was well aware that I still occupied North Alabama, with some 12,000 men at Battle Creek, while the rest of my force extended as far north and east as McMinnville. If he could reach Battle Creek before the force at that place should extricate itself by moving to the east it would have to go around by the way of Huntsville, and thus make a march of 120 miles to reach Decherd, the nearest point at which it could possibly form a junction with the forces north of the mountain, while he, by a march of 25 miles from Jasper, could reach the same point, and thus throw his whole force between my scattered troops. The position at Battle Creek is, for a force whose communications are on the north side of the mountain, one of the worst that can be imagined against an enemy coming from the Sequatchie Valley and holding the opposite bank of the Tennessee River. A spur of the Cumberland ridge comes to within 200 yards of the river; Battle Creek runs at the foot of this spur on the east side, emptying into the river near the point; the only position for troops is west of the spur; the road to Decherd, a distance of 25 miles, passes around the point of this spur and along its side up Battle Creek in full view from the opposite side of the river and the creek; and there is no other road to the north side of the mountain practicable for loaded wagons short of Huntsville, distant 75 miles.

For the double purpose of guarding against an attack in this faulty position and of observing the movements and checking the advance of the enemy in the Sequatchie Valley I issued the instructions of the 19th of August to Major-General McCook, my purpose then being to attack the enemy in the Sequatchie Valley if possible or to give him battle at the first point on his route where I could concentrate my troops. Those orders required General McCook, upon the first intelligence of an advance of the enemy toward the Sequatchie Valley, to move promptly up the valley to the Anderson and Therman road with the two brigades of his division which were with him, to check the progress of the enemy and observe his movements. If pressed, he was to fall back on the Therman road deliberately until he should form a junction with the main force coming from the side of McMinnville. The other division which was with him at Battle Creek, General Crittenden's, was also to move up the valley to the Tracy City and Altamont road, which enters the valley 10 miles below the Therman road. He was to support General McCook in the valley, watching the old Nashville and Chattanooga stage road, which enters it from the Tennessee River at the point designated, and under like circumstances he was to fall back for a similar purpose on the Higginbottom road toward Tracy City and Altamont, where the junction would be formed.

On the 20th I learned that the enemy was certainly crossing at Chattanooga and other points, and I immediately directed General McCook to execute the orders already described. On the same day I left Huntsville, visited the posts at Stevenson and Battle Creek, and the following day went to Decherd to direct the movements for the proposed junction. I deemed it of the highest importance, for political as well as military reasons, to maintain my position in North Alabama, if possible, in connection with those movements, for which the instructions of the 19th of August, given to General Rousseau, the officer in command in North Alabama, in anticipation of my advance upon Chattanooga, were equally applicable; but I reduced the force in that quarter somewhat, leaving a regiment in fortifications at Battle Creek, one at Stevenson, and two at Huntsville, besides the road guards and the force on the Nashville and Decatur line. The orders for the concentration at Altamont (see the instructions of the 23d of August to General Thomas) had reference to the plan of operations above referred to for opposing the movements of the enemy, except that the information rendered it apparently certain that the enemy would advance on the Therman road, and that Altamont was the point farthest to the front at which he could be met. On the first supposition I had expected to intercept him in the Sequatchie Valley. ✓

In moving up the valley on the 20th General McCook received information from his spies and scouts which made him believe that the enemy would be in the Sequatchie Valley, and therefore in a position to intercept him before he could march to the Therman road, and he therefore returned down the valley to the Higginbottom road. That road was found to be impracticable for his artillery, and he moved still nearer to Battle Creek, and put himself on the road which follows up Battle Creek and then crosses the mountain. I there sent him orders on the 23d to move to Pelham for the purpose of effecting the concentration at Altamont. The difficulties of the route prevented the concentration at the time appointed, and in the mean time information in regard to the movements of the enemy made it a matter of very great doubt whether it could be effected at that point at all before the enemy would anticipate it. The only alternative seemed to be to concentrate there or at Murfreesborough. I determined to attempt the former, and gave the orders accordingly. Those orders anticipated that, from the greater difficulties General McCook had to overcome, the troops moving from McMinnville under Major-General Thomas would reach Altamont first. The latter was instructed to attack the enemy's advance, if it should have reached there, and hold his position, if possible, until the other troops came up; and in the event of being unable to do that the various columns were instructed as to the roads by which they should fall back to form a junction in rear. General Thomas marched to Altamont with a portion of his force at the time appointed. He found no enemy, and believing that he could not remain there for want of water, returned immediately to McMinnville. On his report and in consequence of his action I stopped the movement of all except General McCook's division, which remained at Altamont in observation until the final concentration at Murfreesborough.

The information which I received still pointed clearly to the Therman road as the one by which the enemy would advance, if at all. It is the best road across the mountain, and has the advantage of branching at Altamont into no less than four roads, which descend the mountain to an arc 40 miles long, from McMinnville on one flank to Decherd on the other. Still the movements of the enemy were less rapid than was expected, and placed him in a position to use that road or those farther east. Many officers doubted that he meant to cross out of the Sequatchie Valley at all, but supposed that his movements were only intended as demonstrations to cover the advance of his columns into Kentucky from Knoxville.

In the mean time our supplies were diminishing rapidly, with no prospect of renewal until a sufficient force was detached to restore our broken communications. This pressing necessity left no time either to advance or to await the arrival of an enemy who could choose his time and route, with the certainty that the necessity of subsistence would very soon compel me to fall back, in whole or in part, whether there was an enemy in front or not, as long as his cavalry continued its operations in rear. The news from Kentucky was unsatisfactory. The rebel force under Kirby Smith was coming into the State, there was nothing but new levies to oppose him, and it was not known what number of them had been collected. So far from being able to open the communication between Nashville and Louisville and from Cumberland Gap to Lexington, it was not improbable that those places themselves might soon be seized by the rebel forces. Under these circumstances I determined to concentrate my army at Murfreesborough and set to work to open the railroad north of Nashville. That object had already been delayed too long upon the hope of having it done by a force from Louisville. Orders were accordingly given on the 30th of August to the various commands and guards, distributed over an area of about 150 by 100 miles of territory and some 300 miles of railroad, so as to concentrate on the 5th of September. The routes and marches were prescribed, and the movement was executed simultaneously and with perfect precision. With the exception of the force on the Decatur road, which was ordered to Nashville, the whole army, coming from various quarters and different distances on four roads, concentrated at Murfreesborough on the 5th of September, bringing with it whatever supplies could be collected from the country. A small remnant of provisions, for which there was insufficient transportation, was destroyed at Huntsville, and with that exception not a pound of supplies was lost by the movement. After it was ordered I learned that a considerable quantity of cotton, belonging to persons who had purchased it in the country, was at Athens, awaiting transportation. In order to give them an opportunity to remove it I delayed the evacuation of that place perhaps a day or so.

On the 1st of September I learned that a large rebel force, under General Kirby Smith, had actually appeared in Central Kentucky, having defeated and routed the force under General Nelson at Richmond. This effectually cut off the division at Cumberland Gap from its base. I was anxious to rescue that force, and the shortest route by which it could be done was to direct a column from McMinnville, by the way of Somerset, upon the rear of Kirby Smith's army. I supposed that that might be done and still keep a front about McMinnville toward the army of General Bragg in the Sequatchie Valley, while the two divisions, one of which had arrived that day from Corinth, should open the communications between Nashville and Louisville. The forces at McMinnville and in that vicinity had not yet withdrawn from their position, and I accordingly suspended their movement, leaving its execution, however, to General Thomas, who was at McMinnville, and had the best opportunity to know any movements of the enemy in the Sequatchie Valley that would affect it. He answered, stating the advantages of a concentration at Murfreesborough, and advising me that he would march the following day, and so the concentration was executed as originally ordered.

I proceed now to notice certain theories and opinions that have been advanced concerning a plan of operations to oppose the movement of the rebel army across the mountain. As evidence they are of no more value than though they had been expressed in idle discussion around a camp-fire, and are only entitled to credit according as they are correct in their premises and rational in their conclusions. They were new to me until this investigation had made some progress, and it appears that one of them in particular was promulgated after the arrival of my army in Louisville, where it was used as a text for criticism by officers who have not appeared as friendly witnesses before this Commission.

Neither my own feelings nor any fact that I am aware of would justify me in assuming that General Thomas has entertained any other than the most friendly disposition toward me; but I was surprised at the opinion expressed by him before the Commission that Bragg's army might have been attacked at Sparta, and more astonished at the statement that he had urged upon me to concentrate at that place. My inquiries elicited the information that this proposition was communicated to me by telegraph on the 28th of August. At my request the dispatch was subsequently presented. It proved to have been written on the 22d instead of the 28th. It will be better understood after a brief review of the circumstances that gave rise to it.

General Thomas took command at McMinnville on the 19th of August. About that time I received very positive intelligence that the rebel forces were crossing the Tennessee River at three points at least—about 10,000 at Kingston, at least 10,000 at Harrison, and a force variously estimated at from 40,000 to 60,000 at Chattanooga. I telegraphed General Thomas and other officers on the 19th and 20th in regard to this information, and prepared them for the further movements the enemy might be expected to make. I told him to look to Sparta and Smithville, anticipating that the column from Kingston might advance on that route against McMinnville while we were threatened by a larger force elsewhere, or else toward Nashville to threaten our communications. This column he evidently kept in his mind, and it seemed to me that it was the only one he seriously regarded. The Chattanooga force proper, as he called it, he appeared either to doubt the existence of, or at least its purpose to cross the mountain. On the contrary I had reasons, which he probably did not know, to believe that it would advance by the Therman road. I therefore telegraphed General Thomas on the 22d of August as follows:

From McCook's information this morning it seems almost certain that Bragg is marching on McMinnville. His advance was at the top of Walden's Ridge last night. McCown is said to be crossing at Kingston and Withers at Harrison. Of course they will expect to unite. What sort of ground can we take by concentrating at McMinnville? How would it do at Altamont? Is the ground such as to give us the advantage of our artillery? How many days' rations have you? Are you provided with ammunition? Be ready to march in the morning. Answer immediately.

Of course you will instantly recall your absent troops. I will probably bring the Second Kentucky by rail to march from here. We will advance to attack in the Sequatchie Valley. I can hardly think the enemy will attempt the march across to McMinnville—at least not immediately. It appears to me that he will rather endeavor to get into North Alabama, and perhaps strike across to Decherd. If we advance to Altamont we may thwart him in both and preserve our communications with Decherd and Nashville. If we concentrate at McMinnville we lose North Alabama and Decherd. What think you? The great difficulty is in moving in the mountains with our trains. Of course we must cut loose from everything but our ammunition trains and subsistence for about six days, most of it in haversacks.

His answer to the first is the dispatch dated the 22d, at McMinnville, referred to in his testimony, and is in these words :

By all means concentrate here. The enemy cannot reach Nashville by any other route across the mountains unless by Sparta. At Altamont I am positively informed the enemy would have an equal advantage with ourselves. Here we will have a most decided advantage ; and by being here, should he march by Sparta, we can meet him either there or at Allen's Ford, across Caney Fork. He is obliged to pass this place or Sparta to reach Nashville. I have six days' rations and plenty of ammunition. Did you get my dispatch of to-day ? I cannot think that Bragg is coming here either by the Hill or Therman road. My reconnoitering party went into Dunlap yesterday.

His answer, of the same date, to the second is as follows :

We can get neither forage nor water at Altamont. It will be as difficult for us to march across the mountains as the enemy to come either to Altamont or this place. I would not advise concentrating here except for battle or for an advance into East Tennessee. I think our communications with Nashville will be better preserved by holding Decherd with a division, to enable us to concentrate either there, if threatened, or at this place. I have also information that Tupelo has been abandoned, and the most of the enemy at that place have been sent to Chattanooga. I therefore do not apprehend an attempt to regain North Alabama.

Upon further information that the enemy was advancing rapidly on the Therman road I answered him on the 23d as follows :

There is no possibility of our concentrating at McMinnville. We must concentrate in advance and assume the offensive or fall back at last to Murfreesborough. I deem the former the wisest, and we will act accordingly. I wish you therefore to move by a forced march to Altamont, there to form a junction with McCook, Crittenden, and Schoepf. McCook and Crittenden started for Tracy City from Jasper yesterday. I presume they are now at Tracy City, though possibly not. Schoepf will march at once. The junction must be formed to-morrow, and any division meeting the head of the enemy's column first must at least hold it in check until a larger force arrives.

One battery to a division will, I think, be ample in the mountains. McCook and Crittenden have with them six batteries. Leave all of yours, therefore ; at least don't take more than two. It will be necessary to leave some force with them, at least two regiments, and they should be covered with breastworks to-night without fail.

I shall order Schoepf's batteries here to be similarly disposed of. There must be no delay or failure. The enemy's advance was at the top of Walden's Ridge, 10 miles from Chattanooga, night before last, and talked of being at McMinnville to-morrow. That is hardly possible, but they must be met at the earliest possible moment. Communicate with McCook to-night by a trusty scout. The distance is 32 miles. He may possibly not be at Tracy City. If not, look for him on the road to Battle Creek. If you think best you may send your artillery to this place, which will release the force that would be required to protect them there ; though if they will be safe there is some advantage in having a force at McMinnville. Take no wagons except what will be necessary to carry rations and cooking utensils. I shall probably leave here with Sill's brigade to-morrow for Tracy City to join you. Communicate always in cipher by telegraph to this place and by courier through Tracy City. Schoepf sends a report that Hardee is advancing on the Dunlap road. Answer, so that I may know exactly what you do. Your staff officers make mistakes in the use of the cipher.

I apprehend that further comment on this subject is unnecessary. The dispatch in question was in answer to my own inquiry, and had reference to the relative merits of McMinnville and Altamont as battle grounds. It is certain that General Thomas has not consciously laid claim to an idea which did not possess him; but I apprehend that developed facts have been so mingled in his mind with impressions coincident in some particulars, though essentially different in the material points, that his memory has failed to draw the exact distinction between them. It is, however, due to him to say that the idea may have been in his mind that Bragg might cross the mountain to Sparta, and that he did not distinctly express it to me, imagining that I also entertained it myself.

But I do not propose to draw any advantage from the question whether or not a proposition was made to me to concentrate at Sparta. If it had been made, I should have judged it according to its merits with the lights before me at the time, and I do not doubt that I should have rejected it on grounds which I will state.

Besides the road which crosses from Jasper to Decherd and the one which ascends the valley and thence goes to Crossville there are no less than three roads by which the enemy could ascend the mountain to debouch from the Sequatchie Valley: First, the Therman road, which passes through or near Altamont, and then branches into at least four roads that descend the mountain into the plains of Middle Tennessee between Decherd and McMinnville, a distance of about 40 miles; second, a road which ascends the mountain at Dunlap and passes to McMinnville; third, a road which ascends the mountain a short distance below Pikeville and branches on the mountain, the left-hand branch going to McMinnville and the right hand forking again some 20 miles from McMinnville, one fork going to the latter place and the other to Sparta. There is also a road on the top of the mountain connecting all these roads. These geographical features would enable the enemy to arrive within 20 miles of McMinnville by not less than two roads before determining whether he would move on that point or Sparta, and by covering his movements with his superior cavalry force he could easily arrive within 6 or 8 miles of either of those points before his destination could be known at all, and it is 22 miles at least from McMinnville to Sparta. If I had been at Sparta he could have been at McMinnville and in possession of my line of supplies before I could have known it. If I awaited at McMinnville the development of his plan he could have gone to Sparta and pursued his course as he did. If I had divided my force between McMinnville and Sparta, to anticipate him at both points, he could have advanced with reasonable probability of success against either of them; and if the fractions should have been so strongly fortified as not to warrant an attack, he could have avoided them, thrown himself between the two, and thus have forced them to retreat separately, or attempt the offensive against a concentrated force. General Thomas' own experience at McMinnville in obtaining information on which success would have depended confirms my answer to one phase of this proposition and is applicable to all of them.

On the 31st he reports:

The general impression is that the enemy is advancing, but I have yet to see the person who has seen any of the Chattanooga forces proper.

And on the 2d of September, in reply to the discretional instructions heretofore alluded to, he says:

I will start to-morrow. I have heard again that the enemy intends advancing on this place by the Therman, Dunlap, and Sparta roads. By concentrating at Murfreesborough we shall be within striking distance of this place. By convenient roads our main force can be thrown upon the enemy between this and Decherd or Hillsborough, overcome him, and drive him toward Sparta, his longest line of retreat. A large force of cavalry and light infantry can be pushed across the mountains by the Dunlap and Therman roads, attack him in rear, and completely rout his whole force. I have studied the roads, and am now convinced that this is our best plan of attack.

It was afterward ascertained that the rebel forces under General Bragg actually commenced to arrive at Sparta the day after the date of this dispatch.

The reasons which made the concentration at Murfreesborough necessary and proper may now be briefly summed up:

It had been supposed that for the lack of supplies on the route the enemy would make his march across the mountains rapidly. Several days had already elapsed since, from the best information that could be obtained of his movements, it was supposed he would have arrived within striking distance, and he was still not nearer than the Sequatchie Valley.

My supplies had been cut off for twenty days, and the expectation that the force in Kentucky would reopen the railroad, on which they were dependent, was frustrated by the invasion of the State by Kirby Smith, which, as the result proved, gave more than ample occupation to the raw troops that were there. I did not even know what force of that kind could be expected, for its organization had only very recently been commenced and the State had recently been organized into a separate department not under my command. I was already reduced to about ten days' supply—a little more than that of breadstuff and some minor articles and a good deal less of meat and other articles scarcely less essential. The quantity was increased at Nashville a little by the collection of flour and meat in the country. General Thomas reported on the 28th from McMinnville that no provisions could be procured in that region, and that for forage he could get fodder, but no corn; and his statement in regard to the scarcity in the country is confirmed by testimony before the Commission. Such straits did not admit of any further delay to await an enemy who could choose his own time for the meeting and who had already been eight days behind the time at which I had reason to expect him. An immediate concentration at a point nearer the source of supply, from which I was separated 260 miles, was clearly necessary. It promised the only means of opening the railroad and still holding Nashville, the possession of which was believed to be the enemy's first object.

But the concentration at Murfreesborough was expedient on other grounds. I could not have concentrated at any point as far in advance as McMinnville more than about 31,000 men, and that force was not sufficient to attack Bragg's army united at any point. If I could have taken any position in which I could force or induce him to attack without delay it would have been well, but such was not the case. In this uncertainty as to the time he might delay and as to the route on which he would strike in force, while perhaps threatening by other routes, screened as he was by a range of mountains, with our communications with Louisville completely severed, and our supplies already reduced to a narrow margin, perhaps to be entirely exhausted when the advance of the enemy would make rapid operations necessary, it was plainly necessary to concentrate at some point nearer our base, by which means my effective force would be increased so as to be sufficient to meet the enemy whenever he should come and still have enough to open our communications.

The plan of operations presented in the evidence of another witness of rank before the Commission was to concentrate the army at Murfreesborough as soon as the rebel army commenced its advance from Chattanooga. This, except as to the time of the concentration, is the plan that was actually executed. The earlier execution of it would not have affected the result, but the distribution of my small cavalry force to guard the various passes across the mountains, from 40 to 60 miles distant—which was one feature of the plan—could only have resulted in the capture or dispersion of the whole of them whenever the enemy chose to effect it. As for the idea of first concentrating at Murfreesborough and then advancing to attack the enemy at Sparta, it must suppose that the enemy would wait seven or eight days at that place to be attacked, which he did not do. I do not, therefore, see any advantage in this variation of the plan that was adopted; and if it had been submitted to my judgment I should have rejected it.

Two witnesses of high rank, in answer to a question as to points north of the Cumberland River at which Bragg's army "could have been attacked with a prospect of success," expressed the opinion that it might have been done at Glasgow. This opinion was undoubtedly expressed without reflection, unless it referred to the advantage which the locality of Glasgow would have afforded for the attacking army in case of a collision there, and not to the possibility of intercepting Bragg's army at that point; for the testimony of these two witnesses shows and the map shows that until Bragg's army crossed the Cumberland River and took up its march northward it was impossible to know from its movements whether its plan was to go into Kentucky or turn to the west against Nashville; that it is 50 miles from the Cumberland River where Bragg crossed it to Glasgow, while it is 95 miles from Nashville, where my army was, to Glasgow; and from these facts the witnesses admit that it was not possible to have intercepted Bragg's army at that point unless he had tarried there. In point of fact the evidence shows that on the 7th of September I learned that a portion of Bragg's army had crossed the Cumberland River at Carthage and was moving northward, probably toward Bowling Green, where I had caused some supplies to be accumulated by the way of Green River, and that I immediately ordered a portion of my army to march for that point; that on the 10th I learned, what was before unknown, if not improbable, that another portion had crossed at Gainesborough, and had probably marched in the same direction, and that I ordered other divisions, making six, for the same point, accompanying them myself; that this movement was made rapidly, the last of the six divisions arriving at Bowling Green Monday morning, the 15th, which was the time at which the rear of Bragg's army passed Glasgow. Thus, after gaining intelligence of his passage over the Cumberland River, I moved my army 65 miles while he was moving 50, with the advantage of two roads, and I was still 30 miles in rear of him.

The same process of demonstration will show that even if I had known he was going by Munfordville, and if there had been nothing to delay me an hour at Bowling Green, I could not have intercepted him at Munfordville, because I had 105 miles to march, while he had but 68, the distance from Glasgow to Munfordville being 18 miles. In fact his advance actually attacked the latter place the day before my sixth division reached Bowling Green. But, furthermore, it was not yet to be assumed that his destination was Central Kentucky; on the contrary, Glasgow was an important position for him. It effectually commanded my line of communication with my base of supplies, while he had two lines open—one with the East Tennessee Railroad, which was his permanent base, and also with the valley of the Cumberland, and the other with Central Kentucky, where the occupation of Kirby Smith had established for him a second base.

Munfordville did not offer the same advantages, for, although a much stronger natural position, yet in taking it he gave up his communications with Tennessee, and rendered those with Kirby Smith less secure against a force operating from the Ohio River, supposing Louisville to be secure to us. At Munfordville his communication with Kirby Smith must have been along the Louisville turnpike and thence across to Bardstown, while at Glasgow it would be along the old Lexington road through Summersville and Lebanon, or through Columbia and Lebanon or Liberty, by all of which roads I have moved large bodies of troops. Besides, at Munfordville he would have been in a much less productive region than at Glasgow. These considerations, taken in connection with the risk he would run by advancing farther into Kentucky, made it at least reasonably doubtful whether he would not halt at Glasgow. The fact that his purpose was to penetrate still farther into Kentucky and that he had designs on Louisville was only known when it was ascertained that he had left Glasgow and through correspondence which was captured subsequent to that time. But supposing it had been reasonably certain that Bardstown was his destination, it was not to be assumed that he would go by the way of Munfordville; on the contrary, it is undoubtedly true that but for the bait which was offered to him in the garrison at that place he would not have gone there at all, for the simple reason that without any object whatever it would have taken him off the direct and excellent turnpike from Glasgow to Bardstown and thrown him on another road not so good and 12 miles longer. This brings me naturally to the question of the relief of Munfordville.

The foregoing explanations show that I could not have reached Munfordville in advance of the rebel force even if it had been desirable to leave it between me and Nashville. The first information received at Bowling Green that Munfordville was attacked or threatened was on the 14th, and the report was that it had been captured, though that was not certain. On the same day the last of five of my divisions arrived at Bowling Green, and on the same day, as was afterward ascertained, the main body of the rebel army marched from Glasgow, 18 miles from Munfordville, with the advantage of two roads. If I had moved forward at once I could not have reached Munfordville in less than four days, for, considering that I must march on one road, it would, for the rear of my column, have been equivalent in time to a march of 60 miles; and in the presence of an enemy whose position was not known the march could not well have been made more rapidly. As for re-enforcing the garrison by the first of my divisions which arrived at Bowling Green, even if the necessity of it could have been known it would have been out of the question, for those divisions would have been thrown into the midst of the whole rebel force; a folly which it appears the enemy actually anticipated, and prepared to reap the fruit of.

But I propose to inquire also what necessity there was for such relief, and on what grounds it could reasonably have been expected that I would furnish it. It is apparent from a study of the map, and the evidence shows, that the possession of Munfordville was not essential to Bragg's army in a strategical point of view. At least three other preferable routes were open to him, whether his object was to attack Louisville directly or to advance into Central Kentucky for other purposes: First, the shorter and better road from Glasgow to Bardstown and thence on to Louisville; second, the old Lexington road to Lebanon; third, the road through Columbia, Liberty, and Danville. He would not in any event take the road to the mouth of Salt River; because it threw him more away from the base of supplies which Kirby Smith's presence had established in Central Kentucky, because it made his junction with Kirby Smith more difficult and uncertain, and because it placed him in the angle between the Ohio and Salt Rivers, neither of which could he cross without ferrying or bridging. The same facts made the possession of Munfordville a matter of no strategical value to us. Its importance, therefore, was determined by the value of the bridge, which alone it was intended to protect as a link in the chain of communication between the troops farther south and Louisville, their base of supplies. The bridge, if destroyed, could be rebuilt in a week—was actually rebuilt in about ten days; and as the principal part of the force which drew supplies across the bridge was coming north, its preservation was not of immediate importance. I have been disposed to say, therefore, that the determination to hold the bridge was an error of judgment; but I will not now assert that it was so, seeing that doubt existed as to the probability of Bragg's coming that way and that the commander considered himself able to hold his position against the force which at first threatened him. If it was evident that Bragg would come against the place with his whole or any considerable part of his army, then it is certain that to attempt to hold it was an error, for no position could be less tenable for a small force against a very large one. It must be apparent that the possession of Munfordville was of no importance that would justify the jeopardizing any considerable force to hold it, and the evidence shows that for two days and a half after the first attack the way was open for the withdrawal of the garrison. Its relief from the direction of Bowling Green was therefore unnecessary, if it had been possible. Let us see now how far the place was considered to be in jeopardy and on what ground it was reasonable to expect relief from Bowling Green.

It appears that on Saturday, the 13th, the commanding officer learned that a force, represented to be 7,000 strong, was advancing upon his post from the direction of Glasgow; that he reported the fact to his superiors at Louisville, saying:

If I had one more good regiment and a few more pieces of artillery that force could not take me. As it is I shall do my best to prevent it. Can you send me re-enforcements to-night? I shall send train to Salt River for them.

To which he received in reply, "I send you what you ask." The same day he also reports, "Some indications that the main rebel force are going toward Lebanon," and that his intrenchments would be finished that night. These reports were certainly not alarming, and did not indicate that he expected or required assistance from Bowling Green, however desirous he might be to see a force coming from that quarter. On the same day he sent scouts to Bowling Green with verbal messages. These scouts could not have carried word that he was in jeopardy and required help from there, for his superiors had given him all he thought necessary at that time and as yet no force had appeared in front of him. I now remember that the scout Miller came to me, but so little was there in his communications to me different from the information I derived from unauthorized persons, that I had forgotten, nor do I now remember, that he came as a messenger. He knew less about the enemy and scarcely if any more about the garrison than others, especially one who came from the vicinity of the fort the morning of the attack and reported quite confidently that the garrison had surrendered. Those persons reported first to the commanding officer at Bowling Green, and he had no better recollection of the special object and importance of their mission than myself. Nor could it at any rate have altered the case. I must of necessity have operated against the rebel army which was already virtually between me and Munfordville. There was no communication between me and the commander in Kentucky, and, knowing that the rebel army was between me and Munfordville, he had no reasonable assurance that I could succor that place. It was not under my command, I really knew nothing of its condition, and I could not suppose that it would be needlessly exposed to so large a force.

All the information I had led to the supposition that Bragg's army was probably yet at Glasgow, and on Tuesday afternoon, the 16th, I marched with six divisions (one being still in the rear), in three columns, to attack the enemy if he should be at that place. The facts shown in evidence that the last of those six divisions had only arrived after a march of 15 miles the day before, with very rapid and fatiguing ones on previous days; that some time was necessarily required to make arrangements with reference to the garrison and trains that were to remain; that supplies had to be distributed, and that the supply of provisions was imperfect, making it necessary to collect breadstuffs from the country to supply the troops, will amply justify this short delay. The troops in three columns had to start upon the main turnpike road from Bowling Green to Munfordville, but successively turned upon roads which converge on Glasgow. The cavalry thrown in advance reported on Tuesday night that the enemy had left Glasgow, and the following day my army marched to Cave City and Horse Well, within 10 miles of Munfordville. During that day I heard of the surrender of Munfordville, and on the night of that day the commanding officer of the post reported to me at Prewitt's Knob with his troops on parole.

The position at Munfordville is one of great natural strength for a large force. I understand that it was the subject of dissatisfaction that the rebel army was not attacked in that position; but I have never heard that the feeling was concurred in by the officers of higher rank, several of whom, distinguished before and since for gallant conduct, have testified that such an attack would not have been judicious under the circumstances. The advantage of position in favor of the enemy must have made the result at least doubtful; and even a very serious check, in the exhausted condition of our supplies, would have been disastrous. I could have avoided the enemy by passing to either side of him, but I deemed it all-important to force him farther into the State, instead of allowing him to fall back upon Bowling Green and Nashville, and I matured a plan and determined to attack there rather than allow him that course. I believed that the condition of his supplies would compel him to abandon his position; and I was very well satisfied when that proved to be the case. He commenced to withdraw on the night of the 20th, and my advance drove out his rear guard, after some skirmishing, on the 21st. The march was continued, and skirmishing was kept up with his rear guard until he turned off toward Bardstown.

Many considerations rendered it proper to direct my march on Louisville instead of following his route. The want of supplies made it necessary, many of the troops being out by the time they reached the mouth of Salt River. This reason would have been insuperable if, as was not improbable, the enemy should concentrate his force and throw himself rapidly between me and Louisville. The junction of Bragg and Kirby Smith was not only possible but probable. It would have made their combined force greatly superior to me in strength, and such a disposition would have placed him between two inferior forces, which, from their positions, could not have acted in concert against him, and which, therefore, were liable to be beaten in detail. One of these forces, that occupying Louisville, was composed of perfectly raw, undisciplined, and in a measure unarmed troops, with but very little artillery and very few officers of rank or experience. It could not have withstood the veteran rebel army two hours, and the consequence of its defeat and the capture of Louisville would have been disastrous in the extreme. That force, however, mixed judiciously with my old troops, could be made to render good service, as the result proved.

These considerations determined me to concentrate rapidly at Louisville. The last division reached that point on the 29th of September. On the same day the incorporation of the new troops with the old, and other preparations which a long and fatiguing march of the old troops and the inefficiency of the new rendered necessary, were completed, and on the morning of the 30th the consolidated army was prepared to march against the rebel forces which occupied the principal part of Kentucky. The campaign which ensued, and which resulted in the expulsion of the enemy from the State, has been sketched in my official report of the 4th of November, herewith appended.* As far as the facts are concerned the investigations of this Commission have shown, perhaps, that I did not make allowance enough for the diminution of my force by absentees and stragglers from the new regiments, and that therefore I probably overestimated my own strength at and after the battle of Perryville, if I did not also underestimate the combined strength of the enemy. These investigations also give reason to believe that the aggregate loss of the enemy during the campaign was greater than I represented, and they have developed additional interesting incidents; but they point to no statement which I could now desire to alter. I shall limit myself, therefore, to the elucidation of certain particulars in which the wisdom of my acts would seem to have been called into question by the course of the investigation.

The battle of Perryville, although but a partial and by no means as fruitful a contest as I had expected, was not without important and gratifying results. I shall notice very briefly the causes which prevented it from being more so.

When, on the 5th of October, Bragg's army proper retired from Bardstown it was uncertain where it would unite with the force of Kirby Smith, though Danville was the point where I most expected to find them, and my corps were accordingly directed on Perryville and Harrodsburg. When, on the night of the 6th, I ascertained that Kirby Smith had crossed the Kentucky River at Salvisa, Harrodsburg or Perryville became the most probable point of concentration, and the destination of the corps which were marching on Harrodsburg had to be changed to Perryville. Information during the 7th that the enemy were turning toward Harrodsburg inclined me to suppose, though not confidently, that Harrodsburg, and not Perryville, would be the point. In the movement on that place the center corps, with which I was, marched by a shorter and better road, and therefore arrived within about 3 miles of Perryville on the evening of the 7th, while the other corps were expected to be still about 7 miles in rear, on their respective roads to the right and left.

Finding a sufficient force at Perryville on the evening of the 7th to stop our progress without a general engagement of the corps it was presumed that the enemy had determined to make his stand there, and the following instructions were sent to General McCook :

OCTOBER 7—8 p. m.

GENERAL: The Third Corps (Gilbert's) is within $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of Perryville, the cavalry being nearer, probably within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles. From all the information gained to-day it seems probable that the enemy will resist our advance into the town. They are said to have a strong force in and near the place. There is no water here, and we will get but little, if any, until we get it at Perryville. We expect to attack and carry the place to-morrow. March at 3 o'clock precisely to-morrow morning without fail, and move up till the head of your column gets to within about 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of Perryville; that is to say, until you are abreast of the Third Corps. The left of this corps rests near Bottom's place. Perhaps Captain Williams, Jackson's cavalry, will know where it is. From the point of the road Gilbert is now on across direct to your road is about $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles. When the head of your column gets to the vicinity designated (3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from town) halt and form it in order of battle, and let the rear close well up; then let the men rest in position and be made as comfortable as possible, but do not permit them to scatter. Have the country on your front examined, a reconnaissance made, and collect all the information possible in regard to the enemy and the country and roads in your vicinity, and then report in person as quickly as practicable to these headquarters. If your men have an opportunity to get water of any kind they must fill their canteens, and the officers must caution them particularly to use it in the most sparing manner. Send to the rear every wagon and animal which is not required with your column. All the usual precautions must be taken and preparations made for action. Keep all teams back except ammunition and ambulances. Nothing has been heard from you to-day. Send orderlies by bearer to learn the locality of these headquarters. The general desires to see Captain Williams, Jackson's cavalry, by 7 o'clock in the morning at these headquarters.

Respectfully, &c.,

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Similar instructions, but suited to the locality on which he was to form for the attack, were given to General Thomas, who, as second in command, was with the right corps.

It was expected that these instructions would get these two corps into position for the attack by 7 or 8 o'clock in the morning; whereas, in consequence of delays which were more or less unavoidable, the heads of the columns did not come up until between 10 and 11 o'clock and the rear division of the right corps did not get into position until about 4 o'clock. This rendered it improbable that the attack could be made until next morning and was one of the causes which marred the success I confidently expected. Afterward the lateness of the hour at which I received intelligence of the condition of affairs on the left rendered it impossible to reap the fruit that would otherwise still have remained.

It has been a matter of surprise that so severe an engagement could have taken place within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of my headquarters without my knowledge. The commander of an army covering a line 6 or 7 miles long, interspersed with woods and hills, must of necessity depend on the reports of his generals for information of what is transpiring on different parts of the field. After the failure to get into position as soon as I had expected I no longer anticipated a battle that day; but a good deal of artillery firing had been going on between the advance guards of the two armies since our arrival the evening before, excepting at night. The cause of this was well understood, and the greater or less rapidity of the firing at intervals was not a matter to attract particular attention, especially as it was to be expected that information of anything of serious import would be promptly conveyed to me. For that reason I received with astonishment the intelligence of the severe fighting that commenced at 2 o'clock. Not a musket-shot had been heard nor did the sound of artillery indicate anything like a battle. This was probably caused by the configuration of the ground, which broke the sound, and by the heavy wind, which it appears blew from the right to the left during the day, though the latter I had not thought of until it was established in evidence before the Commission. Be that as it may, many witnesses, without exception, have testified to the absence of all reason to suppose at my headquarters that a battle was raging, and the testimony of hundreds more could have been adduced to the same effect.

It has been asked why, after the battle of Perryville, I did not immediately follow the enemy to Harrodsburg, without waiting for Sill's division to come up. That the entire rebel army could have been brought to battle there I have no doubt. The forces were nearly equal on both sides—on one side nearly all veteran troops, under perfect discipline; on the other, a portion, the old "Army of the Ohio," equally good, but more than one-third of the whole raw and undisciplined.* The enemy would have had the advantage of the strong position which he selected. The result of a conflict under such circumstances is not to be predicted. I am not willing to admit that I might have failed, and yet no man can assert that the result ought certainly to have been otherwise under the circumstances. It was sufficient for me that I could make it reasonably certain by waiting for my troops to come up.

My studies have taught me that battles are only to be fought for some important object; that success must be rendered reasonably certain if possible—the more certain the better; that if the result is reasonably uncertain, battle is only to be sought when very serious disadvantage must result from a failure to fight or when the advantages of a possible victory far outweigh the consequences of probable defeat. These rules suppose that war has a higher object than that of mere bloodshed, and military history points for study and commendation to campaigns which have been conducted over a large field of operations with important results and without a single general engagement. In my judgment the commander merits condemnation who, from ambition or ignorance or a weak submission to the dictation of popular clamor and without necessity or profit, has squandered the lives of his soldiers. In this connection it is proper to review the circumstances which should have weight upon the question of hastening a battle at the particular juncture referred to.

There is not, I venture to say, a particle of evidence upon the records of this Commission which does not lead to the conclusion that the objects and intention of the rebel Government in the invasion of Kentucky last summer were to hold possession of the State by force of arms and secure it to the cause of the rebellion. The circumstances of the invasion and the formidable force employed in it, the advance of the smaller force under Kirby Smith, which established depots and collected supplies, that made comparatively easy and safe the subsequent advance of the main force under General Bragg to a point so remote from its original base; the further re-enforcement of this large force by the column under Breckinridge at the very time when, if a temporary raid had been the object, the main force should have been rapidly withdrawing instead of re-enforcing; the deliberation and permanency with which the invading army maintained its position in the face of the force which was preparing to drive it out; the inauguration of a provisional State government under the authority of the Confederate Government; the enforcement of the conscription and other Confederate laws; the avowal of the Confederate authorities; the plan of campaign sketched in the letter of General Beauregard to his Government; the convictions of the people of Kentucky from what they saw and the assurance of the rebel authorities; the constant and confident declarations of all persons connected with the invading force; the disappointment and disapprobation which the whole Southern press expressed at the result—all go to show that the object of the invasion was permanent occupation. That object could only be secured by giving battle to and destroying or driving from the field the army which was opposed to it.

* To quotation from this paragraph in his letter of April 10, 1864, there omitted to avoid duplication, General Buell adds the following note:

"The evidence places the rebel army in Kentucky at not less than 60,000. It places my force at Perryville at less than 58,000 before the battle."

Such a plan and determination were also clearly indicated by the movements of the enemy after the commencement of my march from Louisville. If his object had been to retreat without a struggle as soon as I moved against him, the force of Kirby Smith, which was then at various points north of the Kentucky River, would at once have moved by the roads concentrating at Richmond and thence on to Cumberland Gap. It was for that force the shortest and best road and a better route for supplies than the one it pursued. The main force, under Bragg, would have moved on one or more of the roads which converge upon Glasgow, through New Haven, Lebanon, and other points. This line would have given him the advantage of marching by several of the best roads in the State, converging at convenient distances. It would have taken him through a region of country where supplies were comparatively abundant; it would have enabled him to concentrate his army at Bowling Green and perhaps capture that place before he could be overtaken; or, if not, to move upon Murfreesborough, where he would have railroad communication with Chattanooga and good lines of retreat to the other side of the Tennessee River if necessary, or the opportunity of capturing Nashville if he should deem that feasible; or, if he desired to retreat through Cumberland Gap, he would go on through Danville and Stanford. Instead, however, of starting upon these natural lines of retreat toward Tennessee, Kirby Smith moved west, entirely off his line of retreat, and crossed the Kentucky River near Salvisa; and Bragg, after turning the angle at Perryville, moved northward, the very opposite of his direction of retreat. That the original object of this movement was to concentrate the whole rebel force at Harrodsburg instead of Camp Dick Robinson is evident from the fact that if the latter had been the object Kirby Smith would have moved directly to that point over the Hickman bridge, instead of fording the river lower down to go out of his way, and Bragg would have marched through Danville to the same point. Thus the circumstances of the invasion indicated that there would be a formidable struggle for the possession of the State, and the movements of the rebel forces to meet the operations that were in progress against them pointed to a great battle at or near Harrodsburg.

The battle of Perryville, by every reasonable explanation, increased instead of weakening the probability of a great battle at Harrodsburg. It has been asserted that General Bragg fought the battle of Perryville with portions of three divisions, only about 15,000 men. It is certain that he fought it with only a part of his whole force. His motive therefore may be supposed to have been either to check my advance to give time to take up a position with his main force beyond, or else because he hoped to gain some advantage by striking the head of my column, supposing I was moving on only one road, before I could get a superior force up to oppose him. In either case he could not have expected to accomplish much more than he did in this partial engagement. He was repulsed, it is true, but not until night protected him from very serious consequences, and there was nothing in the result that should have decided the fate of so important a campaign. His loss was probably much less than mine, from the fact that the attack was made when my troops were in column and to that extent unprepared.

That General Bragg moved to Camp Dick Robinson instead of awaiting an attack by my whole force at Harrodsburg is no evidence that he would not have been willing to give battle to the part of it which I had at Perryville. With an equal force he could safely risk a battle in the strong position he could have taken, and in fact did select, when the result would by no means be as certain there, against a superior force, as it would be in the still stronger position of Camp Dick Robinson, which had the further advantage of being a depot for his supplies. For these reasons, and on account of its inaccessibility and superior strength, neither did his withdrawal to Camp Dick Robinson indicate an intention to abandon the object of his campaign and retreat precipitately from the State. These reasons justified the conclusion that the rebel army was to be encountered in battle, notwithstanding critics after the fact may answer that the result contradicts the conclusion, and they justify every reasonable precaution to have made the success of such a struggle certain. They afford an interpretation to the movements of the army under my command subsequently to the battle of Perryville.

Pending the arrival of General Sill's division the left corps, General McCook's, laid near Dicksville, from which a road extends to Harrodsburg; the center, General Gilbert's, was abreast of the left, on the direct road from Perryville to Harrodsburg; and the right, General Crittenden's, was on Salt River, about 4 miles from Danville. Cavalry was in front on the Harrodsburg and Danville roads. A good deal of the ammunition of McCook's corps and some in the center corps had been expended in the battle of the 8th, and so much of the means of transportation had been required for provisions that wagons could not be spared for a sufficient supply of reserve ammunition on starting from Louisville. This was hurried forward and other matters attended to in the condition of the army which had resulted from the battle. These of themselves would not have delayed my movements, though they were important.

General Sill's division arrived on the evening of the 11th and the army was ordered to move on the 12th. Strong cavalry reconnaissances had been kept out every day, but on the evening of the 10th I ordered out three brigades of infantry with cavalry to move on the 11th to discover more of the position or movements of the enemy. One moved beyond Danville toward Camp Dick Robinson; one on the Danville and Harrodsburg road toward the latter point; and the third toward the same point on the Perryville and Harrodsburg road. About daylight an officer, just in from Harrodsburg, came to my tent and reported to me with great earnestness that the enemy was moving against us in force from Harrodsburg, distant about 8 miles. The troops were put in position to be prepared, if the report should prove true, and in the mean time the several reconnaissances proceeded as ordered. The one on the left discovered and reported the enemy apparently in force about 2 miles south of Harrodsburg early in the morning ; but he withdrew during the day, and the two reconnaissances which were ordered toward Harrodsburg entered that place in the evening, capturing some property and a large number of sick, wounded, and some other prisoners.

It was probable that the enemy had retired to Camp Dick Robinson, but it was reported that some at least had gone in the direction of the Kentucky River, and it was necessary to ascertain the fact. It would require a day to do that by reconnaissance. If the reconnaissance were supported in force, we should be prepared to take advantage of the contingency of the enemy still being this side of Dick's River ; and, in any event, no time would be lost in the movement to turn the position at Camp Dick Robinson, if it should be found that the enemy had actually retired to that place. On the 12th, therefore, the whole army swung around on Danville as a pivot, the right and center on the Danville and Harrodsburg road and the left near Harrodsburg on the Perryville and Harrodsburg road while a reconnaissance was pushed forward to gain the desired information. It ascertained that the enemy had crossed Dick's River.

If it should be said that these dispositions proved to have been unnecessary by the withdrawal of the enemy, it may be answered that such may be the case with nine out of ten of the dispositions that are made in every campaign ; that battles occur only occasionally in the movements of opposing armies, but that preparation for battle may be necessary every day. Without such preparation battles may be multiplied, and so in most cases are defeats to the careless.

The enemy's position in rear of Dick's River being, from the character of that stream, impregnable in front, I moved on the 13th to turn it by the south. On the night of that day I heard that the enemy was retreating from Camp Dick Robinson toward the south and I immediately ordered pursuit. The leading division marched at 12 o'clock that night and the others following in rapid succession. Crittenden's and McCook's corps, the former leading, took the road to Stanford and Crab Orchard, while Gilbert's took the road to Lancaster and Crab Orchard. On both roads the enemy's rear guards were overtaken the next day and were pressed continually as far as London. No general battle occurred between the two armies, though the enemy was foiled in his object and driven from the State.

Anticipating a movement of the rebel army into Middle Tennessee, the Army of the Ohio moved promptly in that direction, and on the 31st of October had, under my orders, advanced as far as Bowling Green and Glasgow. It was my intention to have reached Murfreesborough by the 10th of November. On the 30th of October I turned over the command to Major-General Rosecrans, in obedience to orders from the general-in-chief.

A careful study of the topography of Central Kentucky shows it to be a region possessing remarkable strategical features for defensive operations, especially for a force whose line of retreat is toward the State of Tennessee. The Kentucky River, running across the State from east to west, with its cliffy banks, makes a strong line of defense, while its somewhat frequent fords, opposing but slight obstacles to the movements of an army when the river is low, yet easily defended from the opposite bank, make it an admirable line for a retreating army to take shelter behind, and a perfect curtain to cover ulterior movements. Its advantages in this respect are very greatly increased by the character and position of Dick's River, which, coming from the south, empties into the Kentucky River where the latter makes a strong bend to the north. Dick's River has the same characteristics of cliffy banks, and its fewer crossings make it a much stronger line of defense than the Kentucky River.

Together these streams make the position of Camp Dick Robinson, in the fork, almost impregnable for a large army, except from the south-east. In that case the defensive army, with its right flank protected by Dick's River and its left by the broken ground to the east, may fall back easily and securely to the north side of the Kentucky, and by a short march either to the east or the west recross to the south side and fall upon good lines of retreat; and these movements can only be counteracted by considerable detours or by previous detachments, which would weaken the opposing army so much as to endanger the main attack, unless the army is very greatly superior in strength. On the north side of the Kentucky River the country is traversable by good roads between the Lexington and Richmond road and any of the roads crossing the river lower down; but on the south side the country bordering the river between the mouth of Dick's River and the Lexington and Richmond road is destitute of practicable roads parallel with the river. Besides the advantages already alluded to, the whole of that region of country abounds in strong positions commanding the only water for an army within several miles, so that the attacking force is forced to fight under all the disadvantage of exhaustion for the want of it, as was the case at Perryville.

These details make it easy to answer the theories that have been advanced for the annihilation or capture of the entire rebel army under General Bragg. One of those theories assumes that that army might have been destroyed in crossing Dick's River.

A defile, if it does not retard the march materially, is always a benefit to a retreating army, and the line of Dick's River is admirably adapted to such an object. It is only necessary for the retreating army to make demonstrations of battle with a strong rear guard, which will require corresponding preparations and delay on the part of the pursuer. In the mean time it throws its artillery across rapidly to take positions to sweep the opposite bank, and under such protection the remainder of the retiring army crosses with safety.

Great stress has been laid on the importance of Danville to cut off the retreat of the rebel army from Perryville. My right rested after the battle within 4 or 5 miles of Danville and my cavalry watched and went beyond that place. Danville controlled no line of retreat for the enemy except through that point and thence on toward Somerset or Columbia. That was as well covered by being 4 or 5 miles from Danville with a perfectly open and unobstructed country between as it would have been at Danville itself, and the enemy did not attempt to use it at all. Danville is 8 miles at the nearest point from the road going from Camp Dick Robinson to Cumberland Gap, and the strong line of Dick's River between prevents Danville from having any command of that road.

The first point at which the enemy's retreat on the Cumberland Gap road could be intercepted is Lancaster, 10 miles from Danville. If the Army of the Ohio moved to Lancaster in force in advance of the rebel army, it threw its communications into the hands of the enemy. If, before being assured that the enemy had crossed Dick's River, it divided its force over the 20 miles from Perryville to Lancaster to protect its communications and intercept the retreat of the enemy through Lancaster, it rendered itself liable to be beaten in detail; and if, after being assured that the enemy had crossed Dick's River, it left small detachments sufficient to guard the passes over that river and then moved with the main body on Lancaster, there is no reason why the enemy should not have been able to hold it in check on the line of Dick's River long enough to secure his line through Lancaster if he was determined to retreat.

An army on ordinary marches, continued for many days, will average about 2 miles an hour; but in a forced march for 20, and at least for 10 miles, it can average 3 miles an hour. If the rebel army had 60,000 men, with artillery, and 1,500 wagons for baggage, supplies, &c., it would in marching occupy 39 miles along the road in one column or 19½ miles each in two columns. It would therefore require six hours and a half to clear its camp on two roads; the whole of it will have arrived at or passed a point 20 miles distant in fourteen hours or a point 10 miles distant in ten hours. Thus the rebel army, moving from Camp Dick Robinson in two columns, would clear its camp in six hours and a half, and arrive at Lancaster, 10 miles distant, in ten hours; or, if it continued on without stopping, would arrive at Crab Orchard, 20 miles distant, in fourteen hours.

It appears that the retreating army actually marched in three columns from its camp at Dick Robinson, the country along its route being open and practicable. From Lancaster it took two roads, the one to the left going by the way of Lowell and coming into the Cumberland Gap road at Big Hill, and the other going through Crab Orchard, Mount Vernon, and London. The latter is intersected at Crab Orchard, 20 miles from Danville, by the road from Danville through Stanford. The reasons which would render it injudicious to expose my communications and leave open a better line of retreat to the enemy, by anticipating his possible retreat through Lancaster, apply with greater force to Crab Orchard. If the rebel army would retreat without accepting battle, the topography of the country made it entirely possible for it to do so. Being once established on its line of retreat beyond any point where it could by any possibility be intercepted the rebel army made good its retreat, as other armies have done in this and other wars under less favorable circumstances.

There are few circumstances under which a disciplined and well-managed army can be forced to a general battle against its will, though the occasions are multiplied if the opposing army has a greatly superior force of good cavalry or is so greatly superior in strength that it can divide its force with reasonable prospects of success to each fraction. A disciplined army, moving on its line of communication, can always retreat more rapidly than it can be pursued. It meets or overtakes its supplies on the road, or finds them at temporary depots previously established, or it collects them from the country as much as possible on its line of march. The pursuing army, on the other hand, finds the country stripped; it has nothing in advance to rely on; it must carry everything along, with the hinderance of enormous trains, and the difficulties are increased with every day's march. The retreating army prepares a front of resistance more rapidly than the pursuer can prepare a front for attack. The strong positions are reconnoitered in advance, on which the requisite force forms as rapidly as on a drill ground; while the pursuer, ignorant of the ground and of the force that awaits him, must inform himself of both in order to develop a corresponding force, or else find the head of his column beaten back. In the mean time the main body of the retiring army has gained some hours' march; the rear guard watches the enemy's preparation, awaits his attack, and repulses it if it is made injudiciously or with insufficient force, or else at dark resumes its march, to repeat the same operation whenever it is necessary and the occasion is favorable. A single tree felled judiciously across the road will delay the pursuer perhaps fifteen minutes, four of them at intervals will delay him an hour, and thus the distance between him and his adversary is increased.

These advantages to defensive operations do not exist in the same degree in all descriptions of country. They are particularly marked in a broken and wooded country, where the movements and position and strength of an enemy are only to be ascertained by feeling him, and especially where there are no parallel roads by which the retreating army can be attacked in flank. The advantages alluded to make it wise frequently for a commander to fall back to a chosen ground when his adversary advances, and the battle of Perryville affords an illustration of this principle. The rebel army was moving for concentration at some point which could not be known to its adversary. A portion of it took advantage of the strong position at Perryville, commanding the only water within a distance of several miles, over which the Army of the Ohio must march to attack. That position afforded also the advantage of several lines of retreat. With these combined advantages, when it was discovered that a part of the rebel army was making a stand, it was as reasonable to expect to find its combined force there as at any other point, and dispositions had to be made accordingly. I believe that a sound and unprejudiced criticism will show that the movement of the Army of the Ohio was executed promptly and judiciously; that it arrived more simultaneously and in better order than the enemy could have expected, considering that the point which he would choose for battle could not be foreseen; and that but for the lack of timely information of the condition of things on the afternoon of the 8th the main portion of the enemy's force at Perryville would have been captured.

Contests between unequal forces result sometimes, but very rarely, from the fact that the inferior has no alternative but to fight or surrender. In by far the greatest number of cases, however, the conflict results from a lack of ability on the part of the inferior to avail himself of the means of extricating his army; or from a contempt for or ignorance of the strength of his adversary; or from an advantage of position which in his opinion will outweigh that of superiority of numbers and a corresponding ignorance of that advantage or faulty dispositions on the part of the superior army; and these last are the cases in which most frequently the inferior army is victorious. When the armies are about equal, they maneuver so as to deceive and cause each other to make detachments or force each other to battle on ground unfavorable to the adversary. In all these cases the object is not merely to give battle for the sake of fighting, but to fight for victory, or at least safety, and with such advantages as will make success reasonably certain; and the more serious the consequences of defeat the greater the caution to be observed. Ignorance and error multiply battles far more than valor and generally with the penalty of disaster. If precaution and the observance of rule diminish the number of battles, and sometimes miss the accidental success which folly and recklessness might have gained, it is nevertheless true that in the end they usually triumph.

The operations of the column under the command of General G. W. Morgan at Cumberland Gap have been brought before the Commission. The deposition of Colonel De Courcy, an officer under General Morgan's command, introduced as evidence for the Government, alleges that after General Morgan commenced his advance upon Cumberland Gap in May last he was suddenly arrested by a telegraphic dispatch from me, ordering a retrograde movement and stopping all further proceedings on the Tennessee side against the Gap.

General Morgan commenced his advance against Cumberland Gap in pursuance of the orders which I gave him in March preceding about the 22d of May. He had repeatedly represented that he was operating against a superior force of the enemy, and on the 8th of June he telegraphed that the enemy had—

Over 5,000 at Cumberland Gap, 8,000 at Big Creek Gap, with troops at Clinton and Knoxville. Should their force concentrate the enemy will outnumber us nearly three to one. What is General Negley doing?

Seeing no reason why I should expect him to advance by difficult mountain roads and defeat three to one of the enemy, and supposing that he may have regarded my orders for him to advance as more imperative than I meant them to be, without regard to the force opposed to him, I telegraphed him on the 9th as follows:

General Negley is fully employed in Tennessee and can give you no direct assistance. The force now in Tennessee is so small that no operations against East Tennessee can be attempted. You must therefore depend mainly on your own resources.

And on the 10th I telegraphed him as follows:

Considering your force and that opposed to you, it will probably not be safe for you to undertake any extended operations. Other operations will soon have an influence on your designs, and it is therefore better for you to run no risk at present.

These are the dispatches which caused the retrograde movement referred to. I leave them to speak for themselves, in connection with the dispatches which elicited them.

But, furthermore, on the same day, the 10th, I received a dispatch from General Morgan, giving a rumor that the Gap was evacuated, to which I replied the same day:

If Cumberland Gap is evacuated you should seize and hold it, and take any other advantage that may present itself, but not advance to a point from which you would have to fall back.

About this time General Mitchel, considering himself in danger from an anticipated advance upon him, was urging the necessity of a stronger force in Middle Tennessee and I was about commencing my march from Corinth in that direction.

Cumberland Gap was occupied on the 18th of June. General Morgan had about 7,500 men. His dispatches report the strength of the enemy opposed to him at not less than 10,000 or 12,000, and I have no reason to doubt that he reported correctly. At no time did he represent that he was able to hold East Tennessee with the force he had or the wish to attempt it, nor do I believe that he could have done it. It is true that on the 20th he telegraphed:

My telegraph orders from Major-General Buell of the 10th instant do not permit me to advance upon Knoxville, and I will not, until further instructions, advance farther than Tazewell.

And he also stated the preparation he had made to destroy bridges, but had countermanded in consequence of that dispatch. He was answered on the 22d, four days after his arrival at the Gap, as follows:

It is impossible at present to send you any cavalry. The general has not intended his orders to prevent such expeditions for special purposes as you refer to in your dispatch of the 20th; on the contrary, he approves them. His wish is for you to make yourself secure in the Gap and accomplish all the results you can by rapid expeditions, but not to attempt a deliberate advance on Knoxville as long as it seems probable that you would not be able to maintain your position there. The general wishes to make no actual advance which he cannot maintain. It brings our friends among the people into trouble and is injurious otherwise to our interests.

JAMES B. FRY,
Chief of Staff.

I have no doubt that General Morgan acted wisely, and that he had not force enough to attack the enemy in force. He certainly was not restrained from doing anything that duty and honor demanded.

The policy which I observed toward the people of the territory occupied by my army has been vehemently and bitterly assailed by a portion of the press, but I believe that reason and justice will sustain it on every score, whether of expediency or humanity. In entering on my command it was with an earnest willingness to devote my life to the object of restoring the Union, and I never doubted as to the course my duty required me to pursue. It was to defeat the rebels in arms whenever I could and to respect the Constitution and laws and the rights of the people under them as far as was possible consistently with a state of things which rendered military success a matter of primary importance for the restoration of the authority of the Government. This has been my rule of action from first to last. I did not undertake to punish men for opinion's sake or even for past acts, for Congress has prescribed the penalty for their offenses and the mode of proceeding against them. Men in arms I treated as enemies; persons not in arms I treated as citizens of the United States; but I allowed no man to preach or act treason after the progress of my army had brought him again under the protection as well as the authority of the Government.

I have, when necessary, given protection to the persons and property of peaceable citizens; and this I have done both to preserve the discipline of my troops and out of respect for the just rights of the people under the laws of war, if not under the civil law. When the public interest has required the use of private property for public purposes I have so used it, allowing just compensation for it as far as practicable; and this I did not only on the ground of justice, but as a measure of military expediency, for it enabled me to secure for my army necessities which otherwise would have been concealed or destroyed.

The bearing of this question on the success of my military operations is something which I was bound to weigh well. It is recognized as one of great importance to the success of an invading army. Wars of invasion, always difficult, become tenfold so when the people of the invaded territory take an active part against the invading army. A system of plunder and outrage in such cases will produce the same effect of hatred and revenge that such treatment does under other circumstances among men, and the embarrassments resulting from them to the invading army become of the most serious nature.

These considerations are of such importance to success that there is no exception to the rule of securing the neutrality if not the friendship of the population as much as possible by just and mild treatment, and then, having given no good cause for hostility, to treat with kindness those who behave well and with severity those who misbehave.

Some months ago a statement appeared in the newspapers, on the reported authority of Gov. Andrew Johnson, that I had only been prevented by his resolute exhortations from abandoning Nashville when I moved north with my army in September last. He has since made the same assertion in a deposition. Whenever I have spoken on this subject I have denounced the statement as false and I now repeat that denunciation. I am very willing to bear the responsibility of my own acts or intentions, and it gives me sincere pleasure at all times to acknowledge any assistance I may receive from others either in counsel or action. If I had determined to abandon Nashville it would have been upon my best judgment, and I should cheerfully have submitted to a verdict on the wisdom of my course. I assert that I never intimated to Governor Johnson an intention or wish to leave Nashville without a garrison; that there was no discussion between us pro and con on the subject, and that the determination to hold the place was my own, uninfluenced by him in any manner. I had not that confidence in his judgment or that distrust of my own which would have induced me to seek his counsel. On account of his official position I called on him first to inform him what I meant to do, and last to tell him what garrison I had concluded to leave. On both occasions, as far as my plans were concerned, I was the speaker and he the listener. My officers were far more likely to know my views than he, and they have stated that I said always that the political importance of the occupation far outweighed any purely military bearing of the question, and that I should hold the city.*

BALTIMORE, MD., April 10, 1864.

General LORENZO THOMAS,
Adjutant-General U. S. Army:

SIR: I have heard that the Secretary of War intends to publish in general orders the result of the investigation of my military operations in Kentucky and Tennessee during the summer of 1862 by the Military Commission organized by Major-General Halleck. Supposing that the pressure of official business may thus far have prevented the Secretary from making a careful examination of the record, which is very voluminous, and believing that such an examination will essentially modify the effect of the manner in which the Commission has stated facts and refute many of its opinions, my object is to ask attention to some of the features of the report and to request that its publication may be accompanied by the official decision of the Department.

The report premises by saying that "very early in its sessions the Commission resolved to direct its investigations to the following points," and it specifies six "points." It would appear from this as though the first steps in the inquiry had developed ground for these six grave questions; the truth is that they had been submitted in the instructions under which the Commission acted. I do not consider this discrepancy unimportant.

The report then takes up in their order the several subjects referred to; the first, however, "The operations of General Buell in Kentucky and Tennessee," being disposed of as being included in the other five.

"SUFFERING KENTUCKY TO BE INVADED BY THE REBELS UNDER BRAGG."

But few facts are given on this subject, and those are vague and indefinite. What is meant by saying that my lines of supplies were "unnecessarily long"? It is true that I was more than 300 miles from my base, the Ohio River, with only a thread of railroad for communication; but how could the line be said to be unnecessarily long when it was impossible to make it shorter. On the more material points the report is silent. Nothing is said of the strength of the enemy, nor of some of the most important of his movements, nor of the strength of my army, nor of the state of my supplies; but the Commission contents itself with expressing the belief that—

By an early concentration of my army at Sparta, McMinnville, or Murfreesborough, with a view to active offensive operations against Bragg the moment he debouched from the Sequatchie Valley, he would have been defeated.

Subsequent events have confirmed what the evidence abundantly shows, that the force under my command was inadequate for the mission it had undertaken. The statement in which I reviewed the evidence before the Commission presents this subject more circumstantially and I extract from it here. After explaining the embarrassment under which I had labored in consequence of the enemy's large cavalry force operating on my communications the statement continues: *

I am conscious of having carried my statement into tedious details out of much anxiety to explain my acts and the reasons that dictated them. I will not extend it to show why it was that although the concentration of my army at Murfreesborough was necessary in consequence of the state of my supplies, and although it was suitable to meet any direct advance against Nashville, yet it was no longer suitable after it became probable, though uncertain, that Bragg, instead of moving directly on Nashville, was moving toward, in fact was probably already at, the Cumberland River by the time my army was concentrated. As it was, my movement from Murfreesborough to Nashville did not "allow Bragg to cross the Cumberland," which he had already nearly reached, but it enabled me the easier to take measures against his subsequent movements.

Undoubtedly a much earlier concentration of my army at Murfreesborough would have had certain advantages. It would have enabled me to re-establish my communications and made them much shorter, but I have explained that I hoped until the last that they would be reopened by the troops in Kentucky, and that I was unwilling to abandon the object with which I had started out and give up the advanced positions I occupied.

*General Buell here quotes from "the railroad from Nashville to Stevenson," &c., p. 35, to "should have rejected it," on p. 45.

"THE FAILURE TO RELIEVE MUNFORDVILLE."

The Commission is of opinion that General Buell is not responsible for the capture of the town, except so far as his failure to attack Bragg south of the Cumberland River made him responsible for that failure.

This implies that Bragg could have been and should have been attacked south of the Cumberland. I have discussed that point in the preceding pages of this communication.

"BATTLE OF PERRYVILLE AND CONDUCT THERE."

The facts under this head are imperfectly and inaccurately stated, and the opinions, to my mind, show a misconception of the subject. The strength, positions, and to a great extent the movements of the opposing armies, with many other facts essential for a proper understanding of the subject, are omitted.

The rebel forces occupied a line extending from Lexington to Bardstown, Kirby Smith's force being on the right and Bragg's army proper on the left. It was to be presumed that those forces would concentrate when I moved against them, and it was "intended" to attack them whenever they could be properly brought to battle. It cannot be said that "an engagement was expected at Bardstown," though it was thought to be possible. The statement that "I next intended to attack him (Bragg) on the 9th of October" conveys no correct explanation of my plans and movements. The evidence shows that after reaching Perryville, where the enemy appeared to have concentrated, my instructions, given on the night of the 7th, contemplated an attack on his position on the morning of the 8th. That purpose was frustrated by the lateness of the arrival of the right and left corps, and it was deemed necessary to defer the attack until the next morning. The evidence is not that McCook's corps arrived at 9 o'clock on the 8th; the head of it arrived between 10 and 11. The evidence shows that General Thomas' staff officer about 1.30 o'clock reported the arrival of the head of the right corps; the rear division of it was not yet up. The staff officer took back to General Thomas more detailed instructions in regard to the disposition of that corps.

The camp of my headquarters was located the evening of the 7th at a proper distance in rear of the center corps, the disposition of which I personally directed, and it was not necessary or convenient to change my camp. The signal station for headquarters was somewhat in advance, on a high elevation, commanding a more extended view of the ground than any other.

The assertion that I—should either have been on the field in person ready for emergencies and advantages, or have taken and required to be taken every precaution for the instant transmission of intelligence to my headquarters—and that—as I had an organized signal corps with my army, this failure was all the more culpable—discloses a want of knowledge on the part of the commission of what was necessary to be done and misrepresentation of what was actually done. Had I considered my presence along the lines necessary I might as properly have been required on the right as on the left, in which case I should have been 5 miles from the left instead of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The evidence shows that the signal corps was in operation, and that signal stations had been established to communicate intelligence from different parts of the line to my headquarters. What further precautions could be required except the presence of commanders, whose duty to communicate with me was as well understood as though it had been prescribed in their commissions?

The evidence shows that Gilbert's corps was not "unengaged." It lost nearly 1,000 men that day, which proves that the "whole force of the enemy" was not "flung upon McCook." It is not a very ingenuous representation of the matter to assert what could have been accomplished "if Crittenden's corps had been vigorously pushed forward," when all mention of the fact is omitted that orders to that effect were given as soon as I was advised of the attack on McCook and that they could not be executed because of the lateness of the hour.

"PERMITTING THE REBELS TO ESCAPE WITHOUT LOSS FROM KENTUCKY."

The same misconception and errors of statement run through the report of the Commission under this head as under the preceding one. It is right in one admission, that—it cannot be said that the rebels escaped without loss from Kentucky.

The evidence does not justify the statement in any proper sense that—the morning after the battle it was very early discovered that Bragg had retreated from the position near Perryville.

On the contrary, the fact was not ascertained until about 10.30 o'clock, between which time and the early morning my army was moving to attack; the opinion being general that the enemy would be found near Perryville and the battle renewed that morning. The evidence shows this conclusively, though it also shows that some of the most advanced troops discovered very early that the portion of the enemy which they could see was moving from the position which it held the previous night; but even that did not come to the knowledge of the corps commanders nor to my knowledge. There is no evidence to justify the broad statement nor is it substantially true that Bragg—left all his sick and wounded and some artillery at Harrodsburg, and being joined by Kirby Smith, hastened across Dick's River—

from Perryville to the river was confused and disordered.

Still less is it proven or true that any portion of the statement was known by me or by my army at the time. On the contrary, it is shown that the advance of my cavalry toward Harrodsburg on the 9th was effectually resisted, and that on the morning of the 10th Kirby Smith's forces, and probably a large portion of Bragg's army proper, were actually in line of battle 2 miles south of the town. This fact justified the presumption that his whole force was there, and I have now no doubt that the whole of it would have been there in case of battle.

I have never called my movement to Harrodsburg nor from there to Danville "a pursuit." I meant and have described it as a movement to find and give battle to the rebel army. The pursuit I have described as commencing at Danville on the 13th, when the retreat from Camp Dick Robinson was first discovered.

The comments of the Commission on the retreat of the enemy would seem to indicate ignorance of the topography of the country and of the facts concerning the retreat. There is ground in the evidence for the belief that Bragg's retreat was decided upon on the 12th of October in opposition to the views of a majority of his commanders and the sentiment of his army. There is a mass of facts in evidence and of public notoriety to show that his determination to avoid battle and retire from the State was suddenly adopted. The failure of the Commission to give place to this material fact has the effect of giving a wrong impression as to the dispositions the circumstances required me to make. The subject is treated as though Bragg's army was a disorganized rabble, which it was only necessary to surround with a line of skirmishers to capture. The evidence does not—establish that General Buell received information on the night of the 11th that Bragg had crossed the river at Camp Dick Robinson—nor that "he made no determined movement with the main body of his army until the night of the 13th." The statement that from the morning of the 9th until the night of the 11th I waited to learn whether my enemy would cross the river is unfit to appear in an official report; and the further statement that, that fact being definitely known, I lost two days before taking any decisive action, is contrary to the evidence, as is also the statement that finally, on the night of the 13th, I started Crittenden's corps through Danville—for it was there already. This statement, taken in connection with other remarks, would convey the false impression that that corps, in fact the main body of my army, was still at Perryville.

It is thus that the Commission explains "the escape of the rebels from Kentucky."

In the review which I prepared of the evidence taken by the Commission I made a different statement and explanation of the incidents of that campaign. I hope it is a more intelligent one. I know it is more in accordance with the facts, and it may not be inappropriate to insert it here. After describing the operations about Munfordville and the close movement after Bragg's army until it turned off toward Bardstown the statement proceeds:*

* * * * *

The Commission states that it made its sixth "point" to cover the question of my "loyalty." I certainly made no defense of my loyalty, nor did I know that it was under investigation, though I did not fail to observe that evidence was elicited of the scandalous remarks that had been made concerning it by some persons, one of them a member of the Commission. I shall not cavil at the brief announcement that against my loyalty "there is no evidence worthy consideration."

My policy toward "the inhabitants of disaffected districts" was also brought under the sixth "point," and the Commission concludes that—

Whether good or bad in its effects, General Buell deserves neither blame nor applause for it, because it was at that time supposed to be the policy of the Government. At least he could violate no orders upon the subject, because there were none.

I am not disposed to take exception to this opinion, though I dissent from it. If an officer faithfully does what the policy of his Government makes a duty, in my opinion he deserves approbation; and if, without any such obligation, he elects to do what he is at liberty to do or omit, then he deserves approbation or blame accordingly as his acts are good or bad in their effects. It might, I think, very properly be asked why the Commission introduced the subject at all.

I will not use this occasion, though I cannot think that it would be inappropriate, to comment on the irregularities which marked the proceedings of the Commission and the spirit manifested by a portion of its members. Just and thinking men will hesitate to declare in a judicial verdict, with reference to the conduct of operations of such magnitude, more particularly when an important result has been obtained, that the commander ought to have acted differently: First, because, under circumstances which make it frequently impossible to know exactly the true state of affairs, he must act on appearances and probabilities more than on positive knowledge; and, second, because it is seldom possible to say what would have been the consequences of a different action. In this case no such hesitation is apparent.

For want of time I was not able to present my review of the evidence until the Commission had prepared their report and adjourned. How far that review might have modified the report if it had been before them it is impossible for me to say.

I submit these remarks with the confident belief that the justice of the Secretary will see ample ground for them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General.

GENERAL ORDERS, } HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO,
No. 29a. } In Camp, Huntsville, Ala., July 11, 1862.

The general commanding the Army of the Ohio takes pleasure in announcing the success of an arduous and hazardous campaign by the Seventh Division, Brig. Gen. G. W. Morgan commanding, by which the enemy's fortified position at Cumberland Gap was turned and his force compelled to retreat as our troops advanced to attack.

The general thanks Brigadier-General Morgan and the troops of the Seventh Division for the ability displayed in the operations against this important stronghold, and for the energy, fortitude, and cheerfulness which they exhibited in their struggle with difficulties of the most formidable magnitude for an army.

By command of Major-General Buell:

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

GENERAL ORDERS, } WAR DEPT., ADJT. GEN.'S OFFICE,
No. 45. } Washington, June 14, 1872.

The following act of Congress is published for the information and government of all concerned:

AN ACT to provide for the restoration of the records of the proceedings of the court of inquiry concerning the operations of the army under the command of General Don Carlos Buell, in Kentucky and Tennessee.

Whereas it appears in the matter of investigation made by the court of inquiry, in the years eighteen hundred and sixty-two and eighteen hundred and sixty-three, into the operations of the army under the command of General Don Carlos Buell, in Kentucky and Tennessee, that the records of the proceedings of said court are not to be found on the proper files in the War Department; and whereas it further appears that there is now in the possession of Benn Pitman, the phonographic reporter of said court, a full and complete report of the proceedings of said court of inquiry: Therefore, Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be directed to employ at once Benn Pitman, the reporter for the court of inquiry in the said matter, to make a full and complete transcript of the phonographic notes taken by him during the said investigation, and to put the same on file among the records of the War Department, and to furnish a copy of the same to Congress.

Approved June 5, 1872.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

AIRDREE, KY., February 12, 1873.

Hon. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: Among the papers sent to the Military Committee from the War Department on the 13th of April last, in answer to the call of the House for the record of "The Buell Commission," as it is sometimes called, is one which comes to my knowledge in that way for the first time, and is described as "an unsigned communication, reviewing the proceedings of the Commission," &c.* The paper is, in fact, without date, address, or signature, but bears the following indorsement:

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
May 23, 1863.

Respectfully referred to the Secretary of War by request of Lieutenant-Colonel Piatt.

J. HOLT,
Judge-Advocate-General.

On the last day of the open session of the Military Commission the President inquired, "Does the judge-advocate propose to submit any paper?" To which the judge-advocate (Lieutenant-Colonel Piatt) replied:

From the nature of the Commission, or Board of Officers, as I understand it, called to investigate the operations of the Army of the Ohio, I am not required to sum up the evidence. Indeed so voluminous is the evidence that it would not be possible to do so within any reasonable time. Most of the questions under consideration are matters of opinion, and as military men the Board is better able to treat of them than I am. There is very little conflict of testimony coming within my peculiar province, and I therefore ask to be excused.

It is not necessary to remark here that by the rules governing the proceedings of military tribunals, as well as upon general principles of law, any argument of the case by the judge-advocate before the Commission should have been submitted in the hearing of the accused and the latter would have been entitled to answer. The paper referred to did not follow that rule. Indeed it seems only to have made its appearance after the Commission had concluded its labors and while its voluminous record awaited the action of the reviewing authority.

I do not ascribe this circumstance to a preconcerted plan; on the contrary, I believe that such a course had not entered the thoughts of the judge-advocate, and that, however suggested, the execution was the offspring of the moment. To my mind, nevertheless, the proceeding has the character of a surreptitious attempt to warp the ordinary course of justice and is deserving of rebuke. It is for this reason mainly that I make this mention of it.

It is not my purpose to comment on the paper itself. I will not correct its representation of facts nor weigh its criticisms, though they are for the most part in conflict with themselves and with my review of the subject. Its most prominent feature is an effort to sustain a statement made by Gov. Andrew Johnson, which I had denounced, to the effect that I was prevented by his expostulations from abandoning Nashville in the fall of 1862. I shall leave that question where the evidence places it, without going into further personal statements.

I request that you will be good enough to let this communication accompany the records of the Commission, and I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. C. BUELL.

TRANSCRIPT FROM PHONOGRAPHIC NOTES OF THE BUELL COURT OF INQUIRY.

CINCINNATI, December 1, 1862.

Col. W. H. LYTLE (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What is your position in the service of the United States, colonel?

I have been in the three-months' service, but was commissioned in the three-years' service on or about June 6, 1861.

Question. Will you state to the court what part of that time you were in service under command of Major-General Buell in Tennessee and Kentucky?

I reported for duty in the Department of the Ohio on or about January 2, 1862.

Question. You will please state to the court what you know of the operations of General Buell at the time of the invasion of the State of Kentucky by General Bragg.

I can only give the movements of that portion of the army with which I was connected. On the 31st of August, 1862, I was in command at Huntsville, Ala., and under orders from General Buell conducted on that day the evacuation of the town. My orders were to make Shelbyville inside of four days. I made the march inside of two days and a half. I camped 4 miles from Nashville on the evening of September 5, having halted nearly a day at Murfreesborough for orders. From thence we marched to Perryville via Louisville.

Question. During that time what division were you attached to?

I commanded the Seventeenth Brigade of General Rosecrans' division.

Question. State to the Commission what you know of General Bragg's position during the march of the rebels.

I was not specially informed as to his movements, my attention being directed generally to my own command. I had the general idea that Bragg was marching in a direction parallel, or nearly so, to that of our own army.

Question. Could you point out the parallel movement of General Bragg?

I am not able to do so; I had no opportunity at the time to observe.

Question. Do you know anything, colonel, about the surrender and failure at Munfordville?

I know nothing of it; I know only of the movements of my own command.

Question. You know of the surrender of that place?

Yes, sir.

Question. Can you state to the Commission as to the probability of its being relieved?

I do not know; I do not recollect the date of the surrender of Munfordville. My command reached Bowling Green September 11. We halted there several days, and did not arrive at Munfordville until after its surrender.

Question. What was the cause of your delay at Bowling Green?

I do not know.

Question. Do you recollect how many days you were there?

My impression is we were there three or four days. Of course I have no opportunity now to refer to any official document, but my recollection is that we were there three or four days.

Question. I understand you to say that Munfordville was surrendered before you arrived there?

The town, I think, was surrendered either during our halt at Bowling Green or during our march thence to Munfordville. The march from Bowling Green to Munfordville consumed (including the halt at Horse Well) six or seven days. We were at Horse Well about two days.

Question. What was the cause of the slow march you made between Bowling Green and Munfordville?

I do not know.

Question. Could you produce any reason for your delay?

At Horse Well we were drawn up in line of battle, fronting toward Munfordville.

Question. Had you any evidence of a large force in the neighborhood at the time?

I saw none. There was more or less skirmishing reported during our halt there. As general officer of the day I rode to the extreme outposts; the enemy's pickets could be seen.

Question. What position had General McCook's corps in the army?

It had at that time, I think, the advance on that road. My impression is that it was the first to arrive in Louisville.

Question. You stated that you do not know the reason of the delay at Bowling Green or why the march was so slow from Bowling Green to Munfordville.

I do not know.

Question. What was the rate of marching previous to arriving in Bowling Green?

I made rapid marches to Nashville with the command left at Huntsville. The march thence to Bowling Green, as was also the march from Munfordville to Louisville, was as rapid as possible.

Question. Were you engaged at the battle of Perryville?

I was.

Question. Will you state, as near as you can, the circumstances of the affair?

CINCINNATI, December 2, 1862.

Col. W. H. LYTLE'S examination continued.

(Map produced by the judge-advocate, that the movements and positions of the Union and rebel armies might be pointed out by the witness.)

The witness then proceeded and said:

Our column (McCook's army corps) moved by the way of Taylorsville, Fairfield, Bloomfield, and Chaplin, encamping the night before the fight at Mackville. There were but two divisions of the army corps at that point—Rousseau's and Jackson's. The Third Division (Sill's) was not with us. My original orders at Mackville were to move at 6 a. m. Before daylight, however, I received orders to move immediately. My own command was in motion in twenty minutes. I had no tents. My brigade had the right of Rousseau's division, which had the advance of the corps.

We arrived on the field of battle about 10.30 a. m., to the best of my recollection. As we reached the ground I saw a column of our troops on the Springfield road, which I ascertained subsequently was a portion of Gilbert's corps. [Witness points out Springfield road on map.]

Having been directed by General Rousseau to place a good skirmishing regiment in advance, the Tenth Ohio occupied that position, and on our arrival on the field was at once deployed as skirmishers.

General Rousseau's original line of battle was considerably in the rear of the line he actually occupied during the fight. Our march had been accelerated when we heard cannonading.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Where was that cannonading?

I do not know exactly; think it was from a battery on the right of my position during the fight. General Rousseau's original line was nearly at right angles with the road, his right resting near Russell's house.

I will remark here that my recollection of the topography of the field may not be accurate, as I saw it only during the fight and afterwards from an ambulance on my return from the enemy's lines.

On our arrival on the field at 10.30 a. m. a section or more of artillery was thrown forward and opened fire. No response having been elicited, General Rousseau directed me to move with my brigade toward Perryville. At this time the Tenth Ohio Infantry, thrown forward as skirmishers, had not returned, though I had sent a staff officer and several orderlies to recall it. My orders being imperative, however, to march, I sent an order to Lieutenant-Colonel Burke, commanding, to fall in in the rear of my brigade, and directed Colonel Beatty, with his regiment (Third Ohio Infantry), to take the advance.

Question. How far was your right from the next corps on your right?

I saw no line of battle on my right at all. My own command was composed of the Third and Tenth Ohio Infantry, Fifteenth Kentucky Infantry, Forty-second and Eighty-eighth Indiana Infantry, and Loomis' battery.

In compliance with orders about 12 o'clock I resumed the march, the Third Ohio having the right. The impression at this time seemed to be that the enemy had retired. My column was in motion, as directed, when my attention was directed to a scattering fire on the left of the road. It immediately struck me that it proceeded from the skirmishers of the Tenth Ohio, which, as I have said, had not yet reported. Riding up to the eminence where our artillery had been posted in the morning, commanding a ravine, an officer of my staff approached me and said he discovered the enemy on the opposite side of the ravine. With my glass I saw heavy masses of rebels apparently deploying into line of battle. The morning was bright and clear. General Rousseau directed me to form line of battle immediately. My column, then in motion and descending the hill into the ravine, was marched by the right-about, and the order was complied with. Cannot state the precise distance from the enemy.

My brigade had the right of Rousseau's division in line of battle. Harris' brigade was on my left. Jackson was on the left of Rousseau. We had then an artillery duel, which lasted perhaps two hours.

Question. Could you see the enemy's line at the time from that eminence?

They were screened by the timber. In the ravine which separated us from the enemy was the rocky bed of a creek. The men had suffered much from thirst. One of my regiments (the Forty-second Indiana) had been ordered to the ravine in the morning by General Rousseau to supply the men with water, but there was little or none there.

After the fire of the artillery had been prolonged some time Captain Loomis reported that his long-range ammunition was nearly expended. I accompanied him and reported to General Rousseau. The general and Loomis rode off together, as I supposed either to have Loomis' ammunition replenished or another battery sent forward to take its place. I returned immediately to the front.

Question. During this time did you receive any orders from any other officer? Had General Rousseau received any orders from General McCook from 12 to 2 o'clock?

I received no orders during that time from any other officer. As to whether General Rousseau received any orders from General McCook or not during the time mentioned I cannot state. The position of my regiments was reported to General Rousseau when the fight opened, and my general instructions were to hold my ground there as long as practicable, and in case it became impracticable to hold it to retire in good order. Shortly after my return to the front I saw Loomis' battery being retired. I dispatched a staff officer or orderly to inquire whether, my artillery being withdrawn, the general desired any change in the position of my line. To this message I got no answer, nor can I say whether or not it ever reached the general. Shortly after 2 o'clock p. m. the fire of the rebel artillery slackened and his infantry advanced. The Third Ohio was immediately ordered from the slight depression of ground that partially screened it from the artillery fire to the crest of the hill. The Fifteenth Kentucky was ordered to support it. The Tenth Ohio was on the left of the Third Ohio, from which I had not felt at liberty to withdraw it. The Eighty-eighth Indiana was held in reserve.

We held our position for two hours or more after Loomis was retired, and finally, being without our battery and exposed to a severe fire of artillery as well as that of an infantry force greatly superior in number, the brigade fell back in good order and reformed, as I am informed, in the neighborhood of the original line selected in the morning near Russell's house.

Question. Did it appear from the sound of the cannon that the enemy was on the left?

The rattle of small-arms was so deafening that it would have been hard to tell. I could see only two regiments on my left, such was the conformation of the ground. While the fight was progressing I became satisfied, between 2 and 3 o'clock, that we were outnumbered.

My battery had been withdrawn, and the brigade was exposed not only to a severe fire from the enemy's infantry posted in the ravine, but from a heavy fire of his artillery, which swept the crest of the ridge. I accordingly sent back a staff officer for re-enforcements. He returned with the message that I should hold the position as long as I could, and if it became impracticable, should retire; that Jackson was very hard pressed, and no re-enforcements could be spared. Between 3 and 4 p. m. I renewed my application for re-enforcements, but to this second application received no response.

Meanwhile my whole line, after a most obstinate and resolute struggle and severe loss, had been retired, with the exception of one regiment, the Tenth Ohio.

Question. How many rounds of ammunition had you?

Forty rounds. The ammunition train was, I think, in the woods near the Russell house, though of this I am not certain. Our line was so suddenly formed that I had no time to ascertain its location. I had finally sent back for the Eighty-eighth Indiana, being determined to hold our position if possible until re-enforcements came up. I could not believe but what they would finally arrive from some other corps, having seen the column on the Springfield road in the morning. Before the Eighty-eighth got up, however, the Tenth was nearly enveloped by the enemy and was obliged to fall back. A most destructive fire was poured on the regiment's front and from the flanks, and while endeavoring to cover its movement to the rear with skirmishers I was wounded and captured. These are the material points that came under my observation up to the time that I was taken prisoner.

It is my impression that after Harris was obliged to retire for want of ammunition the attack of eight or ten regiments of the enemy was concentrated on my brigade, or rather on the three regiments—the Third Ohio, Fifteenth Kentucky, and Tenth Ohio—which were the last to retire.

Question. Did you know the headquarters of General Buell?

I did not. I saw General McCook and General Rousseau. After the battle began General Rousseau's attention, as I gathered from his official report, was mainly directed to the left of the line. My loss was very heavy. The orders to the brigade were executed to the letter as I understood them. I am informed the loss of the brigade was between 700 and 800 killed and wounded. Have not yet seen official report.

Question. How far to the right was the army?

General Gilbert's corps, on the Springfield road, could be readily seen with the naked eye. I do not think the Springfield road was more than a mile from my position. There was a battery on my right, on a wooded eminence, probably a quarter of a mile distant, but there was no infantry between my right and the battery.

Question. Which way was the wind blowing?

I remember that when a barn near the right of the Third Ohio was fired by the enemy's shells the whole line was almost enveloped in smoke. The wind must have been, I think, a southerly wind; it blew from right to left of my line.

Question. Was it known that the enemy was in force at Perryville?

That I do not know. I remember meeting General McCook in the morning, and that the General remarked there would be fun before night or some remark to that effect.

Question. With the exception of Gilbert's column were you not aware of the positions of the other corps?

I was not.

Question. You had no knowledge of the force of the enemy?

Nothing definite.

Question. When you were taken prisoner could you form any estimate of the numbers of the enemy?

I could not.

Question. Did you know their line of retreat, what roads they went by, where their force lay, and where they arrived that night?

I have some delicacy in testifying to these points under the terms of my parole. I can state that I was very much surprised that we were not re-enforced that day, and also that no advance was made the next morning.

Question. What reason can you give that prevents you answering these questions?

My impression is that there is a provision in the terms of the parole "that I shall not reveal anything that I might have discovered within the line of the enemy." I therefore decline to testify on these points.

Question. How many days were you in the hands of the enemy?

The battle was fought on Wednesday, the first week of October. I was paroled the next day, and returned to our lines on Friday night and immediately reported at General Buell's headquarters.

Question. Where were General Buell's headquarters?

They were on the Harrodsburg pike, beyond the position we occupied, near the road. When I returned I was in a buggy; I returned by way of Danville.

Question. Where were you at the time you received your parole?

I was at Harrodsburg.

Question. For how long were the men provided with provisions?

They had provisions for three days.

Question. During the battle the men threw away their haversacks, sometimes their knapsacks. Had you noticed anything of the kind in your corps?

I did not observe that they did so; I noticed that they were very cool.

Question. When you were at headquarters did you see Gen. Bragg?

I was not at the headquarters of the enemy.

Here the court desired the witness to produce the parole, to which the witness assented.

The day following the colonel produced the parole.

HDQRS. ARMY OF THE MISS., Harrodsburg, Oct. 9, 1862.

I, Wm. H. Lytle, Army of the United States, having been taken prisoner by the Confederate States Army and this day paroled, whereof this is witness, do swear that I will not bear arms against the Confederate States, nor will I in any way aid or abet its enemies, until I am regularly exchanged, under the penalty of death; nor will I disclose anything that I have seen or heard in said Confederate States Army to its prejudice.

WM. H. LYTLE,
Colonel, Commanding Seventeenth Brigade, Third Division.

Sworn to and subscribed before me October 9, 1862.

SAM'L K. HAYS,
Major, C. S. Army.

The Commission adjourned to meet December 4, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, December 4, 1862—10 a. m.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. On leaving Huntsville did you receive orders to proceed directly to Nashville?

I did not. I received orders to proceed to Murfreesborough by way of Fayetteville and Shelbyville, my orders being to reach in four days.

Question. When did your division leave Nashville on the march toward Kentucky?

My brigade left its camp near Edgefield and joined the main column.

September 7, 1862, halted at Gee's Tavern.

September 8, marched to Tyree Springs.

September 9, marched to Sharp's Branch, near Franklin.

September 10, marched to Cave or Sinking Springs, near Bowling Green.

September 11, marched to Bowling Green.

September 16, march late; camp 3 miles from Barren River.

September 17, bivouac near Dripping Springs, 9 miles from Glasgow.

September 18, to Prewitt's Knob.

September 19, to Horse Well.

September 21, to point 3 miles from Munfordville.

September 22, march late; camp at Munfordville.

September 23, to Nolin.

September 24, Burlington (or Bloomington).

September 25, cross Salt River; halt; at 2 march resumed.

September 26, marched to Louisville.

Question. Do you know what the orders were under which your division marched?

I do not.

Question. Do you know what its immediate destination was?

I do not.

Question. Did you know any circumstance which made it necessary for it to reach any particular place at any given time?

I was not personally informed of any.

Question. Did any division leave Nashville in advance of it?

I do not recollect.

Question. On what road did it march?

We marched on the Bowling Green road by way of Tyree Springs.

Question. Was your march continued from the time you left Nashville until you arrived at Bowling Green?

The march was continuous, making only the necessary halts.

Question. When did you arrive at Bowling Green?

On the 11th September.

Question. Was your division first to arrive at Bowling Green?

My impression is that our division was not the first to arrive. I think there were several before us.

[NOTE BY GENERAL BUELL.—“It was the first division that arrived.”]

Question. When did you march from Bowling Green?

We marched from Bowling Green on the 16th, in the afternoon.

Question. How far did you march that afternoon and on what road?

We marched on the Dripping Springs road, and camped 3 miles from the Barren River.

Question. What time in the afternoon did you encamp?

I cannot remember.

Question. Before or after dark?

I cannot remember.

Question. On what road did you march the following day?

We marched to Dripping Springs; that was the termination of the second day's march from Bowling Green.

Question. Where did you encamp the second day?

Upon a high hill at Dripping Springs.

Question. Where did you encamp the third day?

At Prewitt's Knob.

Question. Where did you encamp the fourth day?

At Horse Well.

Question. Did you that day make the march you expected to make?

I have no reason to think we did not.

Question. Where did you arrive at the end of the fifth day's march?

At Bear Wallow, quite early in the forenoon.

Question. When did you leave Bear Wallow?

On the afternoon of the seventh day out from Bowling Green.

[NOTE BY GENERAL BUELL.—Marched from Bowling Green late on the “16th,” and arrived at Munfordville on the 21st—five days instead of “seven.”]

Question. Did you know the immediate destination of the army when leaving Bowling Green?

I did not.

Question. Where did you suppose Bragg's army was?

My impression was that it was moving in a line parallel with ours, but know nothing of his position.

Question. Who was in command of your column?

General Rousseau.

Question. Of what troops was it composed?

His own old division and General Smith's.

Question. Were there any detachments from your column at Bear Wallow?

There was a detachment moved in the direction of Glasgow to cut off a train, as I supposed.

Question. Did it return before the column left there?

It did not.

Question. For what point did you march?

We marched on the pike, turned to the left, and halted within 3 miles of Munfordville.

Question. On what day of the week and month?

I cannot give the day of the week; it was on the 21st of September.

Question. When did you reach Louisville?

On the 26th September.

Question. What is the distance between Louisville and Munfordville?

Between 70 and 80 miles.

Question. How many encampments did you make between Munfordville and Louisville?

I remember but four.

Question. Was there any unnecessary loss of time?

The marches were made promptly. We had good marches up to the time of arriving at Bowling Green.

Question. Do you know anything of the amount of supplies on hand at the time of leaving Bowling Green?

I do not.

Question. At what hour on the morning of the 8th of October did McCook's column leave Mackville?

I moved about 5 o'clock.

Question. Was the line of battle formed by McCook's corps a continuous line or did it consist of detached positions taken up at the moment?

I can make no statement except as to that portion attached to my command.

Question. Could you judge of the position of the line by the firing?

I could not.

Question. Was the engagement throughout the entire line during the principal part of the action?

I inferred it was a general one.

Question. Did you know where the headquarters of General McCook were during the engagement?

I did not.

Question. Did you know where the headquarters of General Rouseau were during the battle?

I had no express information where they were.

Question. In your evidence you express surprise at the enemy's not being pursued next day; did that surprise arise from the knowledge you obtained while a captive or from other circumstances?

Among other reasons, I had supposed no other division but ours had been engaged. I was surprised no attack was made the next day because I understood the enemy's attack had been repulsed by our corps. I decline to state anything I saw within the lines of the enemy.

Question. Was that attack made by the whole of the rebel army upon this one corps?

That I cannot state.

Question. Is it true that no other part of the lines was attacked except General McCook's corps?

I believe other portions of the army were engaged before the battle was over.

Question. Did you know that any division of the army was in the rear and on the march to join its corps?

I did not; I supposed there was a general concentration of the army at that point.

Question. Did you know what the strength of the army at Perryville was on the 8th?

I did not.

Question. What did you suppose it to be?

I supposed we had 60,000 or 70,000 men.

Question. Did you know what the condition of our army was?

I did not know its condition.

Question. Did you know what loss it sustained in the battle of the 8th?

I had no means of ascertaining.

Question. Had you formed any estimate of the loss.

No; it would have been impossible.

Question. What did you suppose to be the strength of the rebel army, independent of Kirby Smith's force?

I supposed General Bragg had 40,000 or 50,000.

Question. Was that the general estimate among persons who had opportunity of knowing?

I cannot say what opinion others had; estimates differ.

Question. What did you suppose to be the force under Kirby Smith's command; by that I mean the whole rebel force in Kentucky, not including Bragg's army, and including that of Humphrey Marshall?

I had no knowledge of any other corps except of that portion under command of Kirby Smith. I estimated that at from 15,000 to 20,000.

Question. Does that include the force under Humphrey Marshall?

It does not. Any force under him I know nothing of.

CINCINNATI, December 4, 1862.

Col. LEWIS D. CAMPBELL, having been duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What is your position in the Army?

I am not in the service now.

Question. State what was your position while in the Army during service in Tennessee and Kentucky.

I was colonel of the Sixty-ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. I organized the regiment, and was ordered in April last, after it was mustered in the service, to report to General Buell in Nashville. It was in the later part of April that we marched to Nashville. I arrived there, and not finding his assistant adjutant [general] there I reported to General Dumont, who was in Nashville at the time. I was ordered by him to go into camp, and in the course of two or three days I received an order directing me to distribute my regiment on the line from Nashville to the Duck River, near Columbia, extending over some 40 miles, at five different posts, subsequently six posts, and make my headquarters at Franklin, Tenn. I had distributed my regiment in accordance with the order. Subsequently General Negley ordered a company to be taken and stationed at Duck River. General Dumont approved of it.

Question. Where were you at the time General Bragg invaded Kentucky and how long did you remain with the army after that?

I was with the army after the 9th of August. I was in Nashville on the 8th, when I resigned, intending to return within a week, but the railroad communications were cut off by the guerrillas in the neighborhood of Gallatin, and I was not able to go home without the risk of being captured. I remained in Nashville until the army came north. This was on the 7th of September.

Question. Can you state the position east of Nashville which Bragg's army occupied when he invaded Kentucky?

I cannot state it definitely. On Sunday, the 7th of September, General Crittenden and other officers came to my room, and in the course of conversation I expressed great anxiety to come home, but at the same time would like to have some opportunity of participating in what was then an expected battle. General Crittenden invited me to go with him, and I made arrangements with him on the march to act as his volunteer aide in the event of a battle. On that evening (Sunday, September 9), in company with General Crittenden and staff, we crossed the Cumberland at Nashville and came out within 4 or 5 miles on the Gallatin road, and remained there all night. I came through with Crittenden all the way until we came to Salt River, about 18 miles south of Louisville. As it was then, the general thought that there would be no engagement.

With the permission of General Crittenden I came with his brother to Louisville, and left the divisions of Generals Crittenden and Wood at West Point. I was not with the army after that.

Question. What time was it understood that Bragg had advanced into Kentucky east of Nashville?

I think the first I heard of it was about from the 1st to the 5th of September. I am not quite positive, but I think it was about that time. I cannot name the day within any certainty.

We heard that Bragg was crossing the Cumberland River and was up in the neighborhood of Hartsville or in that direction. That place had been regarded as the headquarters of the guerrillas at the time Colonel Boone was captured and at the time General Johnson had surrendered. Lieutenant Holliday was captured at Tyree Springs and taken to headquarters and then paroled. He represented that there was a formidable force of rebels at that point. My inducement to go with General Crittenden was the assurance which I had from him privately that to go with the army would be the safest way to return home. He expressed the opinion very strongly that there would be an engagement between the contending forces before many days. As I had gone into Tennessee with a view of assisting there I was anxious before I went home to participate in a fight.

Question. Did the subsequent information confirm you in the fact that the Confederate army had approached?

We heard of them on our march of their being on our right. I never heard of any considerable force being on our left. All the information I received was to the effect that they were to our right, perhaps a little farther advanced.

Question. Could you not trace out on the map the march of the rebel army at Hartsville?

I could not. I had not the means at the time. I felt a delicacy of exhibiting any improper inquisitiveness. I was with General Crittenden almost constantly.

Question. What position did General Crittenden's army hold on that march?

I understood the divisions of Generals Wood and Rousseau were in advance of General Crittenden when we left Nashville and that they were to take the Gallatin road.

The COURT. You must speak of your own knowledge.

The WITNESS. I saw on Monday, after we left Nashville, that we overtook a part of General Rousseau's forces. I saw his staff officers and conversed with them and subsequently joined them. We frequently halted on the march to Bowling Green. Near the city we were encamped a few days. We arrived at Bowling Green on Saturday, the 13th. It was the Saturday before the attack on Munfordville. Sunday we understood that Wilder had been attacked and had repulsed the enemy. On Tuesday following Wilder surrendered; that was on the 16th, I think. At that time we were in Bowling Green. We arrived there on Saturday, the afternoon, and remained until Tuesday evening. General Crittenden was encamped, and General McCook was down about 2 miles beyond Bowling Green, at the Cave. I don't exactly recollect the name of the place. General Crittenden marched on Tuesday evening and crossed the river and there remained over night. We heard on Sunday night or Monday morning that Munfordville had been attacked.

Question. At what rate had you been marching from Nashville to Bowling Green?

I should state here that I am not a soldier by education and profession and know little about what should be regarded a proper march. From Nashville to Bowling Green we were halted four times before we arrived at Bowling Green. We were eight days on the road. I think one day we did not march more than 2 or 3 miles. We left Bowling Green, as already stated, on Tuesday evening. On that day Colonel Wilder surrendered. I think the next day we made a pretty heavy march, that is, on Wednesday. On Tuesday evening we marched through Bowling Green across the river. We arrived at Cave City in the afternoon on Thursday. It was from there 10 to 12 miles to Munfordville. We crossed the Barren River at Bowling Green on the bridge, but the train, I think, forded it.

Question. What was the object of the delay at Bowling Green?

There was a baggage train sent in advance to Bowling Green. It was a heavy train.

Question. Did General Crittenden give you any reason for remaining so long in Bowling Green?

I think General Crittenden was very anxious to move. He had information that Frankfort was taken and he seemed rather impatient to move. The troops were also very anxious to move, particularly the Ohio and Indiana troops, of which our forces were principally composed.

Question. Do you know the reasons why Munfordville was not relieved?

I never heard of any reason why it was not relieved and no re-enforcements sent.

(General Buell objected to the question on the ground that the question assumes that Munfordville ought to have been relieved and that it should have been relieved by his army.)

Question. You left the army near Louisville and of course know nothing of its subsequent operations?

I do not.

Question. How long did you remain in Cave City?

We remained there from Thursday afternoon until Sunday afternoon and then came on to Munfordville. General Wood's corps was in advance of General Crittenden's that afternoon. I left Crittenden soon after we left Cave City. He said then that he was going to see General Buell. Being upon a hill at that time, I heard cannonading. I supposed the action had commenced. When I came to Munfordville I found General Wood on the other side of the river near Munfordville with his division. I learned that he had encountered the rear guard of the rebel army and had some light firing and shelling promiscuously. General Buell came up about dusk. We remained until about 10 o'clock the next day. All the information we could get was that the enemy had proceeded in the direction of Bardstown to the right, and had commenced leaving on Saturday morning and continued on Saturday night and Sunday. General Wood drove the last of them out.

Question. Do you know the direction by which Bragg retired?

I understood to the right, in the direction of Bardstown. On Monday, 22d, the following day, the advance guard of our army had some skirmishing north of Munfordville. We received some information in farm-houses where we found some citizens of secession proclivities and some others of Union sentiments. All confirmed the information that the enemy had gone to the right. I recollect I was much disappointed, as others were, when we received information that the march was directed to the Elizabethtown road, a different road from that which the enemy took. We went on to Elizabethtown and from there to West Point; it was a tolerably rapid march. The rate of our march increased when we were made to understand that the enemy was more to the right than before. At Elizabethtown we halted part of the day and marched 12 or 13 miles this side. There we remained all night, and the next day we struck the Salt River, and then I left General Crittenden.

Question. You left the army at Salt River?

Yes, sir. I would have remained with General Crittenden, but I supposed there would be no fighting, and as I had been a long time from home and sick I desired to go home.

Question. Do you know anything as to the operations of the army while you were with the army?

I do not know anything that would be pertinent to the subject of investigation.

The COURT. Confine yourself entirely to the invasion of Kentucky. Where were you when Munfordville was surrendered?

We were lying at Bowling Green, that is, within 2 miles south of Bowling Green, from Saturday until Tuesday morning, which covered that Sunday when Colonel Wilder repulsed the enemy at Munfordville. Wilder surrendered on the following Tuesday.

Question. Did you know on Tuesday that he surrendered?

We did not know that until perhaps we learned it on the march of Wednesday night. After we got to Cave City Colonel Wilder came in our camp on parole. The following morning I heard the circumstances under which he surrendered, and particularly the fact that a part of the terms were that he should be allowed to go around the lines of the enemy to see that their representations with regard to their strength were correct. He gave as his own opinion that Bragg's force there was from 22,000 to 25,000 men and that he had seventy pieces of artillery. I think it was on Wednesday afternoon when we heard the rumor. We did not know the facts, however, until Thursday night or Friday morning. Wilder came on Thursday night to Cave City, and, I believe, remained with us.

By the COURT:

Question. What is the distance from Cave City to Bowling Green?

I should judge 25 miles.

Question. How long did it take to march it?

It was five days from the time we left Bowling Green until we arrived in Cave City, two of which days only we were marching.

Question. Were there any other Federal troops on that march in advance of Crittenden?

I understood he had been sent to the right.

Question. State as near as you can.

There were troops in advance of General Crittenden when we crossed the river at Bowling Green.

Question. Do you know whose troops they were and their strength?

I had no information.

Question. Do you know where they went to?

I do not know, except from rumor.

Question. You know whose troops they were. Was it a heavy column of troops or a few?

It was a heavy column. I know that General Rousseau's force was there. After we left Bowling Green we were not delayed long. It was in the evening when we crossed the river and the next morning our orders were to march. It was about 3 o'clock a. m.

Question. What was the strength of General Crittenden's force at that time?

I could not give that with precision. There were some changes made in the march. My information would not be very reliable. I understood there were changes made in regard perhaps to his artillery. The whole artillery which we had at Cave City, according to the opinion I heard expressed by Generals Wood and Crittenden, was one hundred and twenty-six pieces. Colonel Wilder reported the enemy's at seventy pieces. I think General Thomas' division did not get up until Saturday night. General Crittenden's headquarters were right in the city, within a stone's throw of the railroad, near the reservoir. I understood General Buell was in the neighborhood at some place within a proper distance of communication. I was not personally conversant of the fact as to the precise point where General Buell had his headquarters.

Cross-examination by General BUELL :

Question. Your subsequent information confirmed your impression that the Confederate army was at Hartsville or that Bragg was there?

I did not understand that he had crossed at that point. That point I understood to be the headquarters of the rebel forces.

Question. Did your subsequent information confirm you in your opinion that he had crossed at that point?

Somewhere in that region. I do not know whether I had any information as to the precise point.

Question. Was the information positive?

No; it was like any other rumor. It was a rumor obtained in Hartsville.

Question. Do you know what force the enemy had at that point?

Only by rumor; but I never did put much reliance upon rumor.

Question. Do you know what the enemy's immediate destination was?

I do not. I understood that there had been some change. I did not know anything personally of their movements except what I gathered from common conversation.

Question. You have stated that there was a general impatience in the army as to its movement. Did the impatience proceed from a knowledge of the movements of the enemy or was it mere impulse?

I did not hear much of the impatience until after we had the information of the attack upon Colonel Wilder at Munfordville. We were at Bowling Green and halted three or four days. A spirit of impatience began to develop itself in Cave City when we came in striking distance of the enemy.

Question. Was the position of the enemy known at that time?

The information of Colonel Wilder's surrender was communicated by the colonel himself and all we know was through him.

Question. Had Colonel Wilder surrendered ?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did you know the strength of the enemy at that time ?

All I know, as I said before, came from Colonel Wilder.

Question. Did you know the strength of my army ?

From what I had seen I supposed you had probably in the neighborhood of 40,000 or 45,000 men and one hundred and twenty-six pieces of artillery.

Question. Did you know the precise position of the enemy at Munfordville ?

I did not know.

Question. Did you know anything of the circumstances that controlled the movement of my army ?

I knew nothing. I was informed that you had a full supply of provisions.

Question. For how long a time ?

I understood sufficient to take you through to Louisville.

Question. In what time ?

In the time that it would ordinarily take for a march. I do not know that I heard any one say as to the precise amount of rations. Besides I could not make the proper estimate as to what should be the necessary supply of the army.

Question. How many days' supply did you think I had ?

I do not recollect the exact amount. I understood from the officers that there was a sufficient supply.

Question. Would the date of the arrival of Crittenden's army indicate the arrival of the whole army or only a portion ?

I do not think that the whole army arrived at one or the same time.

Question. What do you consider to be a good day's march for a body of troops ?

As I stated before, I have very little experience in these matters. I should state, from the little experience I have had, that in order to have men in good fighting condition they might make on the average from 12 to 15 miles per day and be in good condition. The march of which I spoke, which General Dumont made, was 45 miles in twenty-five hours, but was too exhaustive for the men.

Question. Did you know when the army left Bowling Green what its immediate destination was ?

I did not know. I think it was to overtake or catch Bragg. I had no information, direct or indirect, and to General Crittenden I propounded no question. It was presumed the intention was to find the enemy.

Question. Did you know to what point the army was marching ?

I supposed it marched upon Munfordville, and if the enemy could be found to engage them.

Question. Did you know that Bragg's army had left Glasgow at that time ?

I did not. I knew nothing of the movement of Bragg except what I learned upon the march. All I heard was from Colonel Wilder, from Thursday night to Friday morning.

Question. Was the army obliged to march to any one point or could it march upon various roads ?

I suppose it could have marched upon various roads.

Question. I want to know whether it was necessary for the army, in prosecuting its march, to pass through one point or could it move from the beginning upon different routes?

I never had an opportunity to examine the maps which had the routes marked on them. I understood that a portion of your army had marched off in the direction of Glasgow—to the right in that direction.

Question. I understand you to say after leaving Bowling Green a portion of the army had diverged from the main road?

I understood so.

Question. Upon how many roads?

They all started upon one route; the road to the right, which a portion took, lay in the direction of Glasgow. They united again at Cave City. It was said that the enemy was in Glasgow, but I did not hear anything as to the exact force which Bragg had there.

Question. You stated that you were disappointed that instead of pursuing Bragg's army on the road, they turned out in the opposite direction toward Elizabethtown; what was the immediate advantage you expected to gain by following that army on its march toward Bardstown?

I supposed we had forces enough to achieve a victory over them wherever they might be found; and as they made toward the Ohio River, I thought we could catch them in the same direction.

Question. Was that impression based upon the knowledge you had of Bragg's forces?

My impression was founded on the belief of the fact that ours was a superior force, better equipped, &c., and upon my general information which I received from the specimens of rebel soldiers I had seen. There were some taken upon the road by skirmishing; they were mounted soldiers.

Question. Do mounted men constitute the bulk of the rebel army?

Not exactly.

Question. What knowledge had you of the circumstances of the rebel army, respecting their efficiency, as compared with ours?

I had no opportunity but such as was common to everybody. It is the general impression that the troops of the rebels are inferior to ours. I think the general impression, as far as I had been able to ascertain from those who had the means to obtain information, is that they are better disciplined than ours, but not as well armed and equipped. That is the impression to my mind.

Question. Did you know of the existence or presence of any other rebel forces besides the army of Bragg in Kentucky?

I had no information except the representations that were made in regard to Kirby Smith's force.

Question. What force was General Smith supposed to have?

I do not know. My supposition was that Kirby Smith had 20,000 men.

Question. Did you know the position of Kirby Smith's forces at the time our army was following General Bragg's?

I noticed perhaps in a paper which we picked up on the road, which stated that the pickets did come within a few miles of Cincinnati, and this was perhaps in fact the cause of the impatience which seemed to prevail to engage Bragg and push on to the Ohio. I understood that General Dumont was off in that direction in Kentucky between the points of General Smith's and Bragg's forces, but that was only rumor again.

Question. You stated that General Dumont's force was interposed between them; did you know the strength or efficiency of General Dumont's forces?

I did not know his strength or efficiency.

Question. Was the force with which I marched from Bowling Green sufficient to meet the rebels after the junction of Bragg and Smith?

I should have supposed that you would have sufficient assistance from the direction of Louisville in the event of the junction of the rebel army.

Question. Did you know of any such assistance?

I know there had been a very large force in Louisville of Ohio and Indiana troops Question. Did you know the position of the enemy's forces?

I did not.

Question. Did you know their strength?

I did not.

Question. Did you know their movements?

I did not.

The commission adjourned to meet December 5, 10 a. m.

LOUISVILLE, December 5, 1862—10 a. m.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

J. T. PRATT, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and occupation.

J. T. Pratt is my name. I am a school teacher by profession, in La Grange, Tenn.

Question. Have you been in the service of the United States; if so, when, where, &c.?

I came to Nashville and reported to General Schoepf; he gave me an introduction to General Thomas, also an introduction to General Fry, who had two sisters residing at La Grange. I had left General Bragg's army in the Sequatchie Valley. I made the following report to General Schoepf and General Buell, that I estimated the force of Bragg's army to be from 22,000 to 25,000 men. I drew my statement from this, that they had moved in the warmest of the weather from Tupelo, Miss., and had left many sick there. I would also state that after having laid there inactive some time they left a number of sick at Chattanooga. I said I had counted several regiments and taken an average from these. In stating now the average I must rely wholly upon my memory. I averaged them at between 200 and 300. I stated there were three and sometimes four regiments to a brigade. In my first statement I said there were three brigades to a division and six divisions in the army. I then stated the respective commanders. There were two corps, or wings, commanded respectively by Generals Polk and Hardee. That I think is the extent of my report to him.

Question. State, if you know, what course the rebels would take in invading Kentucky.

General Buell asked me if I thought they were directing their course to Nashville I stated I thought they were not.

Question. What opportunity had you of knowing their strength?

By observation and inquiry.

Question. Were you inside the enemy's lines?

I was.

Question. Where was General Buell when you made this report?

At Nashville, in a house on High street.

Question. Did you make any subsequent report to General Buell?

General Schoepf requested General Thomas to have me return to General Bragg's lines. I did so, finding him at Glasgow. I arrived at Glasgow on Sunday; I do not remember the day of the month. I there saw General Bragg's army strike their tents on that Sabbath, and then had an opportunity of counting several regiments and made several inquiries. I saw also the pike which they took in leaving Glasgow. I returned and reported in the first place to General Schoepf; he sent me to General Thomas and I reported to him. He sent me to General Buell in the morning. I confirmed my former statement as to the numerical strength of the enemy. I recollect in my second statement to General Buell I said I had found out that some divisions had four brigades. I stated to him the pike they took—the pike that runs due north.

Question. How many days elapsed between your time of leaving Glasgow and your report to General Buell?

I should think four or five days.

Question. In either of your reports did General Buell inquire regarding artillery?

As to that I should not like to say upon oath what the question or the answer was. I think I told him a battery to a brigade.

Question. Did General Buell question you as to the general condition of the army, as to supplies and transportation, &c.?

I think there were some questions asked in regard to a wagon train. I think I made the statement they were well armed. As to supplies, if I made a statement I do not recollect what it was. I think I said they had a small wagon train.

Question. At the time you made your second statement, at Prewitt's Knob, was it known generally that Munfordville was surrendered?

I think I heard of it at Bowling Green before I made the report.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. What did you estimate the strength of the rebel army at Tupelo to be?

I don't think I made an estimate, but they left a number of sick.

Question. Can you answer how many?

I think I made the statement they had buried several thousand, but not as to number of sick who were left there. It would be very difficult to form an estimate of the number of sick General Bragg left in Mississippi. I made no estimate. I think "many" was the adjective I used.

Question. How long were you at Tupelo?

I merely passed through there, perhaps remaining ten or twenty hours. In speaking of the graves, I would say I came to Tupelo from Holly Springs; that in entering Tupelo by the road I came I passed through several camping grounds, or, more properly, by several camping grounds, from which the army had been withdrawn, and upon each camp ground I saw the graves where each several brigade had buried their dead. In most cases these were marked by a few rails piled up; in some cases a piece of board with an inscription. I rode to several of these plats and counted the graves, and in that way I arrived at the estimate of the dead (several thousand).

Question. Was the army with which General Bragg invaded Kentucky identically the same as that you saw at Tupelo?

As to that question I cannot make a distinct reply, as I arrived at Tupelo after a part of the army had left.

Question. When were you at Tupelo?

In the month of July, the latter part.

Question. Had the principal part of the army left at that time?

All had left, I think, excepting Price's division and the division of which General Walker is a brigadier-general.

Question. When did you arrive at Chattanooga?

I arrived in Chattanooga just as the rear of the army was passing the river. Saw General Bragg on the south side of the river. Cannot positively fix the date.

Question. Did you see the whole of the army at Chattanooga or near there?

I saw what I considered all the army after I crossed the river on the march.

Question. Had any portion of the army left the river when you arrived; and, if so, what portion of it?

A portion of it had, but what portion of it I could not state. A portion of it had marched 4 or 5 miles from the river and camped.

Question. Did the army cross Walden's Ridge by one or more than one road?

I should think they nearly all crossed by the old Anderson road.

Question. Did you accompany the army on the march; and, if so, what portion of it, how long, and up to what point?

When the army camped on the north side of the river, that night after dark I rode to General Wheeler's cavalry brigade; this was the advance of the army, I think, at that time, that went on the road I mentioned before, the old Anderson road. I think it passed over the next day. I passed with it. It went as far as a Mr. Bennett's house, about 3 or 4 miles from Dunlap, at the point where the road entered the Sequatchie Valley. It was there I saw the army cross the next day and there made my estimate of its strength. I arrived at my conclusion in regard to the strength by conversation with officers on the road from Tupelo to Chattanooga and by observation while with the army. I counted one or two regiments in Cheatham's division; most of his men are Tennesseans. One or two in General Withers' division; General Withers' division I supposed to be chiefly Alabamians.

Question. Did the whole of the army cross at Chattanooga?

The portion I saw crossed at Chattanooga.

Question. Did it halt in Sequatchie Valley while you were there or continue its march?

I cannot state as to that; I left.

Question. Did you count the divisions as they came into the valley?

No, sir; I did not.

Question. What reason have you to believe that you saw the whole of the army at that time?

I heard it stated that the whole army was there. I also saw a great number of soldiers.

Question. Did the artillery cross by the same road? Did it cross with the troops or separately?

There was artillery that followed the cavalry and also infantry that was with the artillery.

Question. Can you state how much artillery crossed with the cavalry?

No, sir; I don't know how many pieces; a good many. I saw some infantry cross with the artillery, but that all the infantry crossed by that road I can't say.

Question. Did you see any artillery besides that that accompanied the cavalry?

I saw other artillery in the valley; I mean to say I saw more artillery in the valley than I thought I had seen cross the mountains.

Question. Did you count the number of pieces then?

I never counted the artillery, no more than that. As I said before, I saw in some cases four and some cases six guns to a battery. As to a general estimate of guns, I did not make that.

Question. Did your estimate of the strength of Bragg's army, which you say you reported to me, include cavalry?

I think I made a separate report of cavalry. My estimate of 25,000 includes everything.

Question. Did you know what route the army proposed to take and what destination it had in view?

I heard Pikeville and Sparta mentioned as places of destination, and judged from that they were going to Nashville.

Question. By what route did you reach Nashville after you left Bragg's army?

I struck from where we were through Dunlap. I was some time in going. I followed no particular road, but passed near Pikeville, leaving it to my right; then near a little town called Bunker Hill, leaving Sparta to my left; thence to Rome, a little place on the Cumberland River, leaving Carthage on the right; from Rome directly to Nashville, entering Nashville on the Lebanon pike. I arrived two or three weeks after leaving Chattanooga. This I state from recollection.

Question. Did you leave Dunlap in advance of the rebel army?

I left before the bulk of the army had arrived. A little cavalry was there when I reached there.

Question. How long was it after you left Nashville until you arrived at Glasgow?

Nearly two days.

Question. Did you see the whole army at Glasgow?

I saw what I considered the bulk of it.

Question. How many divisions did you see?

I did not see the army division by division, but I saw a large portion of General Buckner's division; I counted several regiments in this, as I have before stated. I also saw four brigades in one division. I saw Generals Cheatham's and Buckner's divisions, and counted the strength of some of the regiments; found them to be from 225 to 325, and drew an average of 280 to 290.

Question. Did you count the number of regiments in a brigade?

I counted the number in two brigades; in one three, in another four regiments.

Question. Did you count the number of brigades in a division?

In one instance I did—General Buckner's division; I found it to be four brigades.

Question. Under what circumstances did you leave the rebel army? Were you privileged to leave or did you leave without permission?

I left without a pass or permission. I had no conversation with any one about it.

Question. Had you any reasonable apprehension of being prevented from leaving; and, if so, what means did you resort to to avoid apprehension?

I was not regularly in the army; was not connected with it in any way; and I wasn't in any department; therefore I supposed that I would be conscripted if I remained or forced to take up arms in some way. I rode up out through Dunlap before they established pickets. I rode the same horse I rode around Tupelo.

Question. Did you have any intercourse with high officers in the rebel army?

No, sir; I did not. I conversed with Captain Alexander, from Louisville, Ky.; he was General Walker's assistant adjutant-general. I had conversation with him at Tupelo. Occasionally on the road from Tupelo I had conversation with others, but not lengthy on the road from Tupelo.

Question. How did you make your escape from the rebel army the second time?

As I stated before, I staid at Glasgow until General Bragg's army had left; then I left.

Question. Who were you staying with when you were in the army?

I was with a brother, in First Alabama, Allen commanding.

Question. Did you have to make any explanation upon your return?

I did not see any person that recognized me. I was arrested by a citizen where I staid all night for expressions that I made. He had a pistol and saw that I was unarmed; said that he was going to carry me back to the lines. But at last he relented, after he found the army had moved. That is all the interference I met with.

Question. Did you return to the rebel army after your interview with General Buell at Prewitt's Knob?

Yes, sir.

Question. State where you found it, how long you remained with it, and where you left it.

I found it at Bardstown, two days after I left General Buell. Remained there one day before I was arrested by a Captain Burton, from La Grange, as a Union man, and was placed in the guard-house with United States soldiers, among others Lieutenant Scott, Fourth Indiana Cavalry. After I had been there two days I was sent south of the lines with General Forrest, who left at this time with an escort to take charge, as I supposed, of the Army of the Tennessee. I came down with him through Springfield, Lebanon, Tompkinsville, from thence to Dixon's Springs. All this time I was under arrest. When I got at Dixon's Springs it was in the afternoon, 5 o'clock. General Forrest went to a private house and took me with him. The next morning he left early, as he said, for Lebanon, Tenn. He left three or four men with me to follow on after him. They were all privates. I went with them nearly to the river, where they crossed from Dixon's Springs to Lebanon road. Here I dismounted in a lane. The privates with whom I was left had all procured liquor and at this time were quite intoxicated. I dismounted, as I said before, and I made my escape and went to Nashville.

Question. Where have you been since?

I have been at Nashville, at Murfreesborough, and at Chattanooga.

Question. Did you go to Chattanooga on any duty for the Government?

Yes, sir; I went there for General Negley and arrived at this place yesterday.

Question. What did you come here for?

I was going to New York to see my father.

Question. How happened it that you were summoned before this Commission?

I recognized General Schoepf in the office and spoke to him. He asked me where I was going. I told him. He requested me to remain here, and I received an order to appear here at 12 o'clock.

Question. Have you received compensation from the Government for your secret service?

I received from you $150, and $30 from General Negley; that is all I received.

The Commission adjourned to meet December 8, at 10 a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 8, 1862—10 a. m.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Maj. Gen. A. McD. McCook (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State, if you please, your position in the Army of the United States.

I am a major-general of volunteers since the 17th of July, 1862.

Question. You will state, if you please, what part of that time you were under the command of Major-General Buell, and especially during the invasion of Kentucky by Bragg, and all you know about the expedition following.

I organized and commanded the Second Division of the Army of the Ohio at Camp Nevin; that was my command when General Buell assumed command of the Army of the Ohio. I marched with that division to Nashville with short delays on the road at different camps, and from Nashville to the battle-field of Shiloh; from thence to Corinth; thence to Battle Creek, Tenn., and there was placed in command of the Fifth Division in addition to my own. The Fifth was commanded by General Crittenden. I commanded these two divisions in front of Chattanooga, where the rebel army, under General Bragg, was supposed to be concentrating. I remained at Battle Creek until General Buell planned an advance against the enemy, part of which I was to carry out. My orders were to march up the Sequatchie Valley. I will state one brigade (the Fourth) was here detached and stationed along the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad as far as Cowan. My instructions were on marching up Sequatchie Valley to leave Crittenden's division at the place where the Higginbottom pike leaves the Sequatchie Valley to ascend the Cumberland Mountains. With the rest of my command I was to move up to Anderson's house, and there prevent the enemy from crossing Sequatchie Valley and guard the Anderson road. When I reached to within 10 miles of the Anderson road I was on the march, and was met by two of my spies, whom I considered trustworthy men. One was a corporal in the Forty-ninth Ohio, the other a refugee from Chattanooga I had sent out. They presented me with a synopsis of what they had seen around Chattanooga. They approached me in different directions and had not seen each other. They informed me that Bragg was crossing at Chattanooga with seventy regiments and a great deal of artillery; that Withers was crossing at Harrison, 12 miles above, had already crossed eleven regiments; that McCown was crossing at Kingston (this was about the 10th of August), supposed to have 10,000 men. General Heth commanded a division under him. The most reliable of these spies, Corporal Kennedy, informed me that the army that crossed at Chattanooga were advancing rapidly toward Anderson road. That same morning I received information that 600 of the enemy's cavalry had reached Dunlap. I then had but two brigades and three batteries of artillery with me. Had been informed by a citizen of that vicinity, whom I considered loyal, that the enemy's pickets and advance were on the top of Walden's Ridge, 7 miles from where I was to go to take position. Knowing there were several roads crossing Walden's Ridge practicable for infantry and cavalry, I did not consider it safe for me to go to that place with a command of that size. My instructions from General Buell were to take position upon the Anderson road; to hold it if I could; if not, to retreat by a road to Tracy City; in case I could not reach Anderson road to ascend the mountain by Higginbottom turnpike to Tracy City, where I would be met by General Schoepf. I did not know what command General Schoepf had, but was merely informed that he would meet me there. I did not know he commanded the First Division.

I then returned to Higginbottom pike with my command; went to top of mountain myself; tried to carry a battery up, and found the road impracticable for military carriages. I then marched from that point with my own and Crittenden's division back to Battle Creek, and camped 6 miles from the mouth of the stream. From this point I could have marched by Sweeden's Cove road, which led to Tullahoma; by Battle Creek road to Pelham, or by Fiery Gizzard road.

While in this camp I received an order from General Buell (I would here add, the part of General Buell's plan on the Anderson road I alone am responsible for; I did not carry out his instructions) to march with my two divisions to Pelham; to reach Pelham by one day's march; to march from Pelham to Altamont, and then form a junction with General Thomas, and attack the enemy on Therman road in case he advanced that way.

On my march from Battle Creek to Pelham night overtook me 7 miles from Pelham. I there bivouacked with my two divisions and descended the mountain the next morning, and reached Pelham at 10 o'clock (5th of September). There found General Schoepf encamped with First Division of the army, and was joined by the other brigade of my division, which marched from Tullahoma. I sent couriers when on top of the mountain to Altamont. They returned and reported General Thomas had been there with about 600 cavalry, but had left. An order reached me at Pelham from General Buell that in case I had not descended the mountain to encamp at a place where Battle Creek road intersected the road which led from Tracy City down to Cowan.

I went into camp at Pelham and assumed command of all the troops there. Was there visited by General Buell in person, who ordered me to move with my own (Second) division up to Altamont. I remained there until I exhausted all forage and water, and then descended the mountain by Hickory Creek road and encamped at Hubbard's Cove. Our army had been on one-half rations for a month, except what the men had provided for themselves, such as green corn and fresh meat. Our supply of salt was very small. I will state General Buell sent me a synopsis of his plan of campaign while at Battle Creek, which was to attack the enemy as they debouched into the Sequatchie Valley and as he descended into the plains of Tennessee from the Cumberland Mountains, which was as perfectly planned as could be. This plan could not be carried out for want of supplies. The railroad was constantly kept cut, and my impression then was that we had but twenty days' rations for our army in Tennessee.

After reaching my camp in Hubbard's Cove, on Hickory Creek, I there received General Buell's plan of concentrating his army at Murfreesborough and my instruction what to do. This plan of concentration, in my opinion, was as perfect as it possibly could be. I then marched on Murfreesborough; had entire control of the rear of the army until I reached the city of Nashville.

The enemy in their movements could have but two objectives—Nashville and Kentucky. I considered a march to Kentucky a hazardous one for them, and, in case we were to fight in Tennessee, Murfreesborough or Nashville were the points we could concentrate at. By coming to Nashville, by assistance of troops from the Army of the Mississippi, we could place about 15,000 more men in line to fight than we could at Murfreesborough.

I was never satisfied with the manner in which General Buell's army was scattered along the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. But I believe others, higher in authority, are responsible for that altogether. I was never told so by General Buell, but still that was my impression.

General Buell has been censured by the public press for not arriving at the battle of Shiloh sooner. I commanded his advance, and had communication with General Grant, who was at Savannah. I built the bridges over Duck River. I don't believe he could have gotten his troops to the battle of Shiloh sooner without abandoning his transportation. Duck River was not fordable for 50 miles either way, there being 40 feet of water in it. A notification was also received from General Nelson stating we would not be needed before Tuesday. There was no information that warranted any rapid marches. I supposed General Buell's army was to co-operate in an offensive campaign, and that Savannah was the point to concentrate upon.

I do not remember the day I arrived in Nashville, with rear of General Buell's army, from Murfreesborough. I arrived at Mill Creek, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Nashville, with 750 wagons, about 3,000 cavalry, and my own division, at 11 o'clock at night; made the march in one day, 30 miles. I reported in person to General Buell that night about 12 o'clock. I returned to my camp that night; received an order early next morning to be ready to march. I was on the march and received an order, countermanding the former, to encamp at McEwing's house, about 11 miles from here, with my own old division. I remained here that day and until 5 o'clock on the evening of the next day.

During my stay that time near Nashville I visited General Buell some two or three times. On one occasion he asked me about how many men it would take to defend Nashville. I replied about 20,000 men. I believe he asked me if I thought 20,000 men would hold it. I told him I did not consider it a very defensible place. At that time I thought Price's army was marching into Middle Tennessee. I advised General Buell to abandon the place and to allow me to burn it. He replied Nashville must be held at all hazards, and was very glad he did not select me to defend it. My reasons for advising General Buell to burn Nashville, I believe it to be the most treasonable place in the Southern country, except the little place of Murfreesborough. I was in General Buell's quarters on the evening of the second day I arrived here, when he received a dispatch from General Jacob Ammen that his outpost at Edgefield Junction was in the presence of the advance of the enemy. General Buell then ordered me to proceed immediately to his assistance with my division. I reached Edgefield Junction about 2 o'clock in the morning. Ammen's division was ordered to move forward that morning on the road to Bowling Green. I was there joined that morning by General Buell and staff. General Buell then marched that morning with my division toward Bowling Green. We left that camp at 12 o'clock the same day we arrived and marched to Tyree Springs. The next march we made was within 14 miles of Bowling Green, at a creek which made its appearance there, and next morning my division reached a place, Cave Mills, 4 miles this side of Bowling Green. There we found General Crittenden encamped with his division. We encamped there that night. Next day I marched to a camp $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Bowling Green, near Barren River. At Bowling Green the army was reorganized, as far as command was concerned. These divisions were called columns, consisting of two divisions each. We remained at Bowling Green two days. My command consisted of my own division and the division of General Robert [B.] Mitchell, of the Army of the Mississippi. I then received an order to march next morning. The rest of the army, Crittenden and Rousseau. I marched that day to Dripping Springs, 16 miles from Bowling Green, with my two divisions. We remained at Dripping Springs until next day, 1 o'clock. I then moved on and camped at Prewitt's Knob, a distance of 13 miles. Remained at Prewitt's Knob two days; then marched to a point near Munfordville, on Green River, a distance of about 14 miles; made the march at night. Next day I marched from Munfordville and camped at Bacon Creek, having to cross Green River. Next day I was marched from Bacon Creek to Elizabethtown, a distance of 24 miles. Next day's march was from Elizabethtown to mouth of Salt River, 23 miles. Next day's march was within 7 miles of Louisville, at a place called Greenwood, on the Ohio River, at 10 o'clock p. m. On reaching Greenwood, as the rear of my division was marching into camp, I received an order to march upon Louisville. The roads being very dusty and great scarcity of water and hard marching upon pike roads, my men were worn-out. I sent for my brigade commanders and inquired particularly as to the condition of my men. I then postponed marching until 3 o'clock a. m. At 3 o'clock a. m. I received a note from General Buell by hands of Lieutenant Anderson, ordering my division to halt where I was, General Buell supposing I had been on the march. I also received a note from General Crittenden, who had obeyed the order and marched on Louisville, not to hurry my command, as his men were standing in the streets and not assigned to any camp. I left my camp at Greenwood at 8 o'clock and marched to Louisville and camped near the Jeffersonville Ferry, where I remained until an advance was made against Bragg and Kirby Smith, then in Kentucky.

At Louisville the army was organized into corps, consisting of three divisions. I was placed in command of the First Corps, consisting of my own (Second) division, General Rousseau's division (Third), and General Jackson's division (Eleventh), consisting of raw levies. I don't exactly remember the number of days we were at Louisville in reorganizing, but we moved at the earliest possible moment supplies could be obtained, and as it was I marched with a deficiency of canteens and haversacks. We marched without baggage. I think one wagon to a regiment was allowed to carry officers' blankets and a few rations. Soldiers had mess-pans made and carried them on their persons. Regiments that were supplied with cooking utensils one wagon was allowed to carry them.

When we marched from Louisville my corps was divided. Sill's division was ordered to march on Shelbyville pike toward Frankfort. My other division marched 6 miles on Bardstown pike, then turned to the left on Taylorsville pike, and camped that night beyond Jeffersontown. I was ordered next day to march to a point, the junction of Shelbyville and Taylorsville and Louisville and Taylorsville pikes. It was absolutely impossible for me to encamp there, as the streams were dry. I marched that night 5 miles farther, to Taylorsville, on Salt River. I remained at Taylorsville next day; the day after marched to Bloomfield. I was kept in communication with General Buell, and he prescribed the day's march for each corps from day to day. The orders were for each corps to have four orderlies at his headquarters, so as to enable him to communicate with the different corps from day to day.

I remained at Bloomfield with my two divisions from Saturday until Monday morning. While at Bloomfield I received instructions from General Buell to be ready to march to the support of Sill in case he should fail at Frankfort or to be ready to march to the support of Sill to operate with the main body in an attack on Bragg. I then received an order to march from Bloomfield to Harrodsburg, there to form a junction with Sill at or near Harrodsburg. I sent that order to General Sill and told him to meet me on a certain day. This order was countermanded. Sill was ordered to march by way of Lawrenceburg and Chaplinton, and then follow my route, by way of Chaplinton, Willisburg, and Mackville, to the position assigned me at Perryville. General Buell sent me a guide, Capt. Beverly [D.] Williams, who bore an order. The order was an optional one to march by way of Willisburg and Mackville to Perryville, and if that was impracticable to march by way of Springfield. Captain Williams informed me he could carry me through by way of Willisburg and Mackville. I left Bloomfield Monday and marched to Chaplin River, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles beyond Chaplinton. On Tuesday I marched to Mackville—on the 7th of October. At 2 o'clock on the morning of the 8th I received a letter of instructions relating to my position in line at Perryville, ordering me to march at 3 o'clock a. m. I marched at 5 o'clock a. m., my division being separated about a mile on account of water. I reached a point designated for my line about 9 o'clock a. m. near Perryville. Was ordered to take position about 3 miles from Perryville.

When I arrived at the point designated General Rousseau went forward and reconnoitered the ground. I saw General Gilbert's line, his left skirmishing with the enemy, although no enemy were visible except a few in the woods and along the fence. The enemy were driven from the front. I sent my aide, Lieutenant Hosea, to see whose troops they were. He returned and reported they were Colonel Greusel's. I called General Rousseau's attention to the left of General Gilbert's line, and also Captain Loomis, who was Rousseau's chief of artillery, and marked the line of battle for them. I was a total stranger to the country. Captain B. D. Williams, who was my guide, was called off to General Buell's headquarters at 7 o'clock that a. m. I marked the line of battle of General Rousseau, and Captain Loomis replied they understood it perfectly. I commenced forming it, and selected the position for Loomis' battery myself. The right of my line was not over 350 yards from General Gilbert's left. The line was then being formed—Rousseau's division—the line being marked out for it. General Jackson's division had not yet arrived on the ground. On the march I picked out all the roads leading from Mackville leading to my rear. General Gay in the mean time was making a reconnaissance with cavalry.

Our march that day to Mackville had to be done carefully. I had flankers and skirmishers thrown out. Jackson's division, being composed of raw troops, understood their duties imperfectly, and consequently could not march rapidly. I ordered General Rousseau to reconnoiter my front with skirmishers. He ordered the Tenth Ohio, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Burke. I gave orders to Major Campbell, my assistant adjutant-general, to post General Jackson's division on a high piece of ground to the right of the Mackville road with regiments doubled on the center, with a view to move them in any direction. I then informed General Rousseau that my order was to report to General Buell in person and that I was about to leave the field (11 a. m.), but would return in a short time. I would state that previously I had a conversation with Captain Long, who was stationed in that part of the field as a picket. He told me he had been there and had only seen a little force of the enemy's cavalry; that General Gilbert's troops had been engaged with the enemy, but not in any force. General Buell's written instructions led me to believe he was going to attack the enemy at Perryville.

I left the field and reported to General Buell in person, whose headquarters were $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from my line. I reached his headquarters about 12.30 o'clock; reported that my line was formed; my right was about 350 yards from Gilbert's left; also reported my men wanted water badly, the water the night before being scarce and bad at that. He ordered me to return to my line and make a reconnaissance down to the Chaplin River and obtain water for my men. I left his tent in company with his chief of staff, Colonel Fry. I asked Colonel Fry who was down in Perryville. He replied Hardee was there with two divisions. I then bade them good-by, and said I was going down to drink at the river and asked him to go. I returned to my line, and found that General Rousseau had placed a couple of batteries in position and replied to three batteries that had opened on him at long range. I rode up to where the batteries were, and not seeing any of the enemy's infantry, I ordered no more ammunition to be wasted. I was then informed by my guide, Captain Williams, and Colonel Harris, commanding Ninth Brigade, that if I would ride off to the left a few hundred yards on the Mackville road I would get a position that would command Chaplin River and could see the water. I went forward in person, examined the ground, and saw the water. Sent for Generals Jackson and Terrill, told them what I was ordered to do, showed them the water, marked out a line for them, which was a continuation of the left of Harris' brigade, Rousseau's division, right resting on a wood and line running along a high commanding ridge, and at the left of the line was a crochot to the rear, in order to hold the high ground. General Jackson replied to me, as did also General Terrill, that they understood the line. They had previously sent for the troops to place in that position, and were then on the march to this position. I also ordered General Terrill, as soon as his line was formed, to advance a line of skirmishers down to the water. He replied to me, "I'll do it, and that's my water." The only enemy in sight at that time was about 400 or 500 cavalry on the other side of Chaplin River (1 o'clock). Water was about 600 yards in front of my line. This cavalry was driven away by Stone's battery, Starkweather's brigade, that was put in position on a high ridge to the left of my line. I had previously ordered two companies Thirty-third Ohio into the woods as skirmishers to reconnoiter the woods. I ordered General Jackson to superintend this reconnaissance, and he replied that he would. I told him I would then ride down into these woods and see what they were about, as I heard nothing from them. General Jackson requested me not to go, saying that Providence had been kind to me, and that some lurking scoundrel might shoot me. I told him I would not go, and rode to the right in the rear of the skirmishers, and in a few minutes the firing commenced between the Second and Thirty-third Ohio skirmishers and the enemy.

About 2 o'clock an assault was made upon my entire line, the heaviest being on my left and center. In about half an hour after I left Jackson Williams reported to me

Jackson was killed. As soon as I found the assault was going to be a general one I dispatched an aide to General Sheridan to see to my right that it was not turned. About 3 o'clock, when I found the enemy were outnumbering me, I sent an aide to the nearest commander for assistance (Captain Fisher). He met General Schoepf on the road marching to the battle-field. Captain Fisher was referred to General Gilbert, who was with General Schoepf's command, and was referred by General Gilbert to General Buell. At 3.30 o'clock I dispatched another aide, Captain Hoblitzell, to General Schoepf, to tell him my condition. The same time I dispatched Major Bates, of my staff, to report to General Buell my condition. In the mean time Terrill's brigade, of Jackson's division, which consisted of all raw troops, had given way, but Starkweather's brigade, being so admirably posted, drove the enemy back on the left. I remained in the left center of my line until the enemy were driven in confusion from the left center and center of my line and then galloped to the right, and arrived just in time to see my right turned by a heavy force of the enemy. It was then and there most of my casualties occurred that day. I ordered two regiments of Webster's brigade, which had been posted in the rear of the right center of Rousseau's line, to move to the right and repel the assault. I galloped to Russell's house, where my headquarters had been during the morning, and ordered my chief of artillery to bring up a section of artillery and repel this advance of the enemy. The section was opened, but they opened a battery about 600 yards from us and opened such a heavy fire upon that point that the battery was brought away. Loomis' battery had exhausted all its long-range ammunition and had been retired 100 yards in rear of Russell's house. I rode to the battery, and ordered Captain Loomis, as soon as the enemy came close enough, to open upon them with canister. He double-charged his Parrott guns and did it handsomely. I then rode back to where the Mackville and Perryville and Springfield-Dicksville roads cross.

NASHVILLE, December 8, 1862.

Lient. FRANK [J.] JONES (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What position have you in the service?

First lieutenant, Thirteenth Regiment Ohio Infantry, and acting assistant adjutant-general of Third Division.

Question. State whether or not you were in the battle of Perryville, whether you were taken prisoner there, and what you know of the number of the enemy.

I was in the battle of Perryville; was taken prisoner there just at night-fall, 8 or 9 o'clock, after the battle. As regards the number of the enemy, I know nothing except what I heard from Captain Spence, assistant inspector-general Polk's staff, who stated they were 30,000 or 35,000 strong.

(Objected to by General Buell on account of its being hearsay evidence. The room was cleared and the objection was sustained.)

Question. State what you know of the subsequent movements of the enemy.

Of that I know nothing, being taken to Harrodsburg by a circuitous route, avoiding their army. I saw nothing except detached bodies near Harrodsburg; besides, I made no inquiries.

Question. How long were you at Harrodsburg after the battle when paroled?

Was paroled day after the battle, in provost-marshal's office in Harrodsburg,

Could you judge from the bodies you saw which way the enemy were moving?

No, sir; I could not.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. What time did you arrive at Harrodsburg?

Next day after the battle, 12 or 1 o'clock.

Question. State, if you please, what route you took in going the

After leaving General Polk's headquarters we went by a circuitous route, over a dirt road, until we met the main body of the rebels, which was on the march to Harrodsburg. At this point we left the road upon which they were marching and went through the woods to Harrodsburg.

Question. On what road is the residence of Mr. Bowman, at which you staid?

At the junction of two roads, one leading to Danville, the other came in on the right-hand side as you went near Harrodsburg.

Question. You are positive the left-hand road was the Danville road?

I am not positive it is the main road to Danville, but the road we went.

Question. Did you see any large bodies of rebel troops marching past Mr. Bowman's house while you were there?

No, sir; I did not.

Question. What do you mean by detached bodies of troops which you say you saw?

Smaller bodies of men than the whole column; a brigade or regiment away from the column.

Question. Where did you see them and in what way were they marching?

As far as the troops in the town are concerned, they appeared to have no apparent object; those leaving the town marched from the town on the opposite side from that where Mr. Bowman's house was situated.

Commission adjourned to meet December 9, at 10 a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 9, 1862—10 a. m.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present, also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General ROBERT B. MITCHELL (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What is your position in the Army of the United States?

Brigadier-general.

Question. State, if you please, what service you have seen under General Buell in Tennessee and Kentucky as to time.

I marched from Iuka to Tennessee on the 28th July, 1862, in command of the Fourth Division in the Army of the Mississippi, for the purpose of joining General Buell's command at this point. I do not think it possible that I can recall the dates. I marched to Columbia, Tenn., under my written orders, and there I received orders by telegraph to join General Buell's army at Murfreesborough, Tenn., which I did and reported to General Buell in person. From there I marched to this point, Nashville. After remaining here a few days, in the rear of General Buell's army, I marched in the direction of Louisville, under his directions. I do not remember where I overtook the main army. The army was at Bowling Green, Ky., marching to Louisville and from Louisville to Crab Orchard. At Louisville the army was reorganized. In consequence of the arrest of General Davis I was placed in command of the Ninth Division of the Army of the Ohio, and commanded it from Louisville to Crab Orchard.

Question. Do you know at what place the rebels under General Bragg invaded or crossed the Cumberland in their invasion of Kentucky?

I do not.

Question. Do you know anything of their line of march to Bardstown?

Only from report. From Bardstown I followed close in their wake to Perryville. I commanded the advance of the central army corps from Bardstown to Perryville.

Question. Do you not know now, as you know any other historical fact, what was the course taken by the rebels?

I have an impression from observation and from hearsay.

Question. Will the knowledge which you have justify you in stating to the Commission at what points, previous to the capture of Munfordville, that army might have been attacked with the prospect of success?

Well, it would. I commanded a division, without any knowledge, except from common report; where the enemy were. You are well aware that all kinds of reports are flying along the line from morning to night. We believed the enemy were marching very near us, but had no positive knowledge of the fact.

Question. What do you know of our failure to relieve Munfordville?

I have no personal knowledge. I had no means of knowing about the distribution of troops or the necessities until two days before we arrived at Munfordville. I was detached from the main army at this point; but I find it impossible to recollect the names of localities.

General BUELL. There is a map which shows exactly the movements of the column. It would be very useful to the Commission. It is a map I used myself, and on which the roads are traced.

(Judge-advocate directs the map to be obtained for the use of the Commission.)

Question. Where were you, general, at the time of the surrender of Munfordville?

My impression is that we were near Bowling Green.

Question. How long had you been there previous to the capture?

I lay there about a day and a half. I was in the rear, and joined the main command, I think the last division before General Thomas.

General BUELL. It was the last but one.

General MITCHELL. I cannot remember the day of the capture, but I lay at Bowling Green a day and a half after the capture, and the first knowledge I had of Munfordville being in the hands of the enemy was two days before our arrival there. The knowledge I had was at the time we met the troops that had been paroled there.

Question. Your recollection of the date of that event is not sufficient to enable you to fix the day? You cannot tell how long you were at Bowling Green before that place was captured?

I cannot; I can only give my impression.

Question. You proceeded with the army from Louisville to Crab Orchard and were present at the battle of Perryville? What was your position there?

I occupied the right of General Gilbert's corps.

Question. State, if you please, if you took any part in that fight.

I did. About 10 o'clock in the morning of the 8th of October I was ordered to the front. Had been occupied for three previous days in front. During the night General Sheridan, with a portion of his division, was ordered to pass me. It was the night of the 7th. He passed me some time in the night. I was ordered about 10 o'clock to move forward with my entire division, and after marching probably 2 miles General Gilbert rode up to my line and directed me to take position with two brigades to the right of the road leading from Springfield to Perryville. I was directed to place two brigades in position on that hill, leaving one brigade in the valley to the left of the road as a reserve. I went up and formed my two brigades, which were in the advance on the hill, and was directed there to wait orders by General Gilbert. I had no orders directly from General Buell, but after 7 in the evening I had orders to form two of my brigades in line of battle, and encamped in front of General Buell's headquarters, and received orders from him personally to advance one brigade as outpost and lay there that night. I placed my men in position about 12 o'clock on the right of the road in sight of the town of Perryville. This was on the 8th. I remained there for orders until Sheridan's line was attacked by the enemy. It was a pretty severe skirmish. An effort was made to take a battery that was in an advanced position and was repulsed by Sheridan, and a few moments after that time to Sheridan's right and my front there was a large force of the enemy, a full division, if not more, concentrated, and had commenced a movement on Sheridan's right. In the mean time Sheridan had sent a messenger saying that unless he was supported or re-enforced he would have to fall back. I directed the messenger to return and to say to Sheridan that I was watching the movements of the enemy and would strike them before they reached his right. In ten minutes I ordered Colonel Carlin, colonel Thirty-eighth Illinois, then in command of the Thirty-first Brigade, to advance under cover of the timber as far as possible, and directed him to break the enemy's lines there without firing a gun. He proceeded under the order until he had arrived within 150 yards of this concentration under cover of the timber and a kind of half-hedge fence. There were thorn bushes innumerable along the fence after he left the timber that covered his movements. In consequence of the timber and the brush he got to within 150 yards without being discovered, and under my direction ordered a double-quick at the charge of the bayonet and drove the enemy without firing a gun. As soon as they were repulsed they were driven into the town of Perryville, $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 miles. That must have been about 3 o'clock or probably later, perhaps nearly 4. There is an elevation on the side of the town. On our arrival at that elevation there was a battery opened upon us, shooting across the town. I ordered up four pieces of Carlin's battery, two pieces having been detached for supporting General McCook, and two or three pieces of another battery in my division opened fire upon this battery, in the mean time throwing our skirmishers into Perryville. In twenty minutes we silenced the battery on the other side of the town and had driven the enemy out of the town of Perryville. I sent my aide-de-camp to direct the commanding officer of that regiment to change his direction to the left of the town and rather to the rear of the enemy and directed Colonel Carlin to support him. I rode back to the brigade that was following up for the purpose of supporting Carlin's brigade about 600 yards; it may have been more, but not exceeding 700 yards. This regiment that had changed their direction to the left of the town had captured thirteen wagon loads of ammunition, two ambulances, and two caissons, said to be of the Washington Battery, and brought them off the field.

Before I had changed my direction I was visited by General Gilbert's aide-de-camp and directed to hold back; that I was acting rashly and would not be sustained. I had not followed General Gilbert's aide-de-camp's directions, but preferred my own, and took possession of the hill, and I said if General Gilbert desires to give me orders I wanted them in writing; that I had received a great many orders from his staff officers that were not sustained by him, and if he desired me to fall back he must bring me a written order from General Gilbert. At the time of the capture of these wagons—perhaps a little before—I received an order in pencil, directing me to fall back on a line with General Sheridan, who commanded the left of our army corps in that fight. I told him I would obey the order, and fell back with one brigade in line with General Sheridan. With the other brigade I exercised my own discretion, and so far as Carlin's brigade was concerned I directed him to remain till we got further orders.

After falling back I occupied a commanding position, with artillery covering the town of Perryville and the Danville road. I directed him to remain until we had specific orders from headquarters. The other brigade fell back in line with General Sheridan's and within supporting distance, knowing that General Wood's advanced brigade was within striking distance. He had notified me through my aide-de-camp that he was there. I occupied that position all night.

I never saw anything of General Gilbert from the time the fight commenced till 3 the next morning, on the field. He came to where I was lying under a tree between 2 and 3 o'clock next morning. In the mean time I had visited General Buell and advised him of my position, and soon General Gilbert came, and that was the first time I saw him after he ordered me to take my position on the heights to the right of the road.

In justice to General Buell I should state that when I came in he said I had the only face that looked like victory since the commencement of the fight.

Question. What explanation did General Gilbert give of his conduct?

He never gave me any.

Question. Did he ever give you any?

Not of his conduct there. After the time I followed in pursuit of the rebel army, under the direction of General Gilbert he undertook to explain why he was not in the front to direct personally.

Question. What reason did he give?

He said I might think it strange his not coming some time to the front. His staff annoyed me from the time I went into the corps till I left it. They would come and order a brigade to do a certain thing as direct from General Gilbert, as they said, and when I talked to General Gilbert he denied authorizing such an order.

After I had engaged the enemy for about three hours in front of the town of Lancaster we advanced slowly and steadily, and he came up to me after he had ordered me to fall back within a mile of Lancaster. He came up, and I told him we had committed a great error by not taking possession of that road; that I had discovered a large number of wagons passing there, and I was satisfied the enemy were getting away in the rear with their transportation trains. Had he permitted me to advance on that road I could have cut off a large number of wagons. He said there was no water and that we could not make an encampment. Our men, I told him, had been without water, and could have stood it for one night. Said he, "You may think it strange that I was not in the front, but I remained in the rear for the purpose of supporting you." I replied that I preferred he would just let me alone and permit me to exercise my own judgment. I had lost all confidence in General Gilbert. I did not know whether he was captain or general. I only knew him from the fact that he wore two stars. He was commanding an army corps as a major-general.

Question by General TYLER. How was he placed there?

I don't know. I was ordered to report to Major-General Gilbert.

Question by the PRESIDENT. Was he not major-general?

I saw him subsequently at Louisville and he had only one star.

Question. Was he a brigadier-general?

I don't know. I saw in the papers that he was appointed brigadier.

Question by JUDGE-ADVOCATE. How long did the army remain at Perryville after the action there and what course did it take?

Two whole days. I marched the third day.

Question. In what direction did you march?

I started out and struck the Harrodsburg pike, marched on about three miles, and went on the road between the road to Harrodsburg and the road to Danville; there is a road between the two.

Question. You were there in pursuit of the rebels; they were marching in the direction of Harrodsburg?

I understood they had marched from Harrodsburg to Danville on the pike. We marched half way in the direction of Perryville to Harrodsburg and then struck in a direct [map produced] route to Danville between the two roads. After leaving Bowling Green I was ordered to take the Merry Oak road to Glasgow, and was ordered to proceed cautiously, by General Buell himself, to Wright's Store, to encamp that night, which I did. I went in pursuance of General Buell's direction, and met a brigade of cavalry, which came into camp some three hours after I had arrived there. I have a memorandum from you [addressing General Buell] saying unless I met the enemy I was to proceed the next morning to a certain point, Bell's Tavern, a railroad station, where there was a cavalry force said to be.

Question. Did you understand the object of Bragg's army in marching toward Harrodsburg after that action at Perryville?

I know no other reason than that they were cut off in the Danville road by a portion of my command. We covered with parts of two batteries the Danville road, and with the force on my right, had we been supported, we could have held the position against Bragg's whole army. I know another reason: the supposition was they were to make a junction with Kirby Smith, and I subsequently understood they did.

Question. How did it come that that position was not maintained?

It was. I have a diagram which will give you an idea of the country there. (Diagram produced.) The town of Perryville and the Danville road were covered by parts of two of my batteries. The road leading from Perryville to Harrodsburg was 10 miles, on which the enemy retreated, and I am told that from Harrodsburg to Danville is 10 miles. My battery was on an elevation west of the town. That is the position my batteries occupied, supported by Carlin's brigade, with six or seven guns in position there.

(Map produced as furnished by General Buell on the night of the 8th*.)

Question. What prevented you from holding Perryville?

I did hold it. I advanced to Perryville.

Question. What was there to prevent the army moving forward to Danville?

I do not know of anything. Next morning, on the 9th, I was ordered to proceed to Good-Night Springs, and found on the field 2,000 stand of small-arms—on the road up and at Good-Night Springs—which I collected and turned over to General Gilbert's ordnance officer.

Question. What would have been the effect of the army moving on to Danville instead of Harrodsburg?

We could have cut off the entire army by moving in that direction at the time I moved in the direction of Good-Night Springs.

By General TYLER:

Question. You supposed the enemy were whipped that night and had retreated?

General McCook told me he thought he had been a little worsted, but I thought we had done all that could be required of us on the right.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Where were General Buell's headquarters during the action of the 8th?

It was back on this road, perhaps 2½ miles from the battle-field. I could not tell definitely.

Question. Was there any severe fire of musketry?

Not very, till we got into Perryville, where we had a brisk skirmish; but the musketry was on General McCook's front. From half past two for an hour and a half we heard musketry. It was terrific.

Question. You marched to Perryville expecting to meet the enemy in force there?

I did. I think I reported to General Buell on the night of the 7th that I could have taken possession of the town that night. I do not recollect the remark he made, but the next night when I told him I occupied the town of Perryville he appeared surprised.

Question. Cannot you recollect the conversation that occurred between you and General Buell the evening before?

He said I was rash, intimating that I was exceedingly eager, but I could not recollect the exact words. I recollect very distinctly telling him that we could have entered the town, but he laughed and turned it off in some way. We had been skirmishing during the evening before the battle.

Question. Was General Buell at his headquarters during that engagement?

I do not know. General Buell was thrown from his horse.

General BUELL. I authorize the witness to state that I was at my headquarters.

The WITNESS. General Buell was lame from the fall from his horse.

Question. To whom did you report the result of your fight?

To General Buell at least as late as 9 o'clock at night. The fight was over about

5. We fell back about 5, or perhaps before. I sent an aide-de-camp with a rough diagram, made on horseback, to General Gilbert, showing him the locality, but he came back and reported that he could not find him. I was unable to get any orders, except as I told you, through his aide-de-camp, and I refused to obey them, because they had deceived me before. I instructed the aide-de-camp to go to General Gilbert and say to him that we were in the rear of the enemy's batteries and I asked for instructions. That was after I was ordered back by the aide-de-camp of General Gilbert.

Question. What would have been the effect of your advancing at the time you received the order from General Gilbert?

Had I been supported I could have taken the Washington Battery. I had made a reconnaissance in person, and there was no infantry supporting the battery except those that were taken prisoners—about 170. Everything that I did discover was in advance of the batteries and fighting McCook; the battery was also shelling McCook.

Question. Were you present at a meeting of officers at Prewitt's Knob, in which the movements of the army were discussed and General Buell's conduct commented on?

I was at no council. I was never at a council of any kind during the time I was in the Army of the Ohio.

Question. Do you recollect any conversation at General McCook's headquarters at Prewitt's Knob?

I cannot call anything to mind.

Question. Were you present at any conversation at which it was suggested that General Buell should be put under arrest and General Thomas put in command?

I never heard any such talk.

The PRESIDENT. You have stated that General Gilbert was not in the front?

I would not state that he was not at the front, but I did not see him. I don't know where he was. After he ordered me to the right of the road I never saw General Gilbert till next morning. I frequently asked him for an explanation of the object of the movement and what he expected us to do, but he failed to give me any reply. General Schoepf was in command of one of the divisions. He was in the reserve.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. What was the strength of Gilbert's corps?

I cannot come near it. My best impression is about 21,000. On reflection I think it was larger.

Question. How many batteries had he?

He had two full batteries and a four-gun battery, and my impression was that each of the other divisions in our corps had three batteries. It was reported to me, as General Wood advanced, Bragg was within a mile of Crittenden's corps on my right. That was about 4 o'clock in the evening, within sight of the Danville road. My division was 8,500 when at Louisville. I think Sheridan's division was not as strong as mine. General Schoepf had more regiments, but mine were fuller. I think we had that number of men.

(Diagram produced and the positions of Sheridan's and Mitchell's divisions marked.)

I have not studied the diagram sufficiently to fix the distance with exactness. My original line was $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Perryville. We could not see McCook's from our position. Sheridan was next on my left and then McCook.

The PRESIDENT. I would like to have you mark upon this map the line of your advance and how far you had got.

The distance was about 600 yards, entirely out of town.

The PRESIDENT. Had you plenty of ammunition?

An ammunition wagon to each regiment very close at hand. I had but little use for small-arms. The brigade that was taken from me by General Gilbert without notifying me was exhausted of their ammunition, and the cartridge-boxes were filled on the morning of the 9th, when they were supplied with a full complement of ammunition. They lost something over 400 men, 2 field officers killed and 1 mortally wounded. I think there were 13 officers killed and wounded. General Gilbert came to me and asked me to send some officers of influence to reconcile that brigade, saying it was demoralized. I sent my acting assistant adjutant-general, and marched the regiments over in as good condition as I ever saw any command and as eager to go into the fight again, without any show of demoralization. Four officers were slightly wounded and the balance very severely.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. General, you stated in your direct testimony that you said to me that you could have gone into Perryville with your division on the evening of the 7th?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did you base that opinion on anything you saw?

Well, from the manner of the enemy—the manner in which they fell back, not showing a disposition to make a very stubborn stand. General Buell replied to me that I could not have done it with twice my number; and furthermore told me that if I could go in there with my division he would put another star on my shoulder.

Question. How closely^ewere the enemy pursued in the town that day?

I think, to the best of my recollection now, it was not less than $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles by the road. Across the hills it might have been nearer, but by the way we went it was that distance.

Question. What time did your division advance on the morning of the 9th?

It was quite early; I could not tell; it could not have been much after 6 o'clock, probably before. We opened fire by 6 on the cavalry trying to pass the Danville road. I was in line of battle an hour before I had any orders to advance. General Gilbert sent an order after we had been in line of battle an hour. The firing was opened from our advanced brigade by Colonel Carlin.

Question. Did you see anything of the corps on your right as you were advancing on the morning of the 9th?

Yes, sir, I did; the advance brigade. It advanced about the same time I did in the morning to my right across the Danville road. I think the whole corps crossed there. I know the advance brigade went in the direction of Harrodsburg. I supposed at the time that the cavalry was driven up by that division from their extreme flank, where they had been the day before, but I could not tell. I know they appeared to be in a great hurry to get out of the way as fast as possible. We got ten or twelve shots at them from our artillery. This was part of Crittenden's corps. I met General Wood that morning, but cannot state exactly the time. He was commanding one of General Crittenden's divisions.

DECEMBER 9, 1862.

Testimony of General McCook continued (from December 8).

I then proceeded to the point where the Mackville and Perryville road crosses the Springfield and Dicksville road. There I met my aide-de-camp, Captain Hoblitzell. Colonel Gooding commanded the brigade. He reported to me, and I ordered him to his position with the regiments and told him what to do. Capt. O. F. Pinney, Fifth Wisconsin Battery [also reported], and I posted him in a position near the skirts of the wood near the crossing to the right of Mackville and Perryville road. The fight still continued fiercely. This was about 5 o'clock in the evening or half past 5; dark came on about 6. General James [B.] Steedman, who commands a brigade, also reported to me that he had his brigade ready for duty. I ordered his batteries into position to the right of pickets and posted his infantry to the right of these batteries. The brigade was formed in two lines, extending nearly to where Colonel McCook's brigade was in camp. About the time I got this brigade posted it was quite dark and the firing had ceased on both sides.

I remained in front of this line, watching the movements of the enemy, till half past nine. I established my headquarters about 70 yards in front of this line and about 150 yards in rear of Russell's house, where I had been in the morning. I remained on the right in front of this line because I thought the main attack would be made in that direction. The moon came up, a bright moon, and they could have fought as well as by day. Finding there was no motion or drum movements of the enemy that I could discover, I rode to the left of my line to see how it had retired. This was about half past nine at night. I went to the left, could not find General Rousseau, but found that he had retired his line from the position they had occupied in the evening and afternoon. The enemy's camp-fires were around the lines, almost surrounding his position, and our pickets were 40 yards from each other. They were talking. I there saw Colonel Starkweather, who commanded a brigade, and Colonel Harris, and Colonel Hall, One hundred and fifth Ohio. I asked them what kind of a position they were in. They said almost surrounded by the enemy; that the pickets were within 40 yards of each other; that the rebel cavalry threatened them on the left; that Bush's and Stone's batteries were in a position to be taken at any moment in case the enemy made a heavy assault.

I determined that the line should be changed, but from what I saw I did not think the enemy would attack till daylight. My reason for this was they came from Harrodsburg to give us battle. I immediately rode off to select a stronger line, to retire these batteries and Rousseau's infantry to a better position. I selected it. General Rousseau then rode up. He had been at General Buell's headquarters. I carried him with me to select the position for his line and marked it, with the left on Mackville road and the right resting on the point where Steedman's was posted on high ground. This was a good position. During the night I had succeeded in taking off all my ammunition and ambulances and hospital wagons. I succeeded in the night in getting off that road.

General Buell sent me word in the evening late that if I had to retreat to retreat by the Dicksville and Springfield road, which led to his headquarters; therefore the Mackville road was of no importance to me. This was about half past nine. I told General Rousseau that I considered this change of line was a very hazardous one, and, if the representations were correct, as soon as they heard the first gun there would be an attack made on them. I told him not to form the movement yet; that General Buell had sent for me; he wished to see me. I told him I would go to General Buell and ask for more assistance to keep a certain position to cover this change of line. Then we started off to General Buell's headquarters, and reached there about 12 o'clock at night. I found General Thomas at General Buell's headquarters. I reported to him in regard to my fight in the afternoon. I told him what the condition of affairs was and told him where the line was. He replied that I was cut off from him. I told him yes, from the Dicksville and Springfield road, where General Rousseau had retired the line. I asked him for two brigades for about two hours; that I wanted them to hold a certain position in order that I could change my line. I then asked him for one brigade. He positively declined giving me two brigades, and I then asked him for one. He told me I was cut off. When I was just coming off the ground General Rousseau's aide-de-camp told me the change had been made. The line of battle which had been formed by my two divisions was the best possible one that could have been selected in my opinion. I examined the ground, and I examined it six days after, when all the facts connected with the battle were known, and I am conscientiously satisfied that it was the best disposition that could have been made of those troops in order to have saved my communication on the Mackville road. The posting of Starkweather's brigade was admirable. He posted the brigade there himself. I did not see the posting of that brigade myself. General Rousseau deserved the credit of it.

The enemy were whipped on the left thoroughly; they were routed on my center, routed on my right. I was badly whipped. I believe re-enforcements could have been sent me without prejudice to the cause; and I have since said that had I my old division that I fought with at Shiloh I would have been responsible for Bragg's escape that night.

General BUELL. I object to this expression of feeling.

The WITNESS. I have no feeling in this matter toward General Buell, but have stood by him throughout his removal from the Army of the Ohio.

General BUELL. My objection is that it is an expression of opinion, or rather an expression of feeling with regard to the matter, based upon circumstances that developed themselves after the event. I do not wish it to be understood that it is an expression of prejudice or of feeling toward me.

The court was then cleared for deliberation.

Upon being opened the judge-advocate announced that the objection was not sustained; opinions of corps and division commanders being considered important to the Commission to enable it to come to a conclusion upon the matters before it.

The WITNESS. I will state, in reference to the conversation or report, that I believed the enemy would attack me at daylight, and General Buell disagreed with me in opinion. He didn't think so. Next morning I received an order to close my line to the right and ordered Steedman's brigade to return to its command to General Schoepf.

General BUELL. Was that a written order?

The WITNESS. Well, sir, I think it was a pencil written order, a note from Colonel Fry. That order reached me; and I closed my lines to the right, and Steedman's brigade went to join its proper division. I will also state that about the time Steedman's brigade was coming to my assistance I met Major Wright, who reported that his re-enforcements were there, and asked me how I was getting along. I replied to him that I was doing the best I could with the troops I had, and with these troops I thought I could hold my position there. That was about 5.30; it was nearly dark. The next day my corps was ordered to advance and take a position to the right of Dicksville.

I wish to state something in addition. At the time that the attack was made upon me at the battle of Chaplin Hills the co-operation of General Gilbert's corps, I believe, would have secured a complete victory. My right was turned almost within view of his troops. But what his orders were in regard to these movements I know nothing. Co-operation there would have secured a victory in my opinion. I don't think General Gilbert was in front during the battle. I don't know whether he was or not, but I have inquired of his officers and they say he was not. I thought it was his duty to co-operate with me on that day. It is the duty of a general to relieve a brother general, whatever his orders may be.

The day after the battle of Perryville my line was thrown forward about 1 mile. I cannot be positive; I think it was the second day after the battle my line was thrown forward. I think I got the order, a written note, from the chief of staff. Next day we moved forward to the Harrodsburg pike, about 2½ miles, my command resting on the Harrodsburg pike. Next day I marched to Harrodsburg; from there to Fry's Springs, 3 miles; next day 6 miles beyond Danville, and the next day 2½ miles beyond Crab Orchard, where I halted.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Have you the orders sent you, the memorandum spoken of in your evidence, and the report of your proceedings?

I have a report of the battle of Chaplin Hills. I have a number of memoranda.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. You have given us a detailed account of the marching of our forces to Louisville and thence to Perryville. Can you trace upon the map the march of the rebels under Bragg from the invasion till they reached Bardstown?

From Dunlap they came over to Sparta; they did not come on the Therman road. Some came through Spencer and Pikeville. I had information when I was at Murfreesborough that General Sam. Jones had come to Sparta. One of General Buell's men told me so. Some of them crossed at Gainesborough and some at Carthage, others at Scottsville, and concentrated at Glasgow.

General BUELL. He should be particular; he might mislead you.

The WITNESS. That is my impression; I had no charge of the secret service.

General BUELL. They did not pass through Scottsville.

The WITNESS. Part of the army crossed at Munfordville.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. At what point in that invasion ought the enemy to have been attacked by General Buell's army?

General BUELL. May I make objection to that? It requires General McCook to give evidence upon the question of duty, in regard to which he could not know the circumstances that controlled it. He may know at what point an attack might have been favorable, but he could not know that the attack ought to have been made unless he had all the information which determines the conduct of the commander of the army. He may state to the Commission at what point it might have seemed convenient.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. At what point in that invasion might an attack have been made by General Buell's army with a prospect of success?

The WITNESS. I will state that I knew nothing about the position of the enemy till I arrived at Bowling Green.

General BUELL. At what date?

The WITNESS. I don't know the date. On Monday I heard the enemy was at Glasgow; don't know where the information came from; I think from General Buell's headquarters. I had a conversation with Mr. Hobson; it was at Bowling Green. I understood the enemy was at Glasgow, about 20 miles from Bowling Green, the force estimated at about 35,000. It was simply talk among my brother generals, and I got from Mr. Hobson my impression that in addition to that troops were coming on from Nashville. We heard rumors of it. General Buell intended to attack the enemy at Glasgow, and if we had pushed on might have attacked him at Munfordville. But I was not in favor of the Munfordville attack, because I knew the advantage the enemy would have in position. I had a conversation with General Buell at Dripping Springs, and I knew that we should sacrifice a great many men if we attacked the enemy there. I think, after what has been said, if more haste had been made from Nashville and a forward movement made at Bowling Green we might possibly have reached the enemy at Glasgow. But it was a matter of speculation altogether, as I believe they were running the day that General Wood arrived at Munfordville. I believe the enemy had left it that day, at least the rear guard out of Munfordville, and it was reported they had some infantry. I presume if General Buell had marched on Bardstown he might have got a fight out of the enemy at Muldraugh's Hill. My idea was that Louisville was threatened; Cincinnati had also been threatened. Kirby Smith was in front of it, and the more haste was made in getting to Louisville the better. That was my impression. I will state that General Buell was traveling with me, and I did not take any means of acquainting myself with the position of the enemy. I considered it his business entirely. When I am marching alone I do. I would also state that when at Edgefield Junction I received a letter from General Wood, who was then encamped at Bowling Green, to make haste and hurry up, that the enemy were marching on Glasgow; also some dispatches came down from General Crittenden to Buell, which I turned over.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Was that your opinion at the time of the invasion or is it an opinion made up since from circumstances which have come to your knowledge?

It is the opinion I had at the time. I built some of the defenses of that place and knew exactly what it would take to take them.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Do I understand you to say, General McCook, that those were the only two points where the enemy might have been attacked with a prospect of success?

General BUELL. He has not stated that those points could have been attacked with a prospect of success.

The WITNESS. Unless General Buell had turned off from his course and marched to Hodgenville.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It appears to me that the witness stated that an attack could have been made with a prospect of success at points which he has not yet mentioned. I have no anxiety or wish to make points; on the contrary, I permitted this evidence to take a wide range, that all the facts in reference to this case might come before the Commission. I have no prejudice of feeling in the case.

General BUELL. I beg to express my gratification at the disposition which the judge-advocate's remarks indicate and I withdraw my objection.

NASHVILLE, December 10, 1862.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Examination of General McCook continued.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. In connection with your statement in regard to the Army of the Ohio being stretched out so much on the railroad, state, if you please, at what places the several portions were at the time Bragg commenced moving from Chattanooga.

At the time General Bragg commenced moving, my own division, and General Crittenden's, the Fifth Division, were on the march from Battle Creek to Pelham; General Schoepf's, the First Division of the Army of the Ohio, was stationed at Pelham; General Thomas, in command of the Fourth and Sixth Divisions, and General Nelson and Wood were at McMinnville; General Hazen, with one brigade of Nelson's division, was stationed at Murfreesborough; Rousseau's (Third) division was marching from Huntsville.

Question. Can you state what forces you had in all?

I think that our army when concentrated would have been about 45,000 men. The cavalry were posted at different points through the country and there were detached regiments stationed along the railroads to defend bridges. There were some few troops at Nashville, the number I do not know, under the command of General Dumont and Colonel Miller.

Question. Did you know the destination of our army at the time you crossed the Cumberland River?

I was under the impression I was going to Kentucky, because I was under the impression that Bragg had gone there. I will also state in connection with this that General Buell is the most uncommunicative general I have ever seen or heard of. I never knew from time to time where the other divisions of the army were posted, or when on the march from Louisville to the battle to attack Bragg at Perryville I never knew where my brother commanders were or could be found at any time.

Question. In reference to that Perryville fight, what was your force there.

My own force, including those guarding trains and everything, was about 13,000 men, but my actual force in battle was not more than about 10,000.

Question. You said in your narrative that you had a conversation with General Buell after the Perryville fight; did you give all that conversation?

I gave what I believed to be the substance of the conversation. I went to General Buell, and, picking up the map, explained the position of my lines. General Thomas was present, and also Capt. Beverly D. Williams, of my staff, who heard the conversation. I told General Buell I had had a very severe fight. He said he was surprised to hear of it and that he had not heard of it till 5 o'clock. He then talked with me at intervals. He was engaged in conversation with General Thomas as to whether we should attack the enemy in the morning or not. I explained to General Buell the position of my lines. I told him I had two batteries that had fought gallantly during the day in a very perilous situation. I told him the manner in which Rousseau had retired his line on the left; that the enemy had lit fires around him and in front of him; that the pickets were only about 40 yards apart; that there was a regiment of cavalry on the left threatening any movements that might be made, and that from appearances I believed I was surrounded. I asked General Buell for the loan of two brigades for two hours at furthest, to hold a certain position while I changed my lines to cover the movements. He told me I could not have them; he positively refused to give them to me. I then asked him if I could have one brigade. He told me I should not have another man. I was at that time very much vexed and provoked. I felt that I should have had the relief. I confidently believed that I should be attacked at daylight and I told General Buell so. It was evident to my mind that the enemy had come on to a chosen field to attack our army, and I supposed the battle would be renewed in the morning and attack if they were not attacked themselves. General Buell replied that he did not think he could be attacked.

Question. Did he give any reason for that belief?

He did not.

Question. Do you know now or did you know at the time the direction taken by the enemy after that fight? Do you know any reasons for the enemy's taking the route to Harrodsburg instead of falling back on Danville?

The matter is very simple. They were moving back to form a junction with Kirby Smith's force.

By General TYLER:

Question. Did Kirby Smith come to Harrodsburg to join them with his whole force?

Yes, sir.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Can you give any reason for the delay that occurred after that fight in pursuing the enemy?

No reason whatever. I believe they should have been vigorously pursued next morning at daylight. I will state that my troops, who had fought all day without water, could have occupied the part of a reserve very well; better soldiers I never saw.

Question. Had you pushed across to Danville instead of following the enemy around by Harrodsburg what would have been the effect?

That the retreat would have been cut off. It might possibly have driven the enemy toward Louisville.

By General TYLER:

Question. They would have had to fight a battle?

Yes, sir.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You stated in your evidence that General Buell's plan of defeating the enemy when they first crossed the Tennessee was defeated by a lack of commissary stores?

That is my impression. The railroad was certainly cut.

Question. Were not the provisions you had on hand sufficient to justify an attack there, as to following the enemy all the way from Louisville?

No, sir; they were not. At Bowling Green we had a million of rations. That amount of rations would not have been sufficient.

By General TYLER:

Question. How many days' rations had you?

The amount of provisions, I think, was equal to twenty days.

Question. Did the country furnish nothing to collect?

But little; cattle and green corn, but the corn was all quite hard, and our supply of salt was short.

Question. You stated in your examination that General Buell sent you orders that if you had to retreat to retreat on the line toward his headquarters?

Yes; to fall back from the Chaplin Hills.

Question. Did he explain to you any reason for retreating in that direction?

No, sir; it was the only one left. I should have exposed my plan to the enemy by any other.

Question. You stated in some part of your testimony that General Buell told you his whole plan for the concentration of the Army of the Ohio?

He gave me a synopsis of that plan.

Question. What was it?

Murfreesborough was the point, moving in converging lines, so that every division was in supporting distance of each other from day to day, which I think was the most perfect plan that could have been desired.

Question. You stated that you were not satisfied with the scattering of General Buell's army on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad?

Any man of judgment would say it would have taken 50,000 men to keep that railroad in running order. I never heard General Buell express his opinions about these things, but I never considered him responsible for that nor do I think his army ever did, and the facts so prove. General Buell's written instructions induced me to believe that he intended to attack the enemy at Perryville. His instructions were that on account of the want of water the enemy would oppose his entrance into that town.

The PRESIDENT. Were any special orders given you with respect to that attack?

None, except those I presented to the Commission, that I was to take my position there and ascertain what was in my front and not allow my troops to scatter and to form my line with my right resting on Gilbert near Bottom's house.

By General TYLER:

Question. You stated that the assault commenced at 2 o'clock?

Yes, sir; about 2.

Question. Was there any movement of the enemy that induced you to believe the attack would be made?

I rode to the farthest point and reconnoitered. The enemy were concealed in the dry channels of Chaplin River and in mass there, and it was difficult to see anything unless you went down to the bluff and looked over. These facts I learned afterward, of course, by dear experience.

Question. You say you reported the attack on your lines at half past three?

I sent an aide-de-camp. My aide returned to the field afterward, but brought no orders. My orders were communicated to me by Major Wright, I think it was, on General Buell's staff, who arrived on the field that evening about half an hour before dark.

Question. What were the orders?

That in case I was compelled to fall back to fall back on the Springfield road, in anticipation of support. When Major Wright was in conversation these brigades appeared. Captain Hoblitzell was marching at the head and reported that he had a brigade marching to my support.

By General DANA:

Question. What was the strength and position of the forces with which you marched toward the Anderson road?

Two brigades of infantry and three batteries of artillery. General Crittenden accompanied my command to the point where the Higginbottom turnpike ascends the mountain.

Question. About what strength?

About 4,000 would cover the entire force.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. What was the strength and position of Bragg's forces marching toward that road?

I found that my spies had misinformed me in reference to the movements of Bragg's forces. The force that was reported was a very heavy one. It was reported that Bragg had crossed with seventy regiments. Newton, in my employ as a spy, and who had proved entirely reliable, so informed me. He was a refugee from that place. Citizens also reported to me that their pickets were on the top of the hills just above my position and that their advance had reached the top of Walden's Ridge.

Question. What force was left at Nashville at the time General Buell had marched to the north?

When General Buell and I left Nashville General Thomas was here in command of the First Division; there had been a detachment of a division under General Negley; General Robert [B.] Mitchel was also here; Negley's and Paine's divisions, about 16,000 men; but there were quite a number of convalescents who could fight, and it made the force about 18,000 men that could be put in line to fight.

Question. What was the strength of the force with which General Buell marched from Nashville north?

His army was about 45,000 men after taking out the Nashville garrison; but I will not be positive.

Question. While at Bowling Green did you know anything of the garrison at Munfordville being in danger?

While there I heard that it had been attacked and had been taken, but the intelligence was uncertain. I was very anxious to know the result of it, because I had built a portion of the defenses of that place myself and I thought the defenses there would tell their tale some day yet. I was therefore the more interested in the matter. On my return in the morning I heard that the attack had been made and Colonel Wilder had repulsed it.

General TYLER. Did serious apprehensions exist in the army for the safety of Munfordville?

I did not think Bragg would be guilty of such imprudence as to go there, but that his march would be by Columbia. In the face of our army I consider it a piece of impudence, because if he went in that direction he hazarded his army. Bowling Green is 40 miles from Munfordville, and I thought he would march toward Columbia, and by that means endeavor to form a junction with Kirby Smith in Kentucky. I had no spies in that country, nor had I when General Buell was present ever interested myself in gaining information on the question. I was a general to obey his orders without questioning his plans.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. Was there any time wasted after marching from Nashville before marching to Munfordville in halting or marching or any halts which were needlessly made, not absolutely necessary?

If I knew my general's plans I would answer without question. I had a conversation with General Wood, who said we ought to march on to Munfordville, but I knew nothing of the force there.

Question. Was there a general feeling existing in the army after leaving Nashville that the march was too slow and time unnecessarily wasted on the road? Did such a feeling exist among the superior officers?

I never had any discussion with them. Some of my junior officers had discussed the matter, but I always shut them up, and would not allow such conversations in my presence. But I had no conversations with any general officers upon the subject. I will state frankly that I had confidence in my works that I had built there, and I for one was not in favor of giving battle there, because the enemy would have great advantages.

Question. That was after you knew of the surrender of the garrison there?

Yes, sir; General Buell asked me what my opinion was. He said he wanted the opinion of a man that had faith. He considered me a man not afraid to fight whenever an opportunity offered. He also knew the character of the troops I commanded, and I very frankly told him what I believed would be the result of the attack at Munfordville; that I believed we could whip them, but that it would be at a great sacrifice of life.

General TYLER. Had you been compelled by an overwhelming force to retreat toward General Buell's headquarters what would have been the condition of your army; would you have been sacrificed or fought your way back?

I would never have left with my troops alive. With the changes I had made during the night I could have retreated on the Springfield road.

The PRESIDENT. When General Bragg's army debouched from the Sequatchie Valley what was the position of General Buell's army in reference to the advance of his (Bragg's army); were you in advance or the rear and what distance from the point where the debouchment was made?

By that time I think most of the army was concentrated at or around Murfreesborough or on those converging lines marching toward Murfreesborough.

By General TYLER:

Question. Was our army in the advance or in the rear of Bragg's army?

I did not know where he was. My idea was that General Buell intended to attack him at some point near McMinnville debouching into the valley of the Tennessee, but his provisions did not admit of it, and had he gone and fought a battle he would not have had an opportunity of pursuing them and making it a decisive battle.

Question. Could he have made them retrograde through the valley and take up another line?

I have never been in that portion of Tennessee, and I cannot give you an intelligent answer to that question.

Question. Suppose he had been headed off, what would have been his course?

Gone back beyond the Tennessee River or he might have taken a position in the mountains themselves, but he could not have advanced or got supplies there. He might have got supplies from Chattanooga or Pikeville or that neighborhood of country. The Sequatchie Valley was a very rich one; any given amount of forage for an army as large as any general would wish to handle might be obtained there. I would state that I always had the most implicit confidence in General Buell as a general, but he was the most uncommunicative general I have ever seen or read of; that is, to his brother generals. He kept his own secrets and plans till there was an absolute necessity for them to be known. I believe that the department of the Army of the Ohio was the most important command in the Army, and without the army being greatly increased in strength no general could operate with any hope of success in Tennessee. It was my opinion then and it is my opinion now. It is the largest contract of the war that is on the table now.

By General ORD:

Question. On the march from Corinth was there much marauding or plundering?

No, sir; there was not. I never allowed it. Some time in August or September there was an order authorizing the appropriation of property for the use of the army received from Washington.

Question. Did that make any difference?

Yes, sir; it ruined the discipline of our army to a certain extent. It was the worst order that was ever published for a body of troops. General Pope's orders on the Potomac was the cause of it. Our soldiers read it and believed it. It will demoralize any army in the world. I never failed to give redress to those inhabitants who complained of depredations, and I arrested every field officer in one entire brigade for suffering their soldiers to burn rails to cook with. Of course there were more or less petty grievances that will occur in the march of an army through any country, but General Buell's orders were opposed to it.

Question. Did General Buell use vigorous efforts to correct this marauding after the publication of this order?

He always did. Not only on the marching of my division, but he has provoked me on many occasions by reprimanding my command when I thought he should have required me to do it. I have seen him do it personally and order men to be punished for it, and especially for straggling.

Question. Straggling is a necessary result of marauding, is it not?

No man did more to repress it than General Buell, and I am sorry to say that there are frightful causes of complaint now.

General BUELL. May I inquire if he has heard it charged against the Army of the Ohio that it was lawless?

No, sir.

By General ORD:

Question. Did this produce any feeling on the part of the officers toward General Buell?

I do not know whether it produced any feeling or not. The immediate commanders were responsible for these things and it was on them depended the execution of the orders; on them the fault-finding would fall. I believe that General Buell's army was the best ever put in the field, and I have heard General Roscerans say it was the best organized army that ever was, and that is my belief this day. There was never a more untiring general than General Buell. I never knew when he slept. I have been at his headquarters at all hours, but never found him asleep. I have spoken to him many times about it.

Question. Did you get the newspapers in your camp during the months of August and September?

We did not get them very frequently during that time, for I think the railroad was cut.

Question. Was it apprehended among the army that General Buell's conduct would be criticised in the newspapers?

I was under the impression that it would be. I have been abused by the Abolition press North and I hope I shall continue to be.

Question. Do you think the remarks of the newspapers had any influence in producing insubordination in the Army?

In one case I do. There was a pest of a correspondent in my division that I was after all the time, but could never catch. I think it would have an effect upon soldiers. I remember once General Buell was called an ass, but I never could find out who the correspondent was. As a rule I expel correspondents; they are not judges of what to publish and what to suppress. I believe they are the worst enemies of our Army, for I have seen publications that have given information respecting my movements known only to my officers high in command—facts in relation to the organization of my division and its movements. I know that correspondents complained bitterly because General Buell never encouraged them. The same complaint was made against me. I had the correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette arrested and put out of the army because he published things he had no business to. I will further state, in this country, above all others, it is a difficult thing to obtain anything like satisfactory evidence of the position of the enemy, for their front is always covered with cavalry, and it is very difficult to get spies into their lines. I have always found it so, and there are no citizens on whom you can rely. Those who have information and are disposed to tell it are afraid to do so.

By General BUELL:

Question. Will you please give the particulars of your march from Corinth to Battle Creek? Give the date of your departure from Corinth and your arrival at Florence; how you were employed there at the time of your march from Huntsville to Battle Creek. Give the distances, if you remember them.

After the evacuation of Corinth there was a portion of General Buell's army sent down in pursuit after Bragg's army. My division remained near Corinth, I think, three days. General Buell then returned and ordered me to march to Iuka, which is a distance of 45 miles. I remained at Iuka one day, when Generals Nelson and Crittenden joined the column. General (then Colonel) Jackson's cavalry were also here. Wood's division was also in that vicinity; a portion of General Wood's division, Hascall's brigade, was, I think, scattered along the railroad, building bridges and repairing that road. I marched with my division, remaining one day at Iuka. I then marched to Florence, Ala., a distance, I think, of about 40 miles. General Buell had previously sent his engineer to prepare boats and means of ferrying the army. The bridge at Florence had been destroyed by the rebels. At the earliest possible moment these boats were ready—I think the second day after our arrival. General Buell placed me in charge of ferrying my own division, Crittenden's division, and of the reserve artillery. This took, I think, two days and a half, working as late at night as we could. I also had to build a road down to Jackson's old ferry. I built it by General Buell's orders. I remained one day at Florence. I then marched on to within 6 miles of Huntsville, Ala., without interruption, making long marches, a distance, I think, of 70 miles. I there received an indulgence of ten days' leave of absence and went to Ohio. When I returned my division was at Stevenson. I joined it on the 17th of July. On the next day I marched to Battle Creek. My average marches were 16 miles a day. The weather was very dry, warm, and dusty. We did not lay a day longer than was necessary at Florence, except to repair the ferry and convey the troops over. I worked night and day, and knew more about this than even General Buell himself.

Question. Do you know of any measures taken while you were at Florence to have the supplies in readiness at points in North Alabama for the troops when they arrived?

I recollect there were trains sent from Eastport and every effort was made on the river to get supplies up. The water was low.

Question. To get supplies into North Alabama, Huntsville, and around there?

Every possible exertion was made in the repairing of the railroads to get supplies and every disposable wagon was ferried across as soon as it was prepared, and these wagons were sent up to Reynolds' Station and were hauling supplies to Athens, Ala. My own supply trains, General Crittenden's, and General Wood's were all at work, and every available team was used to throw supplies there.

Question. With all these trains was it possible to accumulate any supplies in advance?

It was not possible by using every means then in the power of the Army of the Ohio.

Question. Do you know whether the work on these railroads was prosecuted with all possible industry?

A. Yes, sir; with the utmost vigor.

Question. In your position of command at Battle Creek did you exert yourself to obtain information of the strength of the enemy at Chattanooga?

I used every means in my power. There was not a day in which I was not expecting some persons to return to me with information.

Question. Were there any of your informants that you had confidence in?

Yes, sir.

Question. State, if you please, what information they gave you in regard to the strength of the enemy at Chattanooga; that is, shortly before you marched or about that time.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. That is precisely what you objected to in my examination.

General BUELL. Precisely; and the objection you did not sustain; but the case is entirely different. I am endeavoring to draw out the information which it was necessary to obtain and on which every commander regulates the movements of his army.

My impression was that the entire army that had been at Corinth was at Chattanooga. When I was in command at Battle Creek some of the enemy's camps were in sight of some of my signal stations. Our pickets were on opposite sides of the Tennessee River. As far as the eye could go the river was picketed and in force. General McCown was in command at Chattanooga when I first went there. He in a short time was superseded by General Bragg. They had their troops stationed at different points back of Chattanooga, near the Lookout Mountain, at the junction of the Will's Creek Railroad. They had troops stationed also in front of me, a division at Shell Mound, and scattered down the railroad toward Bridgeport, and carried information to their officers every hour. Cars went down, and were busy, particularly at night, going and coming, and they could have had no reason for running where they did except for the transportation of troops. They had all the railroad bridges guarded by brigades.

By General BUELL :

Question. Will you state what estimate was placed upon the strength of Bragg's army in round numbers?

From the best information, my impression is that he had about 75,000 men. I believed the entire army of Corinth was there. Soldiers from Alabama were there. I got this information from deserters.

Question. Did you report this information to me from time to time as you received it?

I had communication with you two or three times a day, sometimes oftener. Whenever I received information it was telegraphed to you at once.

Question. Were there any means of crossing the Tennessee River?

None whatever, except by making bridges. There were no boats, except one small boat at Battle Creek, which I found sunken, and which had capacity for carrying about 40 men. I will state, in addition, on the opposite side of the river was a line of rifle pits occupied by the enemy where it was approachable to ferry.

Question. Suppose the means of crossing the river provided, were the means of supplying the army such as to make it possible for the army to advance to the enemy's country?

No, sir; we were on half rations at the time and just drawing our rations from day to day. The country in that vicinity offered no supplies whatever, except a few cattle hid in the Cumberland Mountains, and the country east of us had been very thoroughly foraged by the enemy.

Question. Do you know what points in North Alabama and what line of road from there to Nashville were still occupied when you marched to Battle Creek?

I am not positive, but I think the Tennessee and Alabama Railroad was occupied. I think the bridge over Duck River was completed. The railroad from Stevenson to Murfreesborough was occupied. I am not certain whether the railroad from Huntsville to Stevenson was occupied or not. There was a small force there when I left the place.

Question. Do you know whether the abandonment of North Alabama and all points on the railroad leading from there were simultaneous with your movement; or was your movement independent of that, having in view the possession of that country and those lines?

That question I am not prepared to answer. One thing I will say: it was absolutely necessary to abandon that country, whether the enemy came to Middle Tennessee or Kentucky.

Question. Suppose it was my plan to hold Alabama and the line of road from there to Nashville, say Huntsville, Stevenson, and the road thence to Nashville, and supposing also I held McMinnville, please to state what was the importance of Altamont as a point of concentration or as a point through which the enemy could advance.

The enemy could have marched down to Murfreesborough or they could have marched directly on McMinnville. They had their option, if they held that place.

Question. Do you know anything of the character of Caney Creek, a stream which passes between McMinnville and Sparta?

I do not. I believe the country is rough, but nothing more.

Question. Did the interruption of the line of communication of the army with Louisville and the means which the enemy had of continuing that interruption make it necessary to them to throw at least a portion of the army into Kentucky independent of the presence of an enemy into Tennessee?

Absolutely necessary; and I was expecting and feared all the time that General Buell's army would have to abandon that country for supplies, if for nothing else.

NASHVILLE, December 11, 1862—10 a. m.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Examination of General McCook continued.

Question. Please state, from your observation, what you know of the practicability of maintaining the available part of the army at Altamont.

It was absolutely impossible to do it. I know of no place on the top of the Cumberland Mountains where a division of 10,000 men could have lived a week. I was stationed at Altamont myself till my animals ate up every available stack of fodder in reach of me on the mountain. When I left my position at Altamont all my supply of stock water was exhausted. We had but one spring, and that was up on a run, and the soldiers were clamoring about that run to get water for their canteens when I left there. There was a little water in a stream about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Altamont. The water was standing in pools, but was stagnant and not fit for use nor sufficient in quantity anywhere near. All supplies that possibly could reach that army would have had to be hauled from adjacent coves from 10 to 14 miles, and for anything like a supply you would have to go 20 miles, and nothing then could have been obtained but green blade fodder, and that would had to have been wagoned up the mountains over the worst roads I ever saw. It took my own division train, when I was traveling with reduced baggage, from 8 a. m. to 12 at night to pull up the mountains, and then only with the great assistance of my men. I had companies stationed along the road at distances of 100 yards apart to help the wagons up, and I think I had the reputation in the Army of the Ohio of having the best transportation in it, that is, the animals were in the best condition in it.

Question. Do you know any point at which an army concentrated could prevent an enemy from crossing the Cumberland Mountains into the plains of Tennessee?

No, sir; I do not know any point that could prevent them from crossing into the Tennessee Valley.

Question. What would you think of the plan of distributing the army which I commanded, say, from Decherd to Sparta, so as to guard the different passes by which an enemy could debouch into the plains of Tennessee?

I think it would have subjected the army to be whipped in detail, because the communication between Sparta and McMinnville is bad, and therefore it would have isolated the troops at Sparta, and therefore subjected them to capture or death. The troops at Pelham or McMinnville might have been concentrated in the rear somewhere.

Question. Supposing the stream which passes between McMinnville and Sparta and the character of the country between those points generally being such as to afford more than one or two practicable passes, would it or not be practicable for an enemy to cross from Pikeville to Sparta safely?

Yes, sir; I think it could be concentrated there.

(Army report, August 20, introduced by General Buell.)

Question. Please examine the morning report for 20th August, here submitted for you, and state from it the actual available force that was operating against the army of General Bragg at that time.

The morning report of the divisions that were operating in front number as follows :

	Men.
General Schoepf, First Division.....	6,000
General McCook, Second Division.....	7,855
General Nelson, Fourth Division.....	6,888
General Crittenden, Fifth Division.....	3,377
General Wood, Sixth Division.....	5,640
McCook, Cavalry Brigade.....	640
Total.....	30,400

Question. With all the information you have obtained from first to last in regard to the strength of the rebel army under General Bragg, by information derived from spies and other information and by actual contact with that army, what credence would you attach to the statement that when it crossed the Cumberland Mountains it did not exceed 22,000 infantry and artillery?

Well, sir, I would not have believed it, and any man who would have come to me to give such information as that I would have suspected of treachery and would have been very apt to have taken charge of him. I knew who the division commanders were, and had the organization of the army, which proved to be correct.

Question. At what point on the march of Bragg's army from Sparta into Kentucky could it certainly have been known that Kentucky instead of Nashville was its destination?

I think when the enemy had arrived at Tomkinsville, Ky., for I was a little apprehensive that they were going to fall back and go in at Gallatin, Ky.

Question. What is the distance from Carthage and Gainesborough, the points at which the enemy crossed the Cumberland River, to Glasgow?

The distance from Gainesborough to Glasgow about 45 miles; from Carthage to Glasgow 50 miles.

Question. What is the distance from Nashville to Glasgow?

By Scottsville, about 85 miles; by Bowling Green, which is the best traveled road, 95 miles.

Question. Was it necessary for the army on the march from Nashville to go via Bowling Green?

It was absolutely necessary, because we were without supplies and we had a million of rations stored there in anticipation of the railroad being cut.

Question. Do you know when the rebel army reached Glasgow or when it marched from there?

I do not remember the precise date.

Question. Of what importance was Munfordville as a military post?

Munfordville was an important military post, because it guarded the bridge over Green River.

Question. Did it control the movements of an army from Glasgow going into Kentucky?

No, sir; because it was a better road to keep to the right.

Question. Its importance was then determined by the value of the bridge?

Yes, sir.

Question. How long would it take to rebuild that bridge?

With natural advantages, I should think it could be rebuilt in twelve days.

Question. Was it not actually rebuilt in less time?

I can't say positively as to that; I cannot answer that question.

Question. Would you have considered the object of the post at Munfordville of sufficient importance for a small garrison to attempt to hold it against a large army, under the circumstances, at the time?

Under the present circumstances I would not. No, sir; I would not.

Question. Supposing that I had had knowledge at the very moment of the crossing of the Cumberland River by the rebel army, would it have been possible for my army to have reached Glasgow as soon as the rebel army?

No, sir, it would not; not with a force sufficient to fight that army. No, sir, you could not have reached Glasgow.

Question. How much time do you suppose would have been lost in getting information of that movement after the enemy had crossed?

Well, sir, I could not give an estimate as to that. I can say that the first positive information that I had was from a note from General Wood at Edgefield Junction, on the morning General Buell arrived there, and this information was confirmed by a trusty preacher at Tyree Springs. I cannot fix the dates.

Question. When did you march for Bowling Green after that information was received?

I was ordered to march on the next morning at daylight, and I got off at 6 o'clock a. m. and made a long march; the delay was caused by General Buell changing my order of march. He required me then to place all my troops in front of my baggage trains and to be prepared for battle at any moment.

Question. Was it to be supposed that an army crossing the river at Carthage and designing to invade Kentucky might aim to strike first at Bowling Green?

Bowling Green was the first objective of the enemy when I left Nashville, and I had a conversation with General Buell on that subject, either in his quarters or on the road, in which he expressed a fear that they would get there in advance of him. My impression was that there was a million of rations stored there for our army and I was marching there to get my part of them, and if General Buell had not had Wood's and Rousseau's divisions there I believe the enemy would have gone in and taken possession of the fortifications.

Question. What was the immediate object when the army marched from Bowling Green?

To attack the enemy at Glasgow.

Question. Were the troops marched by certain roads with a view to that attack?

Yes, sir, they were; Rousseau's column was turned off to the right; I was furnished with a map and my route defined.

Question. When was it known at headquarters or in the army that the enemy had left Glasgow?

I first was satisfied of the fact at Dripping Springs, at the end of the first day's march.

Question. Where did you march the next day after the march to Dripping Springs?

The next day I marched to Prewitt's Knob.

Question. When there did you march from there for Munfordville?

I remained at Prewitt's Knob all next day and until 4 o'clock p. m. of the second day, two days, till I arrived within 1 mile of Munfordville from Bowling Green.

Question. Was there any point short of that at which the turnpike road comes into the Ohio River at the mouth of Salt River on which the army could depend for supplies after those which it had with it were exhausted?

No, sir; there was not.

Question. You have stated that the position at Munfordville was a very strong one for an army; now, taking into consideration all the circumstances, even with equal chances of success, would it have been desirable to attack the enemy at that point without necessity?

I have answered that question previously, that I was not in favor of attacking the enemy there. I do not think it would.

Question. Do you know of any intelligent man in the army who, with a knowledge of these circumstances, was in favor of attacking Bragg's army at Munfordville?

Not at that time; I never heard the matter discussed; I never talked with my equals in rank about the matter; I never suffered my juniors to criticise the commanding general's actions without hushing them up; that is, in my presence.

Question. Did you have occasion to silence the criticism of intelligent men on this subject?

I had occasion on~~ce~~ to silence a colonel.

Question. Will you mention his name?

I should prefer not doing it unless compelled. It was Colonel Parrott, of the First Ohio-Volunteers; Edward A. Parrott, I believe, is his name.

Question. Were you present at an assemblage of officers, or did you ever hear of an assemblage of officers, at which it was proposed to depose General Buell from the command of the army and to place General Thomas in command?

(Question objected to by judge-advocate.)

I never was present at any such meeting nor have I ever heard of it. It is information to me if it ever occurred.

Question. Is it a fact sufficiently notorious to be reasonably certain that the invasion of Kentucky by the force of General Bragg and Kirby Smith had for its object to seize the principal cities and hold the State?

I believe that was the intention. Kirby Smith's demonstrations in front of Cincinnati was a sufficient cause to make me think so, and with the anxiety expressed by the late General Nelson I was satisfied that Louisville was in great danger. I was not anxious about Louisville as much as Cincinnati, for I believed General Buell's army concentrated about Louisville could have whipped any given amount of men that could have been set up before them.

Question. In pursuing that object was it reasonable to suppose that the enemy counted the cost of it; that is, that he estimated the means of resistance he would have to meet?

I most certainly believe he did or he would have gone and taken the city.

Question. Was it to be supposed that he would abandon that object with a single partial engagement?

No, sir; I think it was the presence of General Buell's army in Kentucky that prevented him. I do not think that the repulse that the enemy got at Chaplin Hills, near Perryville, was sufficient to have driven him from the State.

Question. By what routes might the enemy have been expected to retreat from Kentucky if he had determined to retreat without further resistance?

There were three roads left open for him. He could have gone off by Danville, Stanford, Mount Vernon, and Cumberland Gap, and could have gone the route through Stanford and Somerset, or he might have crossed the Kentucky River and escaped by Mount Sterling into Western Virginia.

Question. Did the concentration of the enemy at Harrodsburg, either previously or subsequently to the battle of Perryville indicate an intention to retreat from the State precipitately?

It did not. The march to Harrodsburg did not indicate an abandonment of the State. My information led me to believe that they would fight at a place near Harrodsburg, and when they went to Camp Dick Robinson I confidently expected to have a fight there, their position being a very strong one.

Question. Supposing it had been assumed that the enemy designed to retreat after the battle of Perryville and that he designed to retreat by way of Cumberland Gap, please state what road or roads he must have taken from Camp Dick Robinson and what position an army should have taken to interrupt him.

Our army would either had to have gone via Crab Orchard to Mount Vernon to have intercepted him or the Lancaster route and to have cut them off on the Richmond route. I should have thought the army ought to have been near London.

Question. Suppose my army to have been directed on different points you have named, then, on the assumption that the enemy was retreating finally from the State, in what position would it have placed my line of communication, supposing the enemy to have been at Harrodsburg or in that region?

It would have placed them in possession of the enemy.

Question. Did the enemy in moving from Harrodsburg go through Danville at all?

No, sir; I don't think they did. I understand that a part of their cavalry did, but their army did not.

By General BUELL:

Question. General, will you please describe the character of the country bordering the Chaplin River, on both sides, north of Perryville, from there toward Harrodsburg, west of the Harrodsburg road, and of that region of country within a scope of, say, 10 miles west from the Harrodsburg road?

The bed of Chaplin River is a very deep one. It was dry with the exception of water standing in pools. The country immediately north of Perryville was a rough one. All the country between the Mackville and Perryville road and the Harrodsburg and Perryville turnpike was rough. There were winding approaches down to the bed of the Chaplin River and approaches from the river which led toward the Harrodsburg pike. Between Perryville and Harrodsburg there was a very strong position for the enemy. The country is rugged and rough. I do not know of any good road that connects the Mackville and Perryville with the Harrodsburg road.

Question. Is it a country in which an army could operate conveniently or from which it could extricate itself if defeated?

I do not think it is, because the road I marched on I consider a bad road, and the same character of country prevails till you get into the valley of the Salt River.

Question. Supposing an army giving battle in that position which the enemy occupied at Perryville and driven back on its left and compelled to fall back, what road would it be desirable for it to take; what would be the natural line of retreat?

Their natural line of retreat would be by the Harrodsburg road.

Question. Suppose our army compelled to fall back by an attack on its left, by what roads could it have retreated ?

By the Springfield road.

Question. Any other road ?

Yes, sir; it might have fallen back on the Lebanon road.

Question. I contend there was no question as to the result of a contest between my army and the rebel army; but supposing the chances to have been equal, which risked most—the rebel army, by exposing itself to be driven from the Harrodsburg pike by an attack on its left, or my army, by supposing it to be driven from the Mackville road ?

I think the rebel army would be the most exposed.

Question. Would not the rebel army have been driven into an impracticable country, in which it must have been destroyed ?

Yes, sir; I do not think it could have existed there had it been driven into that rough country; that is, Chaplin Hills. It could not have existed there, I think.

Question. But suppose in such an attack the left of the rebel army had not been turned, by what roads could it then have retreated ?

Harrodsburg and Danville.

Question. Do you think, then, it was judicious to endeavor to cut off the enemy from the Danville road by attacking its left strongly ?

I think it would have been a good movement.

Question. What orders were given on the night of the 8th in reference to the movements of the enemy on the morning of the 9th; that is, was an attack ordered upon the enemy's position ?

On the night of the 8th of October I was at General Buell's headquarters about 12 or 1 o'clock. I met General Thomas there. I understood there was to be an attack in the morning. General Buell asked me the question if I would be ready to attack. I replied that my men were very weary and exhausted, but that we could go to work, and I understood that an attack was to be made from an order given to General Thomas. I did not see General Gilbert there, who commanded the other corps. I was very tired at the time myself and very sleepy. I had slept but very little the night before—about an hour.

Question. What part were you to take in the operations of the following day ?

I was to act as a reserve.

Question. At what hour was the attack to be made ?

At 6 o'clock in the morning.

Question. When the advance the following morning discovered that the enemy had retired, what position was your corps to take ?

My corps was to take a position, the left resting on the Dicksville road or near it, to join on to Gilbert's left.

Question. Can you state where that was to have been ?

No, sir. I know nothing about it. I went forward and selected my own position and found out where his left was—the other side of Chaplin River.

Question. Did you take that position the next day ?

That is a point in my mind which I do not exactly remember. I think it was the second day, on the morning of the 9th, General Gay made a reconnaissance in my front, the order for which I gave the judge-advocate.

Question. Do you remember anything that prevented you from taking that position ?

Nothing prevented me from moving. I think it was late on that day we moved. I recollect posting my troops there and of going to ascertain the locality, but could not find General Gilbert, but I found General Mitchell, who was then on the left of General Gilbert's corps, and my troops and Rousseau's division joined on with Mitchell's.

Question. You have spoken in your direct evidence of a road which you call the Dicksville and Springfield road; where does that road come into the Perryville and Springfield road?

I do not know the exact point on the road. There are a great many lines leading back and forth, but my impression is that it comes out near the road where there is a hospital. A man named Bottom lives there, but I cannot state the exact point, because the fences were considerably torn down, and I always rode in a direct direction.

Question. Was the country between the Perryville and Mackville road and the Perryville and Springfield road more practicable than the country bordering on Chaplin River?

Yes; it was. It was a country over which we could have moved.

Question. Did the movement which you proposed to make on the night of the 8th actually take place while you were at my headquarters?

It actually took place when I was at your headquarters and while I was on my way back.

Question. Did you not think that perhaps what you considered my refusal to give you an additional force referred to the disposition of the troops for the following day?

I did not understand it so.

Question. If that movement was actually being made while you were requesting troops, what would have been the necessity for troops or could they have been on the ground in time?

Yes, sir. I dispatched an aide-de-camp from your headquarters.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. I understand, then, that the movement was executed by your orders?

Yes, sir.

By General BUELL:

Question. Did the result prove that the additional forces were necessary?

No, sir; because the enemy retreated.

Question. You have stated that I directed you to retreat by a certain road. Did you understand that I spoke of the retreat of the army or of your portion of it?

Only of my corps, if I was compelled to fall back on the Springfield road. I had no idea that the other portion of the army were going to fall back.

Question. Were you during the march from Louisville to Perryville kept in constant communication with the rest of the army and my headquarters?

Yes, sir; as constantly as it was possible to be. I dispatched couriers, who usually found you at your headquarters. On several occasions you wrote to me to have couriers at your headquarters, but I believe that every available and efficient order you gave reached me. My orderlies, when I directed them to your headquarters, would go to where they believed you were. Once they missed your headquarters when I was at Bloomfield.

Question. Do you know on what day of the week or month you arrived at Bowling Green with your division ?

I recollect it was Sunday morning that I arrived within 3 miles of Bowling Green, but cannot state the day of the month.

Question. Would it have been possible to march your corps from Nashville to Glasgow by the time it reached Bowling Green ?

No, sir ; we could not have done it.

Question. If the surrender of Munfordville actually took place on the Monday following your arrival at Bowling Green, would it have been possible, if you started from Nashville at the time you did, to reach Munfordville in time to prevent that surrender ?

Yes, sir ; I think it could.

Question. How many days elapsed from the date of your departure from Nashville and the Monday on which the surrender of Munfordville took place ?

We arrived within 4 miles of Bowling Green Sunday morning, 6 o'clock. We marched 12 miles that morning.

Question. Could you have marched from Bowling Green, after having marched 12 miles on Sunday morning, and reached Munfordville in time to prevent the surrender of that place on Monday ?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Was it not on Wednesday ? That is my recollection of it.

(Conversation between judge-advocate and General McCook, in which it was said that the latter day was correct.)

Question. Was it supposed that the enemy was at Glasgow when you arrived at Bowling Green ?

Yes, sir ; that was my impression from all I could pick up.

Question. Supposing you had marched by forced marches to the rescue of Munfordville with the rebel army at Glasgow, would you have exposed your re-enforcements to a flank attack from Glasgow ?

Yes, sir ; we should have had to march together and be prepared for battle.

Question. Could you then, under the circumstances, have made that distance with the rapidity which was necessary in order to reach Munfordville to rescue that place in presence of the rebel army ?

My answer to that question is, no.

Question. Which would have been the most judicious determination, supposing it were possible to march by the rebel army at Glasgow, to make that march and leave the rebel army at liberty to fall in upon your rear, occupying Bowling Green, and so cutting off communication eventually between Nashville and Louisville, or even to have sacrificed Munfordville for the purpose of keeping the rebel army in advance and driving it into a position where it could have been operated against by greatly superior forces ; which would you have selected ?

I would have preferred the latter movement. The former certainly would not have allowed the army to come in on the rear, because had they got possession of Bowling Green it would have been a vital point. Nashville would necessarily have fallen, and they could have done it had we passed them at Glasgow.

Question. Did the rebel army make any stand after it left Munfordville until it arrived at Bardstown ?

Not to my knowledge. I heard they had been drawn up in line of battle at Hodgenville for a fight, but I do not know it from my own knowledge.

Question. Did you understand that the whole army halted at Hodgenville?

No, sir; only the rear guard.

Question. Is it probable that that rear guard would have withstood the advance of my army?

I am very well satisfied they would not.

Question. Then would anything have been gained by turning off from the road which we were pursuing with an object?

No, sir; I do not see how you could have turned off for want of supplies.

Question. Was there anything in the nature of the country or the relative position of the forces that would have prevented the junction of Bragg's forces with those of Kirby Smith at Bardstown had they desired?

No, sir.

Question. Would it have been in the option of Bragg to give battle at Bardstown or avoid it for the purpose of forming such a junction?

Yes, sir.

Question. Was there anything in the position of our forces and the rebel forces to have prevented that junction from being formed at an earlier day had they desired?

No, sir; my impression was that that was what General Bragg was running for.

Redirect examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. General, you stated in your examination in chief that the number of General Buell's army at the time of Bragg's invasion was 45,000?

I think about that number.

Question. You now state it to be about 34,500. Will you please state where the difference is?

The difference in that estimate existed in Rousseau's army, which was down in Alabama, and the troops in Nashville and adjoining that were guarding the communications of the army.

Question. At what date was the entire force of 45,000 available?

If the army had been concentrated at Nashville.

Question. You have stated that the army under Bragg numbered 60,000 or 70,000. Upon what did you base your calculations?

I did not state positively, but it was from the most reliable information that could be obtained from scouts.

Question. Can you give the name of any reliable scout from whom you received information and what that information was?

My scouts generally placed it at a higher figure. I would deduct a certain per cent. from their reports. One of my most reliable scouts was named Kennedy.

Question. What number of regiments did he give as moving from Chattanooga under Bragg?

He reported about seventy regiments. But from Newton, whom I sent to obtain information on the East Tennessee Railroad and to count every car load of soldiers that went up and down that road—and his estimate was that there were seventy-one regiments.

Question. How did the number of these regiments run?

He could not form any estimate of that. I was under the impression that the old regiments were much reduced in number, but their conscription had gone on, and I could not form any estimate of their number; they greatly varied.

Question. Has not experience taught you that if scouts and deserters state the number to be 60,000 or 70,000 it is probably half that number?

It is a natural impression; but I was satisfied that Bragg had the Corinth army with him, with a few detachments under Breckinridge.

Question. You proposed attacking the enemy at Glasgow. Did you suppose they had 60,000 or 70,000 men?

I did not suppose they had 60,000 men at Glasgow, but I naturally supposed that in the face of General Buell's army, of which the Confederates knew, they would not attempt to invade Kentucky except with a very large force.

Question. Was not your calculation and that of the officers generally based upon that fact—that he would not dare to invade Kentucky with that number?

I think not. My impression was that Bragg had crossed with seventy regiments and that Withers had crossed with larger forces.

Question. Do you remember saying to Lew. Campbell, of Ohio, at Bowling Green, that there were only 25,000 ragged rascals, and that you thought it time to go and whip them?

I think I never made such a remark.

Question. Is your recollection of that impression such as would justify such a remark?

It is not. With different people coming in with different stories the matter was discussed, but I never believed their army was as small as that.

Question. You say that you were impressed with the belief that Bragg would not invade Kentucky in the face of General Buell's army, and that he would not undertake it with less than 60,000 or 70,000 men?

That is my impression at that time.

Question. If General Bragg anticipated an uprising in Kentucky and assistance from Kirby Smith in that quarter, would it not have been more available for him to have taken 30,000 rather than 60,000 or 70,000; that is, in reference to his supplies?

Of course it would. He could then have moved with more celerity.

Question. If the enemy's number was as your estimate makes it, how do you account for the evacuation of so strong a place as Munfordville at your approach?

I do not know what the objects of the enemy were at that time. I merely formed my opinion from information gained since; but at that time I thought certainly that the enemy had as many men as General Buell had, and it was want of rations on their part that took them from Munfordville.

Question. In that connection can you account for the fact that an army of that size, after forming a junction with Kirby Smith, declined to fight at Harrodsburg or at Dick Robinson?

That is something I cannot understand why they did not fight there, where I expected them to fight; I cannot account for it; but General Buell's army was much increased in strength, and they may have known that we outnumbered them. I believe that with all the re-enforcements they got in Kentucky our army outnumbered them.

Question. What is your estimate, from all the information you obtained, of Kirby Smith's forces?

Including his entire force I think Kirby Smith had about 20,000 men, including the re-enforcements he got in Kentucky. I got that testimony from people in front of Cincinnati. I think he got about a thousand in Kentucky.

Question. At the time we occupied Munfordville after the enemy left do you know where Kirby Smith's army was?

We thought it was in front of Cincinnati or before Lexington or Franklin.

Question. You stated in your examination that Cincinnati was threatened, and not Louisville, by Kirby Smith?

By Smith, but not by the entire force. I do not know what there was in front of Cincinnati but raw recruits. I do not see why he did not take it.

Question. You said in your examination in chief that while encamped at Hubbard's Cove General Buell gave you his plan of operation.

His plan of concentration.

Question. What is the date of that, when he gave you a synopsis?

I think, sir, it was on the last day of August. I recollect I was about to move down to Altamont on the 1st, and I had already done it on the last day, if I remember, anticipating the order.

Commission adjourned to meet December 12, at 10 a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 12, 1862—10 a. m.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Examination of General McCook continued.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. General McCook, the plan furnished you at Battle Creek had reference to the invasion of General Bragg, and that invasion must therefore have been known to General Buell in the latter part of August. Is this so?

I think the intention of General Bragg was known. We could of course only approximate to his intention. The army was concentrated at Chattanooga, and I think they intended to advance upon Nashville and go into Middle Tennessee. There was a letter found by my pickets, which led me to believe this, written by one Isham Harris, of this State, which proposed to give a synopsis of the plans of Bragg, that he intended to have his beloved capital, as he called it.

Question. Have you possession of it?

I have not. I gave it to General Buell. The plan proposed was not carried out, but I know that a portion came true; that is, in the posting of two brigades, which he said he had succeeded in getting to Chattanooga. In this letter it indicated that General Bragg would cross the army somewhere in the vicinity of Florence or Tusculumbia. The letter might have been a catch, but I think from everything it was original. As soon as it was found its contents were telegraphed to General Buell. Of course the army was not intended to remain at Chattanooga, but as soon as their army would be concentrated an attempt would be made, because at that time General Buell's forces were very much scattered along the road and through the country, and they proposed to break through the line before he could concentrate. That was expressed in the letter. I suppose General Buell was aware that they would, if possible, attempt to come into Tennessee. The letter was found about the 8th or 10th of August.

Question. Can you fix the date at which Bragg's army crossed the Tennessee and how long after that event it came to your knowledge?

I was satisfied that he had crossed the Tennessee River on the day that I halted in the Sequatchie Valley. It was somewhere between the 10th and 20th.

Question. At what point did General Buell's plan contemplate concentrating his forces to resist the invasion of General Bragg?

The point was not indicated to me. He was either to attack the enemy as he debouched into the valley or as he descended into the valley of Middle Tennessee. There was a condition in the plan, as I understood it.

Question. In that connection you say that a lack of supplies prevented that plan being carried out. Did this alone prevent the plan from being successful?

That was my impression. I was daily expecting an order to fall back on account of supplies. I just fed my men from day to day. I did expect that General Buell's army would be compelled to fall back from the position it occupied there for the purpose of supplies, if for nothing else. Every general knew how his troops had to suffer marching through that country, with little water and half rations.

Question. Could an army of 60,000 or 70,000 men, marching rapidly through Tennessee by way of Dunlap, Pikeville, Sparta, Carthage, and Munfordville, have subsisted upon the country along the route?

With the supplies they had concentrated at Chattanooga, the amount of transportation, and the manner they supplied their army I think they could. Every farmer who had an ounce of bread or bacon to spare hauled it as the army passed by. The rebels never carried an ounce of provisions, but the people fed them. And the people gave all they got to the last pound. They had a large train also. They made forced and rapid marches, but suffered a great deal.

Question. Could you give the Commission any idea of what proportion of supplies could be relied on in that way with that army of 60,000 or 70,000 men?

That would depend upon the nature of the inhabitants and of the country we marched through. I think half rations could have been procured for them.

The PRESIDENT. Am I to understand that Bragg's army amounted to 60,000 or 70,000 men?

No, sir; that was the impression I had when they crossed at Chattanooga.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You are acquainted with the works and strength of Munfordville. What force would have been sufficient to hold that place against Bragg's army?

Munfordville is a position that could not be turned very easily. I should think that one-half the number could have held the place against Bragg's army. The advantages of defense would have been one-half.

Question. Had Bragg made a stand at Munfordville could you have avoided fighting him there?

Not without his taking Bowling Green. Our hope was to fight him there and let him go. I consider Bowling Green a more important point than Nashville.

Question. Had he defeated you at Munfordville would it not have been the total destruction of your army and the loss of Kentucky?

Yes, sir; if the army had been pursued with the vigor I thought he would have shown.

Question. After the hurried retreat would not intelligent officers in the army have estimated their strength at 60,000 or 70,000?

I do not think so. When they left Munfordville my estimate was about 35,000 to 40,000. Dr. Gardner said, "They have as many troops as you have." He is a man of good judgment and fine reputation as a surgeon and a man that is not liable to be stampeded under any circumstances.

Question. At Munfordville for the first time you came to the knowledge of the fact that you had overestimated Bragg's army?

Yes, sir; the difficulty, too, of getting information in the country was so great that if the army had proved to be 10,000 or 15,000 larger or smaller either way it would not have surprised me.

Question. With Munfordville secured and Bowling Green in our possession what would have prevented General Buell throwing his army into the rear and cutting off supplies?

He would only have to go and find the enemy and whip them wherever he found them.

Question. Then he would not have marched to Louisville?

I think not. General Buell had an army that could not be whipped.

Question. With an army under the command of Bragg less in number than that under General Buell, with a large force at Louisville, can you understand why Bragg was in no hurry to form a junction with Kirby Smith?

If I knew exactly the extent of Bragg's knowledge about our army and position I could understand it; not without.

Question. Was it possible that Bragg threw his army so boldly into Kentucky without knowing the number of the army in his rear?

That I do not know. Speculations can be made, and when the facts are known opinions can be formed; but I think Bragg was pretty well posted. His means of information were excellent. I think it was a part of his plans that Price should come up to Tennessee, but he ran against Rosecrans at Inka. That is what he should have done, but running against Rosecrans prevented it.

Question. Are the names of the rebel officers of General Bragg's captured at Prewitt's Knob known to you, and what time after they were captured were they released?

I know nothing of that circumstance but what I heard. One of them was named Forsyth, of Georgia. When they went or upon what conditions they were released I do not know.

Question. I understand you now to say that after the Munfordville affair you came to a better knowledge of the number of Bragg's army and that it numbered 30,000 or 35,000?

I did not say it was 30,000 or 35,000. I got my impression from Dr. Gardner. My conclusion was that Bragg had crossed with 35,000 or 40,000.

Question. You estimated Kirby Smith's army, from all the information you could get, at about 20,000?

I so thought.

Question. Do you say that Kirby Smith and Bragg formed a junction at Harrodsburg?

I think they did. They could have done so and should have done so.

Question. Did not their refusal to meet you at a strong position at Harrodsburg and declining to fight you at Dick Robinson and making a hurried retreat from Kentucky satisfy you that you had overestimated their number there as you had at Munfordville?

No, sir; I have no reason to change it. I think they had about 60,000 men.

By General TYLER:

Question. You say there were a million of rations at Bowling Green; how long would they have lasted your army?

I say I was so informed, but the fact did not exist. I simply said I believed so; now I know there was not.

Question. Has any information come to you since yesterday?

No, sir; I will simply state facts I know. I was informed there was a million of rations of bread at Munfordville, but I do not think there was a million there, for when my commissary went in for bread he could not get it.

Question. Were there any Union forces except General Buell's which could by any possibility have relieved Munfordville?

I do not see why it should not have been relieved from Louisville.

Question. Do you know whether the army was massed at Bowling Green on Sunday morning when you arrived there?

Rousseau's and Wood's divisions were there; Colonel McCook in command of cavalry. My own division arrived at 6. Crittenden's division was there, encamped in the same place. On Monday the Fourth Division was there. Mitchell was 15 miles in the rear, got up on Monday; and Thomas' division, I understood General Buell to say, had been ordered from Nashville up to Bowling Green. General Thomas was a man I had great confidence in, and in battle I wanted to have him on the same line with me, and I was anxious for him to come up.

Question. How far is Bowling Green from Munfordville?

Forty miles.

Question. Had you forces enough massed at Bowling Green Sunday morning to have relieved Munfordville Wednesday morning?

On the flank of the enemy we had forces enough, but I do not think in the presence of the enemy we could have got there. It would have made 20 miles a day, which is rapid marching even for small detachments; but I do not think we could have got our army there in time.

By General ORD:

Question. Could troops have come from Louisville quicker than you could have sent them from Bowling Green?

They could have come from Louisville in five hours. It is about 70 miles from Munfordville to Louisville. Had they come 10 miles an hour, it would take them about seven hours. They had the telegraph, too, when we had to send through the enemy's country by courier.

Question. Did you have any information that Munfordville was beleaguered by an overwhelming force?

I knew on Monday morning and heard it was taken, and got on my horse and rode to General Buell's headquarters, and there heard that the attack on Munfordville had been repulsed, and there I learned that Colonel Wilder was in command. Previously I do not know who was there.

Question. You did not know then it required relief?

I knew Bragg was at Glasgow, 20 miles and 40 miles from there. It was therefore supposed that if Bragg could not take it with one brigade he would send more.

Question. Any applications from Munfordville for relief?

None that I ever heard of. I was present at General Buell's headquarters at Dripping Springs when a man named Miller said Munfordville had surrendered.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. Do you know if there was any communication between the officer in command at Louisville, or General Wright, commanding the department, and General Buell?

I knew nothing of it at all if there was. It was beyond my sphere of knowledge, and it was something which I don't think General Buell's division commanders knew anything about. They had their lines marked out for them, and they generally marched on them and asked no questions.

Question. Do you know whether communication of that kind was possible at that time?

I think communication was possible. It could have been sent by telegraph to Munfordville and from thence worked around through the bushes. It is therefore possible.

Question. Have you information which will enable you to answer whether there was any co-operation between General Wright and General Buell?

I never knew anything at all about it. I used to inquire about my friend Nelson. I was delighted when I heard he had recovered from his wound; but I knew nothing but that General Nelson was in command and had 100,000 men. That was the news we got. General Buell never told me anything about it. I did not have an hour's conversation with General Buell from the time we left Dripping Springs till we got to Louisville.

By General BUELL: .

Question. The judge-advocate has inquired whether if Munfordville had been made secure I could not have thrown my army upon the line of communication of the enemy. I should like you to state if Bragg had any line of communication on which his safety depended.

I do not think he had. General Buell would then have been free to have marched after Bragg as long as rations lasted.

Question. In order that that should have been the case, would it not have been necessary that Louisville should be secured?

Yes, sir; I think Louisville was the most important place; it was our base of supplies.

Question. How many divisions were yet in the rear when you arrived at Louisville?

Thomas' and Mitchell's divisions were in the rear.

General SCHOEPPF. What do you know of the dissatisfaction of the officers and men and the petition sent with respect to the removal of General Buell after the battle of Perryville?

I was informed while on the march from Danville to Lebanon that there was such a paper in existence in General Gilbert's corps. Who was the originator of it I do not know. I never saw the paper. The first development of this feeling of dissatisfaction I discovered on the march from Nashville to Louisville. They complained of being marched to death and of being half fed. Another cause of this dissatisfaction was that General Buell was always very much engaged in his quarters and did not go around among his soldiers much. I have frequently felt that had he visited his camps more, reviewed his troops more, and shown himself more to his soldiers a different state of feeling would have existed. I always had confidence in General Buell as a general, and, thank God, I have yet.

By General BUELL:

Question. Do you know the names of the signers of the paper referred to?

I had a conversation with one of them outside the door here a few moments ago. I asked him about it, as to whether he ever heard of such a meeting of officers in the army wishing to depose General Buell and put General Thomas in command, and in this conversation with General Steedman he said he had signed a paper and had presided at a meeting of officers requesting the President to remove General Buell. I think General Steedman has confidence in General Buell, but was influenced by the junior officers and men in his command.

Question. Where was that meeting held?

I did not know, but somewhere on the Rolling Fork. I knew nothing for certain, but believe it was so. It was subsequent to the battle of Perryville; but their feeling was more particularly directed against General Gilbert.

Question. Did the paper state any reason?

I never saw the paper. It was merely mentioned on the way down, but it was by officers I had no control over. I knew of no other officers that signed it. General Steedman said it was a respectful petition to the President of the United States. He thought it the most direct road to the President.

Question. Did you ever hear of any similar proceedings on the part of officers of General Thomas' division, particularly in reference to their commanders?

Yes, sir; I did. Once, in front of Corinth, T. W. Sherman was put in command of General Thomas' division, which produced great dissatisfaction in the division, and the officers of the brigade and the colonels petitioned to have him removed. I know they were very much dissatisfied. They complained of his manner more than of his want of ability.

Question. Did you ever know of any other case?

Not that I recollect; that was the only instance.

Question. Was that division under my command at the time?

No, sir; it was assigned to the army of General Grant. I was requested by my deceased brother, General Robert [L.] McCook, to see General Buell and see if the change could be made; that the men were so angry with him that he might meet with violence from their hands. I spoke to General Buell about it, and it was one of his best divisions, and I know he as well as myself was much interested in their welfare.

Question. Do you know whether General Steedman's division was affected by the assignment of General Gilbert according to his supposed rank at that time?

Yes, sir; General Steedman ranks General Gilbert.

General SCHOEPF. Could it be known to General Steedman at the time that he was not a brigadier-general?

I believe Gilbert never had a commission as a major-general.

General BUELL. Has there been anything in the active operation of my troops, and in their scattered condition for a considerable time, that would have interfered with as frequent inspection of them as might otherwise have been made?

My answer to that is, yes.

By General BUELL:

Question. Did you have any doubt that Bragg would concentrate his forces at Harrodsburg for battle after the battle of the 8th?

I believed he would concentrate.

Question. What did you suppose his whole force would amount to?

At that time I had no positive way of ascertaining what his forces were, but I believe they would amount to about 55,000 men.

Question. Did you know the strength of our army after the battle of the 8th?

I did not, sir, except as far as my own forces were concerned.

Question. Did you know that the absent division of your corps was on the march to join you?

Yes, sir; I did.

Question. Was there anything on the retreat of the rebel forces from Perryville which indicated that the retreat was a disorderly one?

Not by the indications of their march. There was nothing left upon the road except what they could not carry away—gun-carriages and guns that were taken in battle—for they cut up the carriages and left them.

Question. Supposing that there was a reasonable probability that the enemy would give battle at Harrodsburg with a force not much, if any, inferior to your own and that you were in expectation of re-enforcements in a very short time, would it be considered judicious to wait for these re-enforcements to join or would you have considered the result of the battle so absolutely certain as to make it advisable to attack with what you had?

Yes, sir; I believe that the army we had there could have whipped them. That was my impression then and is my impression yet.

Question. Do you think it would necessarily have been so had the forces been nearly equal, considering the advantages the enemy would have in choice of position and the position being strong at Harrodsburg?

There would, of course, be a doubt about the matter. We had pursued Bragg a long distance, and if we could catch up with him I thought it would be the best policy.

Question. Did you consider the troops of which our army was composed at Perryville superior to the troops of the rebel army?

I believe the old troops I had were superior to the troops of the rebel army; my new troops were vastly inferior.

Question. What proportion of the whole army was composed of new troops?

There was one regiment of new troops to each brigade, and Jackson's division, consisting of two brigades, were all new troops. I suppose the army marching from Louisville was about 80,000 men.

Question. Supposing, then, that the two armies had been nearly equal and the advantages of position on the part of the enemy and that you were expecting re-enforcements, would it have been advisable to seek a battle under such circumstances?

If the armies had been nearly equal I would prefer to have waited. I will state that I never knew what the strength of our forces was on the advance till I saw General Buell's official report to-day, and I will say that they were much less than I thought they were. I was surprised and amazed to see it.

Question. Supposing the army after the battle of Perryville had taken position at Danville, would that necessarily have prevented the escape of the rebel army?

No, sir; they would have gone farther up the road; they would go out by Richmond.

Question. How far is Danville from the road which leads from Camp Dick Robinson to Lancaster?

Danville is about 8 miles from Camp Dick Robinson, and that is the nearest town on the road from Camp Dick Robinson to Lancaster; but Dick's River is the obstacle.

Question. Give the character of Dick's River.

Dick's River has precipitous bluffs and can be crossed only in one place.

Question. Would the occupation of Danville have prevented the enemy from retreating from Camp Dick Robinson by that road?

I think that the occupation of Danville would not, but we would have been in a position where the enemy could have been cut off from Lancaster. We should have been marching on his flank all the time had he attempted to move, but the enemy could not be reached on account of Dick's River till it was crossed, and we might have arrived simultaneously at Lancaster had we started at the same time.

Question. With such a stream as Dick's River between the armies would he have been in great danger?

Not in great danger till Dick's River was crossed by our army.

Question. Was it certain that the enemy would take a position at Camp Dick Robinson?

I thought so, but the thing was not developed till we left Harrodsburg.

Question. After it was ascertained that the enemy had gone to Camp Dick Robinson do you say that Danville was a proper position for our army to take?

Certainly it was. It was the only position left.

By General TYLER :

Question. You do not mean to say, general, that their army, man for man, was superior to ours ?

The material of our army is as good or superior to that of the rebel.

Commission adjourned to meet on December 13, 1862, at 10 a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 13, 1862—10 a. m.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present ; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Colonel SHOEMAKER (a witness for the Government), having been duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. What is your position in the service of the United States ?

Colonel, commanding the Thirteenth Michigan Volunteers.

Question. State, if you please, to the court what you know of General Bragg crossing the Cumberland River at the point they crossed and all about it.

I was at Hartsville, at Dixon's Springs, on the night of the 8th of September ; left there on the morning of the 9th ; passed through Carthage ; crossed the Cumberland River at that point ; saw Generals Bragg and Hardee on the south bank of the Cumberland on the afternoon of the 9th ; saw a portion of the army of General Bragg on the south side of the Cumberland on that day.

Question. What were they doing, colonel ?

They were mostly bivouacking. I saw some marching. It was toward evening I saw most of them, and they had apparently just gone into camp ; many of them were moving. I saw many of them next day, many troops and wagons, and I saw scattering parties through to Sparta, but no body of forces. I also saw at Dixon's Springs some cavalry, said to be the advance of General Cheatham.

Question. I propose, Mr. President, to ask a question over which we have had some discussion, and which I presume General Buell will again object to. What do you know of the size of the invading army at that point, as gathered from your own observation and what the rebel forces informed you ?

General BUELL. I object to that portion of the question which proposes to take as evidence the statements of the officers of General Bragg's army in regard to its strength.

General Buell and Colonel Shoemaker retired, during which the Commission unanimously—

Resolved, While the Commission is not disposed to deny the position of General Buell as to the inadmissibility of purely hearsay evidence on a trial of an accused party it will not sustain the objection now offered, but will place the answers of the witness on its record and be governed in its opinions according to the weight which collateral testimony may give to such answers.

Colonel SHOEMAKER. I saw what I judged to be a division of General Bragg's army on the road as we were passing along.

General TYLER. Can you locate them ?

They were within 6 miles of the river, on the south side of the Cumberland River. I also saw some cavalry at Dixon's Springs on the morning of the 9th of September, commanded by General Wheeler, and said to be the advance of General Cheatham's portion of the army.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. What is your opinion as to the size of that army?

General BUELL. That is, "what he heard."

Colonel SHOEMAKER. I formed the opinion at the time that the army of General Bragg did not exceed 30,000 men, and what I saw there and at Knoxville confirmed me in the opinion.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. Just state what that was from which you formed your opinion.

It was from conversation with officers of the army and what I saw myself. I can state generally what I heard from the officers. General Cheatham was crossing with his force in the neighborhood of Hartsville, General Bragg at Carthage, General Polk at the town of Gainesborough, and from what I could learn I judged there were about 20,000 men. There was a great expectation among all the officers that there would be a general rising in Kentucky, and their hopes were based on that supposition. I saw General McCown. He stated to me that he had already shipped some 3,000 (I am not positive as to the number) of arms for the recruits raised by Morgan, and he thought they would be required to raise arms for 20,000.

Question. I would like to have this question answered if possible: State what you saw, colonel, that confirmed your opinion, formed from the statement of those officers, and who the officers were.

The officer with whom I had the most conversation was Lieutenant Kuhn. He was of the body guard of Bragg, and commanded the protection that went with me to Knoxville.

Question. What other officers do you recollect?

Major Scott and Lieutenant-Colonel Anderson. There were a number of officers that I talked with whose names I do not know. I saw General Bragg, and he said nothing to me nor I to him relative to the strength of forces on either side, but he refused to parole me, giving as his reason that I had seen too much—but I had seen but little—and he refused to parole me on that account rather than because I had seen more. It was my desire to be paroled, but he paroled me to go to Knoxville.

Question. What were the facts, from your own personal observation, that you saw to confirm any opinion of that kind?

I was taken prisoner on Sunday evening, and was till next Monday at noon going through and at Knoxville, and my opinion was made up from what I saw and heard generally. I do not know any more particular points that I could state.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Did the opinion which you formed then from observation and hearsay agree with the opinion you had previously formed of the rebel army?

I think it did.

Question. Did I understand when you left Nashville you estimated the rebel army under Bragg to be 30,000 and no more?

That was my opinion. I do not know that I placed it particularly at 30,000 and that that opinion was formed at Nashville, but my opinion of the strength of General Bragg's army was not much changed by what I saw and heard.

Question. Your opinion of the strength of Bragg's army continued the same?

Yes.

Question. Do you know how many divisions there were in Bragg's army?

I do not.

Question. Do you know the organization of the divisions?

I do not. I know nothing further than what I stated in my direct examination.

Question. Did you count the number of men in any regiment?

I did not.

Question. Did you by actual observation make an estimate of the strength of any regiment?

No, sir; I did not. I saw a body of troops in camp bivouacked, and as we passed them estimated, as I naturally would, what the number there might be. I supposed there would be, as I stated before, a division. I passed directly through and took no particular account of them.

Question. Either of the number of men or regiments?

Neither.

Question. Did you think it a large division or a small one?

Rather a small one.

Question. What number of men do you suppose there were in that body of troops?

I should estimate them at from 6,000 to 8,000.

Question. Why do you suppose it to be such a body of troops as we call a division?

From the number of men and the extent of ground they occupied.

Question. Might it not have been more or less?

I think it might have been less, but I don't think it could have been more.

Question. State definitely, if you please, colonel, the conversation you had with those rebel officers which gave you this opinion in regard to their strength.

I do not know that I can do so. The opinion I was asked to give was formed from conversations I had at different times; but without impressing any particular conversation upon my mind I can only give the conclusions I arrived at. The particular conversation held with any particular officer I could not state. But I rode with that lieutenant to whom I have referred five days. He was the only commissioned officer of the body guard, but he was a very pleasant gentleman and appeared to be sociable, and we talked a great deal in relation to the war; but it would be impossible to give definitely the conversation with him or any other officer. My opinion was based upon conversations generally and my own observations.

Question. In any of these conversations was it stated definitely or approximately that the army of General Bragg was about 30,000 strong?

I do not know that I could state positively at what figure any particular officer placed that army. I recollect a conversation in reference to the battle of Shiloh, in which this question was brought up, that we had overestimated the strength of their army in our battles; that we had overestimated their men at Shiloh, at which they said they had but 28,000 men, and that a great many overestimated the number of men in General Bragg's army, but what was the exact number they stated I could not say. I arrived at that opinion as the general result of the conversations I had with the different officers, and perhaps without basing it upon any fixed number that any officer might have stated.

Question. I understand you to say that the officers from whom you derived your opinion in regard to the strength of Bragg's army represented the strength of the rebel army at Shiloh at 28,000?

One officer with whom I conversed made such a statement.

Question. In making this estimate, then, you had no method of computation as to the number of regiments and divisions and the strength of regiments in arriving at your conclusion?

Not at all. I knew nothing of the exact number of regiments or divisions, but it was a general conclusion I arrived at from different sources of information.

Question. Is it probable that an officer, an intelligent officer, in the rebel service would give you a correct impression as to the strength of the rebel army when that was the subject of conversation?

Ordinarily I should say not, but I was a prisoner and going south, and they conversed with perhaps a little more freedom than they would have done under other circumstances.

Question. They might possibly have overestimated or underestimated?

Yes, sir.

Question. Upon what data had you previously arrived at the conclusion that the rebel army under General Bragg was not more than 60,000 strong?

I was stationed at Stevenson, Ala., up to, I think, the 30th of August, and of course it was a subject very much discussed there and upon the march to Nashville. I had formed that opinion from no particular facts perhaps, but as every officer in the Army forms an opinion in relation to the movements of his own army or that of the enemy. But there was no precise knowledge that led me to know what their precise forces were. It was a mere matter of opinion, and formed from such general information as I was likely to obtain from my position in the Army.

NASHVILLE, December 13, 1862.

General J. B. STEEDMAN (a witness for the Government), having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State, if you please, your position in the United States Army.

I am brigadier-general.

Question. State whether you were in the service under General Buell when the army moved up in pursuit of Bragg in the invasion of Kentucky.

I was.

Question. Will you state, if you please, to the Commission what estimate the intelligent officers of the army placed upon the number of Bragg's army in the march from Nashville to Munfordville?

General BUELL. This amounts to nothing more than collecting the rumors of the camp; it is no evidence whatever. The answer to such a question can be of no value as evidence.

The judge-advocate argued the legality of the question.

General BUELL. The investigation of rumors was commenced by the prosecution. I have not in my cross-examination asked for any such evidence as the question of the judge-advocate tends to elicit from the witness.

Generals Buell and Steedman retired, when the Commission unanimously—

Resolved, The Commission is disposed to give the investigation the widest scope. Whether the opinion, estimates, or impressions of a witness are to be of weight when the Commission make up their opinion will be for future consideration, and the Commission will be governed by the laws of evidence and equity.

The question will be put.

General BUELL. If it please the Commission, I should like to be informed whether my objections were made matter of argument by the judge-advocate in secret session.

The PRESIDENT. I can assure General Buell that nothing is done to his prejudice inconsistent with law.

General BUELL. I do not wish to inquire into anything that properly belongs to the Commission in secret session, but if the prosecution introduces arguments upon my objections I claim that I ought to be privileged to hear them and I think they should be recorded. I wish to inquire if that rule is being observed.

The court was then cleared, and the Commission affirmed the reply and the assurance of the president.

General STEEDMAN. The opinion of officers of our army who interested themselves in obtaining information as to the strength of the enemy, so far as I became acquainted with their opinions, fixed Bragg's strength at from 25,000 to 35,000 after his army emerged from the Sequatchie Valley at or near Pikeville. The largest estimate I ever heard made by those who pretended to know about the strength of the enemy was made here at the quarters of General Schoepf by a young man who professed to be in the employ of the Federal officers; whether he was or not I am unable positively to state. I know, however, he communicated with my superior officers on the subject; fixed Bragg's strength at between 37,000 and 38,000, exclusive of artillery; 27 brigades—9 divisions of 3 brigades each. The strength of their regiments was estimated at 350, making about 37,800. The strength of Bragg's army was a matter of discussion very frequently among the officers of our army at various points on the march when they had an opportunity to meet to discuss these things. I heard a great deal of discussion about it near Cave City. The impression was very firmly fixed upon my mind from opinions expressed by officers generally with whom I talked on the subject that the strength of the Confederate army was in the neighborhood of 35,000.

Question. Aside from any reliable information, would not the opinions of intelligent officers be very much influenced as to the number of Bragg's army by the fact that he threw an army from Chattanooga into Kentucky in the face of General Buell's forces, which was a bold undertaking and requiring a large army?

It would make the impression, perhaps, upon the minds of officers and anybody who thought upon the subject that the army was larger than it really was; at least I would add that it would make the impression upon the minds of the officers generally that the army was a very large one.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You will state, if you please, whether you accompanied the march from Nashville to Munfordville, what you know of the surrender of that place, and the failure on the part of General Buell's army to relieve it.

I accompanied the march of the rear division from Nashville to Bowling Green. I know nothing of the surrender of Munfordville, except what I read in the newspapers and heard from the paroled officers and soldiers on their march from Munfordville to Bowling Green. That our army failed to reach there in time to prevent the capture of the garrison I know, but whether General Buell was responsible for it or not I do not know. The advance of the army was at Bowling Green some time before my division reached there.

Question. I would ask you, general, what time the rear division reached Bowling Green?

I think it was on Wednesday, September 17, but I do not undertake to be positive. I think also that was the day of the surrender of Munfordville.

Question. Had the enemy made a stand at Munfordville would General Buell's army have been forced to fight? Could you have avoided a battle there?

General Buell's army would have fought had it been permitted to, and my impression is that we would have had to fight.

Question. What, in your opinion, would have been the effect of a defeat of our army at Munfordville upon our fortunes in Kentucky and Tennessee?

I have never thought of that.

Question. You can state, if you know, whether Munfordville is a strong position or not.

I have never examined the position occupied by the troops there. I never was at the fortifications and know but little about them. I simply crossed the river with my command.

Question. Did not the estimate made of Bragg's army of 30,000 or 35,000 come to be a certainty after you left Munfordville in the opinion of the officers?

I think the opinion was so strong that it became a conviction, but I am not prepared to say it was a certainty.

Question. Was it not the general opinion among the officers that the enemy would make a stand at Munfordville?

There was a diversity of opinion among the officers on that subject. Some were of the opinion that the enemy were in force at Munfordville and intended to stand, while others thought they were merely checking us with a small force of cavalry and artillery to enable them to get up into the heart of Kentucky to secure supplies.

Question. Were you present at the battle of Perryville? If so, without giving us a detailed account of that battle, state where your position was.

I was present on the field at the close of the action and was near the battle with my command when it commenced. I was on the Springfield and Perryville road, encamped within 3 miles of the battle-field the night previous, and was ordered to move up about the time the firing commenced. I moved up on the Springfield and Perryville road to a point within three-fourths of a mile from the right of Rousseau's division, where my command was halted for a considerable length of time, within sound of the artillery and musketry; and at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, but having no time-piece cannot state positively as to the hour, General Schoepf, who was in command of the First Division, sent me an order to move up with my brigade, and while moving he informed me that he had received orders to send two brigades to the support of General McCook, and that he had designated the Second and Third Brigades, commanded by General Fry and myself, and ordered me immediately forward. I moved up under his orders as quickly as possible; found General McCook standing by Loomis' battery; reported to him in person; got my brigade into position on the right of that battery, which was on the extreme right of Rousseau's division; took position between Rousseau's division and General Sheridan's. Fry's brigade, as I understood subsequently, was ordered back. The officers and men of the First Division during the firing in front and while they were halted in sound of it were very anxious to go forward. Why they did not go forward at an earlier hour I am unable to say. We were perhaps two hours occupying the last position the division was ordered to occupy, perhaps longer.

Question. How far back upon the Springfield pike were you at the commencement of that fight?

Perhaps 3 miles. I have a more distinct recollection of the camp than I have of the distance. It was a hard place to get water. The only water there General Gilbert kept for his own use, his staff, and escort, while the soldiers were perishing for it. He had a guard over it and would not let them have a drink.

Question. Could you hear the sound of firing at that point you designated 3 miles back?

Very distinctly the sound of artillery, but could not hear the musketry.

Question. Did the firing indicate a severe engagement?

I did not suppose there was a severe engagement till we advanced from that camp up to the position from which I have already stated my brigade was ordered forward to the support of General McCook's troops. While we were halted there the officers of the division generally were satisfied that there was a severe engagement going on in front.

Question. Do you know at what point Kirby Smith's army made a junction with Bragg's after that engagement?

I do not know of my own knowledge, but from reports I have an opinion that the junction was made at or near Harrodsburg.

Question. How long after that engagement was it that the junction was made?

My impression is that, if made at all, it was made the next day.

Question. You can state, general, whether Major General Buell enjoyed the confidence of his officers and men during the operations of the army under his command in Tennessee and Kentucky after he took up the line of march after Bragg?

That is a very difficult question. I will state, however, that I think until about the time the army was ordered back to Nashville that no officer ever enjoyed to a more eminent degree the confidence of his officers and soldiers than General Buell. I know very well that I was proud to state that I belonged to Buell's army; but from the time the retrograde movement was commenced I am compelled to say I think the confidence in General Buell began to wane in the army; whether just or unjust, there was a great lack of confidence in him during the march from Nashville to Louisville. I have heard a great deal of murmuring among officers and men. The impression became general, so far as my opportunities for knowing the sentiments of the army enabled me to judge, that General Buell did not want to fight Bragg; that he was unwilling to risk an engagement, while the men, the officers, and troops generally were anxious to fight, conscious of our ability to whip Bragg's army at any place at which we could catch up with it to engage it. I might add that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction manifested at Cave City. I heard more there than at any other point on the march. There were more troops there than at any other point. The army was tolerably well massed there, and we halted there between forty and fifty hours, I think, while the feeling in the army was very strong that we ought to advance and attack the enemy. What the halt was for I am unable to state.

Question. Have you stated, as far as you know, the origin of the lack of confidence? Did it not originate from forced marches and half rations given to the soldiers?

I have stated that my opinion was that the lack of confidence resulted from a feeling in the army, whether just or unjust, that General Buell did not wish his army to fight Bragg. I heard no complaint against General Buell on account of the severity of the marches or the scarcity of rations. The feeling in the army was strong that our mission to Mississippi and Alabama was a failure; that very little had been accomplished; that we were obliged to go back and do the work over again. And I heard officers higher in position than myself express the opinion that we ought to check Bragg's army between McMinnville and Pikeville; that we ought at once to advance upon him; that General Buell ought to throw his whole force upon Bragg and prevent his going to Kentucky at all. My judgment is that the only feeling against General Buell originated in his failure to bring on an engagement between Bragg's forces and his own at some point in Tennessee.

Question. How far was that feeling affected by General Buell's failing to review and appear frequently among his troops?

I never heard any complaint of General Buell's failing to appear among his troops. There was a little feeling in the army that he was rather too exclusive; that he did not avail himself of the judgment and experience of the officers in the field who commanded his troops quite as much as he should. I have heard that feeling frequently expressed, but I never heard a complaint against him for not reviewing his troops. After the battle of Shiloh, when my command was marching, General Buell passed it, and, without any officer having anything to do with it, the men recognized him and raised a shout as he passed. It was very difficult then to suppress cheers as General Buell passed the men. I know he was very popular at that time in my command.

Question. What were the manifestations, after the army was withdrawn toward Nashville, when General Buell made his appearance among troops.

I cannot state beyond my command. I never saw any manifestations in my command of enthusiasm when General Buell appeared. After the commencement of the retrograde movement I will state in plain terms that he was decidedly unpopular.

Question. You have mentioned, general, that several superior officers expressed the opinion that the enemy ought to have been attacked at certain points as they invaded Kentucky. Can you give us the names of these officers?

Maj. Gen. Alexander McDowell McCook, General Schoepf, General Mitchell, and General Fry. From the colonels with whom I talked I never heard a dissenting voice.

Question. State to the Commission, if you please, what expression of opinion you heard from Major-General McCook upon the movements of General Buell's army and General Buell's capacity as a commander.

While the troops were at Pelham I had a conversation with General McCook in relation to the movements then going on. I remember his words. He was sitting beside me in General Schoepf's quarters, and he brought his hand down with considerable force on my knee. "Don Carlos won't do," said he; "he won't do." Said I, "General, there is considerable feeling in the army on the subject." "O," said he, "George Thomas is the man, and we must have him." I think General Buell was in the same building at the time, in the other part of the house, having a conversation with General Crittenden. I remember that conversation with more distinctness from the peculiarity of the language used by General McCook.

By General TYLER:

Question. You say General Bragg's army passed out of the Cumberland Mountains at Pikeville; was it in General Buell's power to have concentrated forces enough at or near that point to have resisted successfully Bragg's advance or to have whipped him?

From what I have heard of the topography of the country and the scarcity of water I do not think that General Buell could have massed his troops near that point and given Bragg battle without a great deal of suffering on account of the scarcity of water. My impression is that he could have concentrated all the forces under his command between that point and McMinnville or Sparta and given General Bragg battle.

Question. Did not Bragg with his whole army pass over that ground and find a supply of water?

I have no doubt but what he did, though his army was stretched out very much. The understanding in our army was that there was a great scarcity of water; in fact I was informed by some general officer who once made a little campaign up there that it was almost impossible to subsist troops there and to keep them there for any length of time on account of the scarcity of water. There was no water to be had. A portion of our troops who attempted to go up there were withdrawn on account of the scarcity of water.

By General DANA:

Question. What was the name of the young man who gave the information at General Schoepf's quarters in Nashville as to the strength of the rebel army when they debouched from the Sequatchie Valley at or near Pikeville and who fixed it at 37,000 or 38,000?

His name was Pratt.

Question. What was supposed in the army to be the reason why General Buell did not wish his army to fight that of the rebel Bragg?

Various reasons were assigned. Some ascribed it to timidity, some to prudence. There were all sorts of reasons; some went so far as to impugn the loyalty of General Buell. For myself I never doubted his loyalty, though I have heard considerable said on that point—that General Buell did not desire to whip Bragg.

Question. On account of his disloyalty?

Yes; I have heard charges of disloyalty against him.

Question. Were these charges of disloyalty made against General Buell by officers in high rank?

I have heard officers of the rank of brigadier-general, colonels, and lieutenant-colonels charge General Buell with disloyalty.

Question. Did you ever hear these officers make such charges in the presence or hearing of their inferiors in rank ?

I have.

Question. State the names of the officers making these charges and in whose presence they were made.

I decline to do that unless positively required so to do.

Question. You are not required to give any testimony which would implicate yourself.

The reason I decline was under the rule which shields the court, the jury, and the witnesses. If I am required to state I will, with the declaration in advance that I have heard a member of the court say so.

The court decided that the question be put.

I have heard General Schoepf, in my presence, declare General Buell's disloyalty ; I have heard the colonel of the Fourteenth Ohio, George P. Este, in the presence of several officers of his regiment, doubt the loyalty of General Buell ; I have heard the lieutenant-colonel commanding (I think) the Eighth Kansas Regiment charge General Buell with disloyalty in the presence of superiors. There were quite a number of officers present, but I think no inferiors. I am unable to recollect all the officers by name. I frequently heard officers express doubts of General Buell's loyalty.

By General DANA :

Question. Did you ever hear these declarations made by officers of any rank in the presence or hearing of enlisted men ?

No, sir ; I do not think I did. I have no recollection of having so heard.

Question. Who were the superior officers before whom the lieutenant-colonel of the Eighth Kansas Volunteers made allegations against the commanding general as to his loyalty ?

(General Steedman declined to answer the question unless so ordered by the Commission.)

The PRESIDENT. Was it at a public meeting ?

It was a meeting held in the camp at Rolling Fork, 6 or 7 miles from Lebanon, Ky., at the house of a citizen, and it was generally understood among the officers of the several commands that they were to assemble at that time and place. It was held with closed doors, to exclude its proceedings from the enlisted men of the army.

The PRESIDENT. It is the opinion of the court that, without criminating yourself, you can answer the question.

I do not feel that it would be criminating myself to state all I know about it. I did not think there was anything criminal in the meeting at the time nor do I now. We were present for the purpose of conferring with each other as to the condition of the army, and interchange of opinions as to the feeling toward the commander-in-chief of the Army of the Ohio ; and after it assembled there was a great deal of discussion as to the best manner of expressing our opinions in relation to General Buell. The result was a dispatch to the President was agreed upon, asking him to relieve General Buell from the command of the army, for the reason that, in the opinion of the signers, he had lost its confidence. That dispatch was signed by all the officers who were present. It was during the discussion upon the several propositions made before the meeting that that officer, in the course of his remarks, expressed his doubt as to the loyalty of General Buell. I do not remember his name, but my understanding was that he was the lieutenant-colonel commanding the Eighth Kansas Regiment. I never saw him before and have never seen him since. I think all the colonels commanding regiments in the First Division were present at that meeting. There may have been one or two absent, but my recollection is that they were all there. The brigade commanders of the First Division were all there, and one division commander, General Fry. There were a number of colonels from either General Mitchell's or General Sheridan's division, I am not positive which, but the officers commanding regiments in Col. Daniel McCook's brigade were present. Colonel Post, commanding a brigade, was present; I think he was of General Mitchell's division. The last time I saw that dispatch to the President it was in the hands of Col. John M. Harlan, commanding the Second Brigade in the First Division, and my recollection now is that there were either twenty-one or thirty-one, I am not positive which, commanders of regiments' names to it. I am positive there were twenty-one.

By General DANA:

Question. State what you know of General Gilbert's rank at the battle of Perryville.

He wore shoulder-straps, indicating he was a major-general. My understanding since then is that he was not a major-general, but that he was an unconfirmed brigadier-general.

Question. Do you know whether he was appointed brigadier-general prior to or since the battle of Perryville?

I do not know.

Question. By what authority was he placed as a major-general in command of an army corps?

My understanding was that he was assigned the command by General Buell.

Question. Were the division and brigade commanders in the corps to which General Gilbert was assigned as commander impressed with the idea that he was their junior or their senior?

The division and brigade commanders of the rank of brigadier-general were of opinion that General Gilbert was their junior after the battle of Perryville; at least I never heard any question about General Gilbert's rank till my command reached Crab Orchard. I was there told by General Robert [B.] Mitchell that General Gilbert was an uncommissioned brigadier-general, and that all the brigadiers in the corps ranked him.

Question. Was there any dissatisfaction felt or expressed in the army about the assignment of this officer to a command when he had not the right to exercise it?

There was a great deal of dissatisfaction in the First Division with General Gilbert prior to the battle of Perryville, and a great deal of feeling among all the officers of the corps that I ever heard say anything about it, after it was ascertained that he had not the right to exercise that command. There was a feeling that he was somebody's pet, and put where he had no right and for which he was not qualified. He quarreled with nearly all the officers of the First Division about very unimportant and trifling things, and there was a general opinion that he gave his attention entirely to small things instead of attending to the important duties of his position.

Question. Where was General Gilbert during the progress of the battle at Perryville and what do you know of his behavior at that battle?

He was with the Reserve, as it was called. He was not on the battle-field, I think, at all; if he was I had no knowledge of it. He remained with the troops that were in reserve awaiting orders. I saw very little of him, merely noticed him passing once or twice, but did not hear him say anything, and therefore I cannot speak as to his conduct.

Question. Was any portion of his command, and, if so, what portion, in front, in the immediate presence of the enemy, during the battle, and was he at any time with that portion of his command?

I am only enabled to speak of my brigade except from official report. My brigade belonged to General Gilbert's command, and was in front, in presence of the enemy; General Gilbert was not with us. I did not hear during the battle nor since, from any person, that General Gilbert was on the battle-field at all; that he was any nearer to it than I described in my testimony this morning, that is, within half to three-quarters of a mile from our lines, while we were engaged. General Gilbert may have been there, but I did not hear of his being in front.

Question. If General Gilbert had ordered a support to General McCook at the time you took your last position what would have been the probable result?

In my opinion if General Gilbert had ordered the First Division to support General McCook at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, while we were halted within half to three-quarters of a mile of the engagement, the enemy would have been routed and driven from his position. He would have been utterly defeated had a single division been added to the strength already engaged. At the time my brigade was ordered forward and took its position on the right of Loomis' battery it was too late to render any important aid. It was nearly night. There were but a few rounds fired after I was in position. The battery of my brigade opened fire and continued to fire probably for twenty-five minutes, when the firing ceased all along the lines. My infantry were not engaged at all.

Question. How long was the Reserve Division halted at the last position it took near the battle-field, from which you were ordered to support General McCook?

I think about two hours and a half.

Question. What orders did you receive from General McCook on your arrival to his support?

I rode forward in advance of my brigade and found General McCook near Loomis' battery. He recognized me at once, and approaching me remarked that he had never been so glad to see me in his life; asked me where my brigade was, and I told him it was immediately in my rear. I asked him to assign me a position. He left me hurriedly, with the remark, "You remain here for a short time and watch the front, and if you see anything going wrong take care of it." I think he said, "Give any order you think necessary in my name." He was retiring from me at the time, and said he, "I will return in a few minutes and give you orders." That was about twenty minutes past four; perhaps near half-past four. I never saw General McCook again until the fight was over. I remained there for some time. A very severe engagement was going on in front of the battery to the left, where I understood subsequently Lytle's brigade was engaged. I witnessed that, and saw the enemy advancing from the right. They had advanced near a deep ravine in front of the battery near to where a barn had been burned by our shells, and I remarked to our commissary, who was with me, that I could not wait any longer for General McCook; that the enemy were advancing and I must get my troops into position, as the battery was entirely exposed. It was not supported at all. There was no infantry on either side. When returning where I expected to find my brigade, as I had ordered it to halt in the rear of the battery at the school-house, I met the troops of my command in motion passing through a corn field. I rode rapidly up and inquired of Major Townsend, commanding the Eighteenth Infantry, who had ordered him to move; he said General McCook had passed the brigade, and ordered him to take a position with his regiment on the right of Loomis' battery. I moved the whole brigade on to the right of Loomis' battery, and got my artillery into position on the right of that battery and opened on the enemy's lines. I saw no more of General McCook until after dark. I heard his voice on the right of the Eighteenth Infantry, conversing with some officers there of the Eighteenth Regulars and the Ninth Volunteers. He asked me to send one of my aides to find General Rousseau and ascertain for him the result of his command, as far as he was able to get it. I sent one of my aides, in accordance with his request, and he was captured by the enemy within their lines.

Question. State, if you know, who was the commander of the division of cavalry during the campaign which ended with the battle of Perryville and what number of regiments or squadrons composed the command.

I understood during the advance from Louisville that Captain Gay had command of all the cavalry attached to our corps; that is, the Third Corps, commanded by General Gilbert, but what regiments or the number comprising the command I do not know. I know little about the cavalry. I heard the colonel of one of the cavalry regiments which was assigned to the command of Captain Gay complaining of the course taken in assigning Captain Gay to the command, and heard him remark that he would decline to receive commands from Captain Gay.

Question. Will you state that officer's name?

It was Colonel Milliken, of the First Ohio Cavalry.

Question. Did any irregularities arise from his exercising command over his superiors in rank?

I am not aware of any arising from that reason.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. You have, General Steedman, spoken of a member of the court having expressed his opinion that Major-General Buell was not a loyal man. Please state the circumstances under which it was said and all the conversation you recollect.

It was in a private conversation between General Schoepf and myself, during which a great deal of what had transpired from the time General Buell assumed the command of the army up to the time at which we were talking was discussed. I remember relating a conversation that I had with a citizen near this place in March last to General Schoepf, the substance of which was that the citizens here had expressed a great deal of admiration for General Buell. I was on picket with my regiment about 4 miles from this place, when a citizen came to me and engaged in conversation about our officers and their disposition relative to the feelings of the Southern people. He asked me if I knew General Buell personally. I told him I did not; I only knew him as the commander of the army. He said if all our officers were like General Buell we would not have any trouble with the people. He proceeded to tell me a story, which was new to me, that General Buell had an aunt living near Nashville with whom he said he was acquainted, and I think he said, too, with whom General Buell had lived in early life. He said he was intimately acquainted with the lady and had seen her since General Buell had been at Nashville, and she had assured him that everything was right; that special protection would be given to the peculiar institution, and that he had no apprehension on that score, while he lauded the general very highly. It was all news to me that General Buell had relations here. I did not know then nor do I know now whether he has relations here or not. General Schoepf also told me something about a story he heard of the feelings of the rebels at Huntsville; that the rebels about that place were very much attached to General Buell, and understood they regarded him with great favor. General Schoepf remarked, "This can't be so, that General Buell sympathizes with the rebels. He cannot be on both sides. If they admire him so much he must sympathize with them some at any rate." Said he, "If all these stories are true I would not like to trust him a great deal, and I have not the utmost confidence in him anyhow." That was the substance of the conversation, without pretending to recollect and repeat all the conversation that took place between us.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. You have stated, general, that the general estimated strength of Bragg's army when it crossed the Tennessee River was from 25,000 to 35,000. Was that estimate based upon any method of computation or was it surmised as to the aggregate force?

The estimate as to the strength of Bragg's army was based upon information such as one army generally gets of the strength of another—upon the statements that were made as to the number of regiments and the number of effective men in each regiment; the aggregate was arrived at by computing the number of regiments reported and the average strength of the regiments reported, and, I may add, from the statements made by persons who said they had seen portions of Bragg's army and some of them who said they had seen all. It was from all these sources of information that the estimate of the strength of Bragg's army was made up among our own people generally.

Question. Can you name any persons from whom this information was derived as to the number and strength of the regiments?

Yes, sir; I named a person in my direct examination. I can describe another, state where I saw him and when, and also who saw him and heard his statements. I do not know whether he can be found. It was at Manchester that a citizen came to General Schoepf and myself and reported himself as, I think, General McCook's spy. He said that three of them had gone out for the purpose of getting information for some one of our generals—I think General McCook; that he thought the other two who went out with him had been captured; and he went on to tell his whole story, which was very clear and plausible. He appeared satisfied he was telling the truth. He had the pass of one of our officers, whom he said he had secreted, and his representation as to the strength of Bragg's army was very nearly the same as the young man Pratt gave. He represented that he had been in the Sequatchie Valley and had seen the whole army, and he stated it at rather less than the young man Pratt did, namely, at about eighty regiments, as near as my recollection serves me; but of the aggregate strength of the army I am not mistaken. He said it was from 30,000 to 35,000, exclusive of the artillery. This man came with our troops from Manchester, and my recollection is that he rode a horse with General Schoepf's escort a part of the time. This estimate includes the cavalry, everything but the artillery, at the time they emerged from the Squatchie Valley. He represented that the main body of the army was on this side of the mountain. They were going, he thought, in the direction of McMinnville, and represented them to be on the plain, about 8 or 10 miles from what he called the foot of the ridge.

Question. You say he was one of General McCook's scouts?

He so represented himself, I stated; and we were satisfied from his statements and the papers he had on his person that his representations were correct.

Question. Do you know if he reported his information to General McCook?

I do not.

Question. Do you suppose that the impression which prevailed in the army as to the strength of Bragg's army may have been influenced by a knowledge of our own strength and by the natural desire of troops to engage an enemy, and thence convincing themselves that the enemy did not much, if any, exceed them in strength?

It is possible that the general disposition of the troops to underrate the strength of an enemy may have influenced the opinion of our army as to the strength of the enemy, though I do not know that it did.

Question. Do you not think that men anxious to meet an enemy would be more likely to underrate than overrate their strength?

I think it is the general disposition of men to underrate an adversary.

Question. I will speak now of your own opinion in regard to the propriety or expediency of moving upon Nashville. You have stated in your testimony that you thought the enemy might have been met and driven back at some point beyond McMinnville. Are you well enough acquainted with the country and the roads now to be able to pronounce a deliberate judgment in regard to the expediency of such operations against the enemy?

I stated in my direct examination that I knew very little about the topography of the country between McMinnville and the mountains or the facilities for getting water at that time, but that my understanding was that it was very difficult to get water for any considerable number of troops. I also stated that it was the opinion of the officers of the army that the enemy ought to have been met at or near McMinnville. I know but little about the character of the roads, nothing except of those I saw and of which I heard representations from such scouts as I conversed with; but, with the limited experience I have in the matter of war, I think our army was able to whip Bragg's at any place between the mountains and Kentucky. That was my belief at the time and nothing has occurred since to change that opinion. I thought then and think now that General Buell's forces were equal, if not superior, to Bragg's. Without pretending to give any opinion as to strategy, I believe our army was able to whip the rebel army any day after it crossed the mountains. The army felt so, and the confidence of the army in its ability to meet Bragg would have given it success.

Question. Do you know what available forces could have been concentrated about McMinnville?

I suppose that General Buell could have concentrated 40,000 men at McMinnville.

Question. Do you know anything of the circumstances which would necessarily have controlled the movements of my army in that country at that time, such as the amount of supplies particularly?

Of course I have no official information as to the number of rations at the disposal of General Buell at points between Nashville and Huntsville or Nashville and Decherd, along the line of the road, that were available; but I am confident that, for the short time that it would have been necessary to subsist the army anywhere in Tennessee to have whipped Bragg the army could have lived on the country.

Question. In what way could you manage to subsist an army from that country while it was engaged in actual operations?

I would draw the supplies for the support of the army through the same officers through whom we draw them from the Government, and precisely as we did it then, while we were supplied with half rations when marching from Decherd to Nashville.

Question. In what condition did those supplies exist in the country; that is, were they scattered over the country in the hands of the producers or were they collected in large bodies?

Generally on the farms of the producers.

Question. Can a large army operate actively in the presence of an enemy and depend upon supplies to be procured in that way?

Bragg's army, supplied in that way, generally kept us at bay through Tennessee.

Question. That does not answer the question.

That is my answer, general. I do not think that an army engaged in an important campaign could be subsisted for any very great length of time by drawing supplies in that irregular manner from the country; but the rebel army did go to Kentucky and back to Tennessee, making quite a successful campaign, and drawing their supplies from the country in the manner I have suggested.

Question. In procuring its supplies in that way from the country through which it marched did the rebel army have the assistance of the population? Did they bring in supplies freely to the army on its line of march?

The rebels undoubtedly had the sympathy of the population, but to what extent the people engaged in transporting supplies for them I have no means of knowing. I have heard, however, that in a portion of Tennessee the people did haul supplies in very considerable quantities to the rebel camps.

Question. Could we receive any such assistance?

Not without compelling.

Question. In what manner would you do that?

I would send a quartermaster out, with all the transportation of his regiment or of the brigade, to get supplies; direct him to order the negroes of the rebel citizens to hitch up their wagons—the same wagons they hitched up for the rebels—and haul such provisions as they had to the camp. I would compel them to do it if they refused. In other words, I would coerce them to do precisely for us what they had done voluntarily for the rebels.

Question. To what extent upon either side of the road do you suppose an army of 30,000 would have to go to procure supplies for its subsistence through such a country as that between McMinnville and Nashville?

Judging from that portion of it I passed through, an army of 30,000 could subsist in marching by going, at the farthest, 3 or 4 miles from the road. We subsisted half that number with half rations by going a very short distance. We only drew half rations from the Government, and supplied the balance from the country without going a mile from the road. The country was well supplied with cattle. There would have been no difficulty in finding beef. The commissaries had a pretty good supply of beef when we got here drawn from the country. It would depend, of course, a great deal upon the country, the seasons, and the crops.

Question. Could that be done in the presence of an enemy?

Unless the enemy lived on the road all the way. You would have to take the risk of getting a foraging party captured occasionally, just as they are doing now in front of Nashville, and we would have had the same opportunity to capture their foraging parties as they would ours. They were subsisted on the country.

Question. Is it true that you would have the same facilities in this country as the enemy has for gaining such advantages?

It is not true that we have such facilities for getting information. The enemy have greatly the advantage in that respect.

Question. Suppose both armies living in this manner from the country, what would the relative success of the two armies depend upon with such a system of supplying them?

Energy and pluck.

Question. In anything else?

That would be the main dependence, living in that way.

Question. Would it depend upon the strength and efficiency of their cavalry force at all?

It would depend upon the strength and efficiency of all the army, cavalry as well as infantry; but I would depend mainly upon the infantry if I were doing the foraging.

Question. Would it depend upon the disposition of the people?

I do not think they would have a great deal to say about it.

Question. Would their disposition have any effect upon the ease with which supplies could be obtained in that way?

The disposition of the people to favor the Confederate army would, of course, embarrass sending out foraging parties by our army, on account of the rebels getting information of our movements of that character more readily and frequently than we could of their movements.

Question. Do you suppose that such a system of supplying an army might have been a matter of so much more difficulty for one than for the other as to determine the success of the campaign, other things being equal?

I have already stated that the disposition of the people of the disloyal States would favor the Confederate cause, would throw obstacles in the way of our foraging, on account of their giving information to the enemy whenever we attempted to send out any such parties. Of course, if all other things were equal, that would be an advantage to the rebels which might, if they were exactly equal in all other respects, give them success in a campaign. I will add that I am not in favor of subsisting an army in that way, on account of the demoralizing effect on our own troops. I would only do it in an emergency, when I think a great advantage would accrue to our cause from doing it, when I could deal the enemy a deadly blow.

Question. What would be the consequence of defeat to an army depending upon such a system for subsistence?

Well, I can only speak from what I understood to be the effect upon the Confederate army when they were defeated; they would run away and reorganize at some other point.

Question. Is it true the rebel army ever has been defeated and driven from its supplies and thrown from day to day upon what it could gather upon its line of march?

Yes, it is true that some portions of the rebel army have been in that situation. That was especially the case at Mill Springs. They lost everything they had there.

Question. What was the strength of the army that was defeated at Mill Springs?

It was supposed to be about 10,000.

Question. Would the consequences to that army have been the same had it been 40,000 defeated under the same circumstances?

There would perhaps have been rather more suffering had the army been larger. It was at a very inclement season, in the midst of rain and mud. The roads were almost impassable, and they were certainly in a much worse condition than our army would have been had it been defeated at McMinnville, where the roads were good.

Question. In retreating from Mill Springs did not the rebel army fall back along the rear of its line of supplies?

My understanding was at the time, and has been since, that it had no supplies on the road, and that it retreated over about as bad a road as there was at that time in Tennessee. I traveled over a portion of it in Kentucky, and it was nearly impassable. A large portion of the supplies received at Mill Springs were transported by water.

Question. In what condition did that army retreat.

In rather an irregular manner, I understood.

Question. Was it not completely disorganized and dispersed, or nearly so?

It was badly whipped, terribly frightened, and retreated, it was understood, very rapidly; but most of the troops that were there escaped and have been engaged with our army at other points since. Several of the regiments that were there are still in the Confederate service.

Question. Did it not retreat as a disorganized mob?

It is said to have retreated in confusion.

Question. Was not the condition of the roads a security to that army instead of a hinderance?

Its pursuit was never attempted south of the Cumberland River. Its principal security was the Cumberland River.

Question. Suppose there had been no such obstacle in the way, would not the condition of the roads have contributed to the security of that retreating army?

The condition of the roads would have unquestionably embarrassed the pursuit more than the retreat under such circumstances.

Question. You say that the roads from McMinnville toward Nashville would have presented no such difficulty either to the retreating or the pursuing army; is it so, general?

The roads from McMinnville would have offered none other obstructions that would have prevented a rapid pursuit at the time of the defeat of the Confederate army at Mill Springs. The suffering of an army defeated at the time and under the circumstances that the rebels were defeated at Mill Springs was much greater than if defeated at the season of the year and under the circumstances we were placed in when Bragg was at McMinnville.

Question. I meant the suffering of the defeated soldiers from exposure. The suffering in one case would mainly have been from natural causes, would it not, such as the condition of the weather?

Yes; resulting from the defeat.

Question. What would have been the probable cause of suffering in the other case, supposing the weather to be good, the roads good, and every facility for rapid pursuit?

Heat, dust, want of water, apprehension of being captured, and all the difficulty that would embarrass a retreating army under such circumstances.

Question. Suppose, in addition to such causes of suffering, the army should be compelled to retard its march as much as would be necessary to collect supplies in the manner you suggest, what must have been the result of the pursuit by an efficient enemy?

If I were to judge of the manner in which the rebel army got from us in Kentucky I would say not very disastrous; but I think if the army were pursued rapidly, vigorously, not to permit itself to be checked by little squads of cavalry and a couple of pieces of artillery on every road, that it would succeed in cutting it up very badly and capturing a large portion of the retreating forces that had been in the fight.

Question. Do you suppose the rebel army, if it had defeated the Army of the Ohio at McMinnville, would probably have conducted the pursuit in that way?

I am unable to say what they would have done.

Question. Did the rebel army in retreating from Kentucky have to delay its march and collect supplies along the road?

I think not. I think they had collected from the country a sufficient amount of supplies to subsist upon while they were retreating.

Question. Are you well enough acquainted with the particulars of the retreat of the rebel army from Kentucky and of the pursuit to be able to say whether that army suffered as much in its retreat as it ought to have done?

Of my own knowledge of course I know but very little about the manner in which the rebel army conducted its retreat. My opinion was at the time that the pursuit was not as rapid as I felt it ought to have been, though I am free to say very frequently officers not charged with the responsibility are more willing to take risk than those who are. I think in the advance on the enemy in Kentucky, both before and after the battle of Perryville, our forces were frequently held in check when they ought not to have been.

Question. I want to know upon what knowledge you have based your disapprobation?

I was in command of a brigade in the advance on the road from Springfield to Perryville, and an attempt was made to check or attempt to check my command with a small force of cavalry and a couple of pieces of artillery, but I advanced upon them rapidly and drove them from their position three times. General Gilbert sent word by an orderly three times that day directing me to halt until he could overtake the right of the column. General Schoepf, who was with the head of the column and directing its movements, informed me also that General Gilbert had sent an orderly to him to halt the command about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day. General Gilbert overtook the head of the column the day we marched from Springfield, that is, the sixth, ordered a halt, and expressing a great deal of dissatisfaction with the rapidity of our movements, telling us all we were in danger of being cut off. I think if the column on that road in which my brigade lay had been permitted to move as rapidly as its division and brigade commanders desired it to move that the enemy would have been punished more than he was. He would have been driven from all his positions, and I felt at the time that the army he had on the road and the artillery would have been captured had the pursuit have been made as rapidly as it ought to have been.

Question. That was before the battle?

I am undertaking to show by my testimony that the corps commander placed by General Buell over three divisions of that army would not allow it to move as rapidly as it desired to move upon the enemy, and was very much afraid it would get cut off if it attempted to cut off a small body of cavalry and a couple of pieces of artillery that were impeding it on the road. After the battle the pursuit on one of the roads was something of the same character; that several times during the pursuit our advance was checked and held back by small bodies of cavalry with artillery. This information with regard to matters after the battle I got from officers who were engaged.

Question. On what road was the pursuit you refer to and what officer commanded the advance?

It was on the road to Crab Orchard, by way of Lancaster. There was quite a skirmish quite close to the town of Lancaster; on both sides of the town there were skirmishes, in which small bodies of cavalry were engaged with part of the enemy with a couple of pieces of artillery.

Question. Do you know the officer who commanded the advance and who was responsible for this slow pursuit?

I do not recollect which division commander it was. I heard a great deal of discussion about it, and the impression was made upon my mind from the amount of discussion I heard and the opinions expressed that the pursuit was a very slow one, and that we allowed the enemy to hold us in check by this system of occupying the roads in their rear with small bodies of cavalry and with a section of artillery.

Question. Has General Mitchell the reputation of being a pretty energetic officer?

Yes, sir; he has such a reputation. It was a portion of the cavalry under Captain Gay that was in advance. I remember one day after the battle of Perryville Captain Gay's cavalry was in advance on that road, as I understood, and was checked by the enemy at the crossing of the stream near Lancaster, and held in check until the infantry of Mitchell's division advanced with some artillery and dislodged them. From all the circumstances which I have related my opinion is that the enemy was not punished as severely on the retreat from Kentucky as he might have been.

Question. Have you heard any condemnation of the pursuit expressed beyond Crab Orchard?

No, sir. On the contrary, I have heard it spoken of as being vigorously carried on.

Question. Is it known that Bragg carried supplies with him in his advance from Chattanooga across the mountains?

I cannot speak as to the extent of his supplies. It was understood in our army, however, that Bragg's army drew upon the country pretty largely for supplies in their march through Tennessee.

Question. Had supplies been collected in depots in Kentucky, in advance of his arrival, by the forces of Kirby Smith?

It was the understanding in our army that supplies were collected by Kirby Smith in Kentucky; whether at depots on the route traveled by Bragg's army I am unable to say. I will add that I understand there were supplies collected for Bragg's army in Tennessee by citizens. I heard some one, I cannot tell who now, but it was one of the scouts employed by officers in our army, say that at some point in Tennessee the citizens had hauled in a considerable quantity of supplies for Bragg's army at the time the enemy reached the point where the supplies had been collected; I cannot remember the point, but it was not far from McMinnville; it was on his march somewhere between the mountain and Sparta.

By General TYLER:

Question. Could you give the court any information as to the time Bragg's army crossed at Chattanooga at or near Pikeville and the Tennessee River at or near Carthage?

I have no memorandum to which I can refer to refresh my recollections as to dates, but my impression is that Bragg's army left Chattanooga about the middle of August and crossed the Cumberland Mountains at or near Pikeville about the 22d of August. We crossed at Carthage about the first week in September, as near as I can recollect. The command to which I was attached left Decherd on the 18th of August for Pelham, and that is the only date about which I can feel at all certain.

Question. When Bragg crossed the mountains at Pikeville what force had we collected at McMinnville, and what is the distance from McMinnville to Pikeville?

I understood at that time that two divisions of our army, of about 15,000 men, with a small body of cavalry, were at or near McMinnville, under the command of General Thomas. I cannot state the distance.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You have been examined in reference to the sympathy of the inhabitants for the rebels as facilitating their procuring supplies. What would have been the effect of a kind, conciliatory policy toward the negroes in this connection by your army?

I think nineteen out of twenty of the slaves of the disloyal States are friendly to the Union cause. What would have been the effect in aiding us to procure supplies from the country if a different policy had been pursued toward them than that enforced by the commanding officers of our army I am unable to say; it would be a mere matter of opinion. I will state, however, in this connection, that most of the information we received while the army was in Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee came from the negroes. They were always reliable on our side. When I say reliable, I do not mean to say that they were always truthful. Very frequently their anxiety to get with the army induced them to misrepresent the position of their masters and owners. The information was generally correct as to the locality and movements of the enemy, though I never considered it reliable as to the political status of their masters. They would invariably say their masters were rebels of the strongest kind. I think, however, they might have been made more useful to the Union army than they have been.

Question. What has been the policy of Major-General Buell in this respect?

His policy has been generally to exclude them from the camp and in favor of returning them to their owners.

Question. What, from your observation, is the effect of a kind, conciliatory policy toward the rebel inhabitants?

I think it has emboldened them and intensified their treason. They have regarded it as an evidence of our weakness.

By General BUELL:

Question. You have not given the dates at which the rebel army passed certain points in its march to Kentucky, particularly the date at which it passed Pikeville. Is that date fixed in your mind?

It is not, and I so stated—that I could not pretend to accuracy at all in the statements I made in reference to dates.

Question. Did you really know anything of the movements of the rebel army in crossing the mountains about the time of their marching?

All I know as to their movements was the received opinion in our army, the generally understood opinion of the army at the time—the officers of that portion of the army with which I was connected.

Question. Was it really the opinion that the rebel army crossed the mountains or was between Pikeville and McMinnville before our troops commenced their concentration at Murfreesborough?

The opinion was general in that portion of the army that was at Pelham, which included the divisions of General Schoepf, General Crittenden, and General McCook, that the advance of Bragg's army was across the mountain before the troops left Pelham. When the First Division reached Manchester on its march to Murfreesborough information that was regarded as reliable was received that Bragg had crossed the mountain with nearly his entire force. As I stated in my examination, that information was received through a scout who was in the employ, I think, of General McCook, who received it at General Schoepf's quarters, and communicated the information to General Schoepf and myself. It is proper I should state that the information received while the troops I have spoken of were at Pelham was not considered of that certain character upon which an army would base its movements.

Question. Had the army commenced its concentration when you received this information at Manchester?

It had.

Question. While you were lying at Pelham was it expected that the enemy might advance over the Therman road?

The route that the enemy would take from Pikeville was understood there to be a matter of very great uncertainty.

Question. Was the enemy known to be at Pikeville when you were at Pelham?

Not positively.

Question. Did the rebel army march through McMinnville in invading Kentucky?

My understanding is that a part of it did. It is understood that a portion of the cavalry passed through there. Whether any infantry did or not I am unable to state.

Question. While you were lying at Pelham were you in expectation of the enemy at that point or on roads near there?

It was understood that General Buell anticipated an attack there, but the officers and troops at that point did not, so far as I have heard an opinion expressed.

Question. Do you mean to express what was your opinion or what was the understanding of the troops generally?

I mean the understanding of the troops to which I was attached, especially of my own brigade, which was in the advance at Pelham until the divisions of General McCook and General Crittenden arrived.

Question. Did the disposition of the army while you were at Pelham indicate that General Buell expected an attack at that point particularly?

It indicated that General Buell thought an attack somewhere in that vicinity probable.

Question. On what ground did you think it improbable?

Upon the ground that I supposed the rebel army would avoid ours if possible.

Question. Upon what ground was that belief based?

Upon the ground that they would never hazard a battle with us unless they thought they outnumbered us and had the advantage.

By General DANA:

Question. Do you know of any instance where any officer of the Army of the Ohio, by his official position or acts, has influenced the return of a slave to servitude since the publication of the enactment of the late article of war on the subject?

I have never been officially informed that the amendment to the article of war alluded to in the question was a part of the Articles of War. My understanding, however, was that the amendment had been made, and provided that if any officer of the Army engaged in returning a slave to a rebel owner that officer should be cashiered. I have never seen an official copy of it, and do not know to this day what it is, and do not know officially whether any amendment to the Articles of War had been made; but after I understood that such an amendment had been made I received orders, while a colonel commanding a regiment, to permit persons whom I was satisfied were disloyal to search my camp for slaves. I received an order from General Fry, Iuka, to permit citizens who were named in the order to search my camp for runaway negroes.

Question. Please state the date.

It was about the 25th of June. I conversed with the citizen who bore me the order and to whom the authority was given to search my camp, and I was satisfied they were disloyal. I took the order and wrote upon the back of it that I declined to permit any citizen of a disloyal State to search my camp for slaves unless the officer in command of the department positively ordered the search and signed it officially. I then handed it back to the citizen. At Pulaski, in Tennessee, somewhere about the first week in August, I received a verbal order from General Fry himself to deliver up two negroes from my camp to a citizen of that town, which I declined to do. I did not know at the time, however, that the negroes were in my camp. The general rode up to my camp and told me he was informed there were two negroes belonging to a citizen whose wife he said he knew. She was a Rhodes. I replied to the general that I did not care what her name was, and that I would not permit a rebel to enter my camp to get slaves any quicker than I would a he one, and he said he would take the responsibility of returning the negroes. I then informed him what I understood to be the law and that I should stand on it, and advised him not to trouble himself any further about negroes, but to leave that question to the colonels of the regiments and the claimants. Those are the only instances I know of.

Question. Have you a copy of the written order that was served on you at Iuka?

I have not. I did not retain the original order.

Commission adjourned to meet December 14, a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 14, 1862—10 a. m.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Colonel STREIGHT (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States.

A. D. Straight, colonel, commanding the Fifty-first Indiana Volunteers.

Question. State, if you please, where you were in the service during the invasion of Bragg from Chattanooga to Kentucky.

I started from Stevenson on the 20th or 21st of September with the Twentieth Brigade, and joined Crittenden's division at Bridgeport; marched with Crittenden to this point, where we joined with Wood's division, and from here we marched with Wood's division.

Question. What position had Wood's division in the army in the march from Nashville to Bowling Green and Munfordville?

We marched in the advance from here to Gallatin; then we crossed to Mitchellsville. What force went up the other road I am unable to state. We joined other troops at Mitchellsville. Who had the advance that day I cannot say, but we arrived in the advance at Bowling Green. We went in the advance, I am certain, on our route as far as Mitchellsville, and we arrived in the advance at Bowling Green. Whether there were not some other troops marching in the advance some other day I am unable to say.

Question. What time, colonel, did it take you to march from Nashville to Munfordville; what time did you leave Nashville and what time did you arrive at Munfordville?

I have no dates; I cannot therefore give the exact days. Our first stay was at Gallatin, where we remained one day; we then moved rapidly to Bowling Green. One day and night we marched, I think, 33 miles.

Question. What time were you marching from Nashville to Bowling Green; how many days, and how long did you remain at Bowling Green?

We remained at Bowling Green five or six days, but the number of days we were marching I cannot recollect so well. I remember we were very impatient at lying idle, but it strikes me that we were on the road but three days from here to Bowling Green, and from there we did not move so fast, though we marched most of one night, and next day we moved up to within a few miles of Cave City, then to Cave City, which would make five days' marching. This would include all the marching from here to Cave City, where we halted. When we moved up it took all day to go to Munfordville. We were five or six days at Bowling Green and about five days at Cave City.

Question. Where were you at the time Munfordville surrendered and upon what day did it surrender?

I disremember, but we were on the march from Bowling Green to Cave City. The day after we arrived at Cave City the prisoners came down, and I think they surrendered the day before. It was not far from the time that we left Bowling Green; it was on the next day. I may be wrong as to the date, but not more than a day.

Question. What was the estimate placed upon the number of the invading army by intelligent officers during that march?

Well, sir, it was variously estimated at from 30,000 to 40,000. I do not think anybody estimated it above 40,000; some as low as 25,000. From facts I could gather they might have had from 30,000 to 35,000. There were various rumors, but all very indefinite. We were not in a position to know very definitely facts relative to it. I, at Gallatin, learned from General Wood that he had sent a party out who reported it at 33,000. That is my remembrance of it, which from that time led me to believe that my estimate was pretty correct.

Question. State, if you please, whether you were at the battle of Perryville, and what you know of the movements of the enemy subsequent to that fight.

Our division arrived about 4 o'clock on the day of the fight at Perryville. The evening before we went over what is called Rolling Fork, about 12 miles from Perryville. Although our division had orders early in the morning, we did not move until about 11; arrived about 4 the day of the Perryville fight. We took position on the right of Gilbert's force. That evening there was some little skirmishing, but very unimportant. We advanced about half a mile and bivouacked for the night. We were on the left of Crittenden, on the right of Gilbert, and about opposite to Perryville, and from appearances on the night of the fight we were at the extreme left of the enemy. They were trying when we came up to flank General Gilbert, which indicated that that was the extreme left. I saw no other troops farther left than about opposite Crittenden's right. The next morning, however, it appeared that they had moved somewhat to the left from where they were the night before.

At daylight next morning we advanced a few rods, more led by curiosity than by anything else, and, as I understood, without orders, to where we could overlook the town and somewhat overlook the position of the enemy. After daylight I saw them putting a battery into position a little to the right and the rear of Perryville; I also saw a considerable quantity of cavalry and infantry. I saw but one battery of artillery in the morning belonging to the enemy. When Wagner opened his battery they were driven from that point. That was the last seen of the artillery. The sun was half an hour high when we first saw the enemy moving off. They had evidently been moving previously. They continued to move for an hour and a half or two hours from the time I first saw them, perhaps longer. The cavalry moved across the field back of the town, which caused both parties to be moving off at the same time. The cavalry continued to pass till after the infantry had all gone and were passing when we left. There was a large body of them; they came out of the ravine and gully and passed over the ridge; passed down and accompanied another regiment, which hid them from our view. We could see them for perhaps a mile from the position we occupied on the eminence at the back of Perryville. They seemed moving off in the direction of Harrodsburg. They were moving with baggage trains, infantry, and cavalry. Of artillery I only saw one battery. I went down in person to where the enemy had previously planted a battery, and I was within 80 rods of the enemy; could see very distinctly; could distinguish countenances with a glass. I think they were passing off by their right till about 10 or 11 o'clock, when we fell back from the position we occupied perhaps $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 miles to the rear and right, which took us out of sight. When we left the enemy were still moving off with the majority of their cavalry. I think I saw 3,000 infantry and a large force of cavalry. They were passing off, not rapidly, but moderately; no disorder about it. We fell back a little between 10 and 11 o'clock by orders of General Wood. Captain Lennard came and gave orders for the whole of Wood's division to fall back and retire to the right and rear of their position. We lay there till about 2, when we passed through Perryville, and went to the spring below and remained there for the night.

Question. State whether you reported the information you gained from observation to your superior officers.

I reported immediately to the brigade commander, Colonel Harker, and it is my impression that he sent an orderly to General Wood, but I have no recollection of that particularly.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. You have spoken about the impatience of the troops of your division at Bowling Green; what were they impatient to do, colonel?

They were very anxious to move on and relieve the Munfordville force. In fact there had been a general impatience at not being allowed to attack the enemy. It amounted almost to indignation, among both officers and men, at that time more particularly. The impatience had extended from the time we moved up with General McCook toward Chattanooga or about Jasper. We then fell back and came over the mountain, and from this point there had been more or less impatience expressed all the way through. But from the time we left Gallatin there was a decided impatience in moving away from the enemy and allowing them to move along on the line partially of our own march without attacking them. From the time we left Gallatin to when we arrived at Bowling Green it increased very much. We knew that Munfordville was threatened, and while at Bowling Green we heard that Colonel Wilder had succeeded in repulsing the enemy. From that time there was clearly indignation among both officers and men. It was because we were not allowed to attack the enemy. From the time we fell back that feeling exhibited itself more particularly, but when we left Gallatin and proceeded toward Mitchellsville it increased, and then again at Bowling Green, knowing that Colonel Wilder was threatened, and hearing he was attacked the feeling further increased.

Question. Was your division anxious to move alone to the relief of Munfordville?

I never heard any remark that I know of relative to it. My remarks relative to relieving Munfordville applied to the general feeling in camp. There was nothing said as to whether one division should go or not. It seems to me that that would be somewhat inconsistent. To send one division would not have been very good judgment. I never heard an officer remark as to whether one division should move up or not. My impression is that the desire was not that one division should move up.

Question. Was there any judgment at all in this impatience; any knowledge of the position of the enemy, or of his strength, or of the force available to operate against him, or of the movements of other divisions of the army, or of the circumstances that controlled those movements?

I think it had become generally known and satisfactorily understood that the enemy had a force of about 30,000 to 35,000; that their position was on the northward, nearly opposite our forces; and it was generally known that Colonel Wilder or a force was at Munfordville, and also that the route taken by the enemy was in that direction. As to the movements of other divisions of the army, as to how they should move, I do not think it was known whether they could be spared or not. I do not think it was known what was detaining them. For my own part I did not, though I endeavored to keep myself pretty well posted. The facts that would make up the feeling in camp either for or against certain movements are not generally founded upon close calculation, though it is impossible for officers in a subordinate position to know why certain movements are made or why they are not.

Question. Toward whom was the impatience felt when General McCook returned after his expedition up the Sequatchie Valley?

The conversation and feeling turned upon the party responsible. It is very customary for conversations and observations to be made in the army without being directed against any individual. It was generally remarked and believed that the enemy were not in sufficient force to warrant our returning without at least an attempt to feel his position. It was not generally believed that the artillery could not be taken over the mountain, and that was the reason assigned for our not advancing farther there—that the artillery could not be taken over the mountain.

Question. Whose opinion was that supposed to be and who was supposed to be responsible for the attempt not being made?

The conclusion that I came to from what I heard was that the responsibility was thrown upon General McCook. I heard some remark that he had been ordered back. The opinion was rather divided and not definitely understood.

Commission adjourned to meet December 15, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 15, 1862.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General THOMAS J. WOOD (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Please state your name and position in the United States Army.

My name is Thomas J. Wood. I am colonel of the Second Regular Artillery and brigadier-general of volunteer forces.

Question. Please state if you were with the army in its pursuit of Bragg when he invaded Kentucky and what you know of the force of the rebels previous to your arrival at Munfordville.

I was with the Army of the Ohio in pursuit of the army led by Bragg when he invaded Kentucky, and all the information which I obtained from various sources satisfied me that the army led by General Bragg into Kentucky did not exceed 35,000 men.

Question. Previous to your arrival at Nashville, general, tell the Commission where and what was the situation about the time Bragg left Chattanooga, if you know.

For some ten or twelve days previous to the date of the commencement of the concentration of the army at Nashville I was stationed in the vicinity of McMinnville. I do not know the date of Bragg's leaving Chattanooga.

Question. State, if you please, whether at that time the railway from McMinnville to Tullahoma and from Tullahoma to Nashville was in operation.

It was during the greater part of the time; there were occasional interruptions.

Question. What is the character of the road and what was its condition at the time from Murfreesborough to Woodbury and from Woodbury to McMinnville?

I did not travel the usually followed road, but I know from reports that troops were constantly passing over from McMinnville to Woodbury, and the inference is that the road was good. There is an ordinary turnpike road from Woodbury to Murfreesborough, which I traveled over. I have no positive knowledge of the road from McMinnville to Woodbury.

Question. Do you know what the character of the road is from McMinnville to Spencer and from Spencer to Pikeville?

I do not know; I never marched over that road.

Question. What is your opinion, as a military man, as to the proposition to attack Bragg's army as he debouched from the Sequatchie Valley and descended from the Cumberland Mountains with the prospect of success?

Had the proposition been left to me I never would have attacked General Bragg in the Sequatchie Valley.

Question. Where would the proper place to attack him have been?

That would turn a great deal upon the condition of supplies. I have always entertained the opinion that if the supplies had warranted it it might have been judicious, had Bragg crossed the Cumberland River at all, in the neighborhood of Sparta; that would turn, however, upon the extent of supplies, which it is important for a military man to consider among the elements entering into such a movement. If the state of supplies had warranted it, after the army was concentrated at Murfreesborough, I believe General Bragg's army could have been beaten in the neighborhood of Sparta.

Question. Did you know, general, whether the army of General Buell was concentrated for a purpose of that sort and why it was not carried out?

I do not know that it was so concentrated or that such an arrangement or movement entered into General Buell's combinations. I had not seen General Buell from about the 15th of July, when I separated from him at Huntsville, till I met him in Nashville on the 6th of September. Had it been his intention he did not communicate it to me, for I had no personal, only telegraphic, communications and ordinary dispatches; even had I been with him I do not know that he would have communicated such a design to me.

Question. Upon what other points, in marching from McMinnville to Nashville and to Munfordville, would your judgment indicate General

Buell's army could have attacked Bragg's army with a prospect of success?

I think it might have been done after General Bragg crossed the Cumberland River, by a rapid concentration of the Army of the Ohio on the line that he was pursuing into Kentucky by the way of Glasgow. As is known, there is a turnpike road leading from this city to Gallatin and from there into Kentucky by the way of Scottsville and Glasgow. On the evening of the 6th of September I received an order from General Buell to commence crossing the Cumberland River with my division at daylight next morning and after the division had crossed to report to him in person. I did so. He then instructed me to march my division as far as what is called the Edgefield Junction, there to leave all the baggage in charge of the quartermaster, and take wagons enough to transport six days' rations for the troops and cooking utensils for the men. After making this arrangement to move with my division promptly in the direction of Gallatin, it was furthermore stated that it would be followed up by other divisions of the army on the same road; that he would probably be up at Gallatin the next morning by the time I got there. He also charged me to be very alert and gain all the information of the movements of the enemy that was possible. By following out what seemed to be General Buell's plan, so far as I could infer it from his orders to me in the disposition of the troops he was then making, I think it would have been possible to have concentrated his army at Glasgow before General Bragg concentrated his army there. It was not known at that time certainly, but only believed, that Bragg had crossed the Cumberland River. I certainly did not know anything of it, though I did shortly afterward.

Question. What was the practicability of General Buell's army re-entrenching Munfordville previous to its being attacked by Bragg?

I think that while it might have been a hazardous movement to the Army of the Ohio in some respects, it could have been done.

Question. What would have been the effect of a stand being made by the rebel army of 50,000 or 60,000 men at Munfordville upon the Army of the Ohio?

It would have been very dangerous for the Army of the Ohio to have attacked 50,000 or 60,000 men at Munfordville. According to the best of my recollection, and I think I gained my information from entirely reliable sources, I do not think the Army of the Ohio could have been brought to attack at Munfordville from 42,000 to 45,000 men. The position which an enemy of any intelligence would have occupied for a battle in that vicinity is not at the town of Munfordville, but about 2 miles south of Green River. The position consists of a very strong, rocky, woody ridge, stretching nearly at right angles with the line of approach by which the attacking forces would have been compelled to advance, and my opinion is that that position would have given the party holding it an advantage of at least 10,000 men. It is true, in my opinion, that the position might be turned by the right if the forces attacking it form the southern side. It would not have been absolutely necessary to attack the rebels in this position. There is a road across the country, broken and bad, but, from my knowledge of the country, barely practicable, from Bowling Green, by the way of Brownsville, Litchfield, &c., to Elizabethtown and Louisville.

Question. What would have been the effect of such a movement upon Bowling Green and Nashville?

To some extent certainly it would have uncovered both places and left them open to an attack of the enemy.

Question. Can you state how far and well the Army of the Ohio was provided with transportation while at Nashville, before it commenced that march toward Kentucky, when the army was concentrated at Nashville?

My own division had an ample supply of transportation, and so far as I know from contact with other divisions they had sufficient transportation. My answer was based upon the impression that the question referred to transportation for that movement. What was sufficient for one movement might not have been sufficient for another.

Question. State whether you accompanied the army in its march from Louisville to Perryville; and, if so, what you know of the movements of the enemy the day subsequent to that battle.

I did accompany the Army of the Ohio in its march from Louisville to Perryville. In the morning of the day following the battle of Chaplin Hills, two brigades of my division advanced to the edge of the town of Perryville and sent me back a report that the enemy had evacuated it. We were then ordered to advance to the town and to encamp at the springs beyond it, nearly on the Harrodsburg road. In this movement we saw nothing of the enemy, but learned from citizens that he had fallen back toward Harrodsburg. The object of that answer is to intimate that I saw nothing of the enemy personally that day. After receiving the report from these two brigades I rode into the town of Perryville myself, preceding the commencement of the movement of the troops toward that town.

Question. When it became known that the enemy had fallen back from Harrodsburg, was it understood what was the object of that movement on their part at the time?

I do not know that it was understood what was the object of the movement. I presume most of the officers who are acquainted with the movement had their own opinions about it.

Question. What was the opinion among intelligent officers as to the object of the movement?

There was some variety of opinions entertained on the subject, so far as I heard opinions given; but the weight of opinion, so far as I had any information, was that the object in falling back to Harrodsburg was to form a junction with Kirby Smith's force and make a stand there, or at the crossing of Dick's River, or at Camp Dick Robinson; but various opinions were entertained as to where they would make a stand, as would be the case in all circumstances.

Question. What was Kirby Smith's forces estimated at?

I have heard them variously estimated at from 12,000 to 25,000. Among intelligent officers generally the force was never estimated at over 15,000 men.

Question. You can state whether the retreat of the enemy from Bardstown to Perryville and from Perryville to Harrodsburg toward Cumberland Gap was conducted in an orderly manner, or did it partake in any degree of the character of a rout?

As I did not see a great deal of the enemy's forces while it was in retreat, it is almost impossible to say whether it was conducted in an orderly manner, except from results and inferences, and, so far as I could judge from the indications along the line of march, my opinion is that it was conducted in an orderly manner, and did not partake in any degree of the character of a rout. This opinion is based upon the fact that had there been a general rout we should have captured more prisoners, more supplies, and munitions of war. I think the retreat was a rapid one, but well conducted for so large a force and with such large supplies.

Question. Can you give the reason for the delay that occurred after the fight at Perryville in pursuing the enemy?

No, sir; I do not know the reason.

Cross-examination:

Question. Had you any opportunity of gaining information in regard to the strength of the enemy at Chattanooga or the strength with which he crossed the mountains to invade Kentucky?

I received information from an expedition which I sent to Altamont from the neighborhood of McMinnville about the 22d of August that General Bragg had crossed the Tennessee River in the neighborhood of Chattanooga between the 16th and 20th of August with four divisions. The information I received about that time led me to suppose these divisions comprised some forty-eight or fifty regiments. But the information was varied. There was some contradiction in regard to the strength of these regiments. Some reports received said the regiments were weak; others that they had been filled up. Some of these statements put the regiments at from 300 to 400; others carried them up to 600. This information I got from my own operations in that country. About the 28th or 29th of August, as well as I remember, a person who reported himself to be a spy in the employ of General Buell came to McMinnville and was put in communication with me by General Thomas. This person represented himself as having passed some time in Chattanooga and as having left there only a short time before. He stated the enemy's force generally to be somewhere in the neighborhood of 60,000 men. He said that there were four divisions at Chat-

nooga, and that they had about 15,000 men in each division. He went into the minutiae, giving names of commanders of divisions and commanders of corps, strength of regiments and strength of companies. His name, I believe, was Thatcher.

Question. According to all the information derived, what estimate did you at that time place upon the strength of Bragg's army in crossing the mountains?

My opinion at the time General Bragg's force was crossing the mountains and moving up the Sequatchie Valley, by weighing all the information I had been able to receive, was that it amounted to from 40,000 to 45,000 men. The opinions which I received from my own operations would not have led me to put so high an estimate as that upon the force; but the information obtained through the spy referred to led me to estimate it very much higher than the number I have given; but by comparing all the information, and making allowances and taking the mean between them, I entertained the opinion at that time that the force was about 45,000 men. This does not include Kirby Smith's.

Question. Had you as good an opportunity of acquiring information as to the strength and movements of the enemy as any colonel in your command?

I should think a great deal better.

Question. Did you ever hear the strength of the enemy estimated by any intelligent officer who had peculiar facilities for acquiring information as low as 25,000 men?

I never heard an estimate which placed it as low as 25,000 men.

Question. Do you believe now that Bragg entered Kentucky with no more than 25,000 men?

No, sir.

Question. Have you a pretty good knowledge of the country from the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad northwest for a distance, say, of 50 or 60 miles?

A portion of my division, myself with it, was stationed three weeks at Decherd, on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad; subsequently it moved to Manchester; then to Morrison's Station, on the Tullahoma and McMinnville road; then to within 2 miles of McMinnville. This extended from the 20th of July to the 3d of September. During that time I was deeply interested in knowing as much as possible of the movements of the enemy—by what routes he could approach my own position. This led me to study the maps of the country as far as I could, and to gain all the information I could from the citizens in regard to the various roads through the mountains, more especially from Chattanooga to the various positions occupied by my division.

Question. What might be the various objects of an enemy crossing the Tennessee River near Chattanooga and descending into the Sequatchie Valley, having reference to the country we then occupied?

I suppose there might be a variety of objects. At that time the Army of the Ohio occupied a line extending from Nashville by the way of the Columbia and the Pulaski Railroad to Athens; thence eastward by way of Huntsville to Stevenson and Battle Creek; also troops were posted from Nashville along the line of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad and extending eastward as far as McMinnville. It might have been an object of the enemy to cross the mountains from the Sequatchie Valley and attack any of these forces in reserve along the line of the railroad to Athens eastward and crush them and afterward move rapidly on Nashville, or he might have crossed the mountains by the way of Altamont down on to McMinnville and fallen on the force there. The ultimate object of such a movement, I presume, would have been to clear the obstacles out of the way as soon as possible and move on Nashville. The object of such a movement would be Nashville. I cannot see that he would have crossed the mountains to stop at the foot of them.

Question. Could he have had it in view to descend the Sequatchie Valley and attack our forces in North Alabama, supposing that he was in a condition to assume the offensive?

My opinion is that it was in the range of his power. For such a movement as that I think he would have passed by way of Decherd, from my knowledge of the routes and roads. Whether it would have been within the objects proposed to himself or not is more than I can answer.

Question. State, if you please, the different routes by which the army could emerge from the Sequatchie Valley across the mountains.

Commencing at the most westerly route of the Sequatchie Valley of which I have any knowledge, it would have been possible to have passed a force by the way of Pelham, and from Pelham to Manchester, from Manchester to Woodbury, Murfreesborough, and so on. Then there is a road leading from the Sequatchie Valley, south of Dunlap, direct to Altamont (that is my recollection from the information I got), by which the enemy could have crossed the mountains. There is also a road leading from Dunlap to Altamont; a road also leading from Dunlap directly to McMinnville, crossing the mountains, and then down the valley of Caney Fork to McMinnville. There is also a road leading from Dunlap to Pikeville and from Pikeville to McMinnville, I think passing by way of Spencer. Also by continuing from Pikeville on toward Sparta the enemy could have turned the spur of the mountains and moved westward into the plains of Middle Tennessee. There is also a road, entirely west of any that I have described, leading from Decherd across the mountains to Stevenson.

Question. What is the nature of the ordinary road from Stevenson to Jasper and Battle Creek?

I do not know. I believe I have described all the routes of which I have any recollection, and while I have stated that all these roads were entirely practicable for the enemy, those portions lying in the mountains are not very good roads.

Question. Which of those roads is the most practicable?

Judging from my own knowledge of all the roads across the mountains directly, I consider the road from Dunlap to McMinnville the most practicable one.

Question. Do you know anything of what is called the Therman or Anderson road?

Not of my own knowledge. My information led me to believe that it is not a good road; rather a rough road; but a very good one for carriages.

Question. Does that road pass through Altamont?

No, sir; I do not think it does; it passes west of Altamont; but I may be mistaken. From that road it would be practicable to go by way of Altamont.

Question. Is Altamont in the mountains?

Yes, sir; it is.

Question. Describe, if you please, the different roads by which you can pass from Altamont into the plains northwest of the mountains.

There is a road leading from Altamont down the mountains into the plains to Winchester or Decherd. There is a road from Altamont by way of Tracy City and Hawkinsville by way of Decherd. There is another route from Altamont by way of Pelham, which also passes by Hawkinsville. There is a road from Altamont to Hillsborough, and by that way into the plain. There is also a road from Altamont by the way of Hickory Creek to Manchester; a branch leads off from this road to McMinnville; and there is also a road leading from Altamont over into the road leading from Dunlap direct to McMinnville. I would say, general, that there are quite a number of roads from Altamont by which troops could be marched down into the plains.

Question. Is there any one point which would command all those roads which diverged from the Therman or Anderson road?

I think a sufficient force occupying Altamont would be able to command the roads referred to in the question.

Commission adjourned to meet December 16, at 10 a. m.

DECEMBER 16, 1862.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Examination of General T. J. Wood continued:

By General BUELL:

Question. Did you endeavor to ascend the mountains to Altamont with any portion of your command while you were in that region?

I did.

Question. Please state, then, the practicability of such a movement.

The road by which the ascent was attempted, and in part effected, is a very difficult one. The operation was a slow one, very slow indeed. Two brigades were marched up and one battery, I think, to the summit of the mountains, some 5 or 6 miles from Altamont. The ascent was commenced by another battery, but the operation was not completed; it was stopped by order of General Thomas, who was present and who was the ranking officer. It was quite a difficult operation and necessarily a slow one. No wagons, so far as I can recollect, were taken up the mountains at all. While it is what would be called a wagon road, it is a very bad one indeed, but could not be called an entirely impracticable one. The march up the ascent of the two brigades and part of another occupied pretty much one entire day.

Question. Did you understand that that movement was ordered in consequence of the information that the enemy was advancing on Altamont?

That was my impression at the time.

Question. Did you understand that it was a movement in which other corps of the army participated and to have for its object the concentration of the army at Altamont?

I had no information but to concentrate. I was informed by General Thomas, who was in command in that region of country at the time we were making the movement from McMinnville and that neighborhood toward Altamont, that General McCook and General Schoepf's divisions, according to the best of my recollection, would be concentrated at Altamont, and would probably reach there shortly after it was expected that the two divisions with which I was associated would be there.

Question. Supposing the information in possession of the commanding general to indicate that Bragg was in the act of crossing Walden's Ridge with the purpose of crossing the Cumberland Mountains by the Therman road, what would you think of the expediency and propriety of throwing a force of, say, 5,000 men in front of him on that road with instructions to fall back and unite with the army, forming a junction at Altamont, supposing such a junction to be practicable in other respects?

The judiciousness of such an arrangement would depend somewhat upon the distance in advance of Altamont a force of 5,000 men would be placed.

Question. Supposing this force of 5,000 men to be in the Sequatchie Valley and probably within reach of the Anderson road before the advance of the enemy could reach the valley?

I should consider it a very good arrangement for observing the enemy's movements, its rear being secured and the line of communication for falling back safe, always understanding, of course, that officers did their duty and never allowed themselves to be surprised in their communications.

Question. Can you state, from observation or official report, of the practicability of maintaining the army at Altamont, considering the want of water and other necessary supplies?

It would have been exceedingly difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to maintain any considerable force at Altamont for any length of time or even a few days. At the time I was at Altamont water was exceedingly scarce, and the road by which supplies would have been drawn I have already described. It is a very poor country indeed; land thin, little cultivation, and almost impossible to obtain any forage for animals in that locality for any length of time.

Question. Do you know anything about the Anderson or Therman road where it ascends the mountain from the Sequatchie Valley—whether it is good or bad?

I have no personal knowledge of that road. All I could state would be from information reported to me at the time. I was never farther than Altamont on that road.

Question. Did you learn while you were in that region that the enemy had worked upon that road and were the enemy's cavalry on that road about the time of your being there?

It was reported to me that the enemy was improving that road by parties I sent as far out as Altamont and scouting parties I sent out who encountered the enemy on that road. The opinion in regard to the improvement of the road was derived from citizens of the country.

Question. Could an army advance across the mountains by that road and descend into the plains by any roads you have described without difficulty?

I think they could, sir. We found it a great deal easier to get down than to get up.

Question. What is the distance from Jasper, the extreme road on one flank by which an enemy could march from the Sequatchie Valley, and Sparta, the point on the other extreme by which he could march from that valley?

Following the outlines of the mountains from Jasper around by the way of Decherd, McMinnville, and Sparta, in regard to guarding all the issues from the mountains, would cover a distance of over 100 miles.

Question. What force in proportion to the force of the enemy do you think would be necessary to guard such a line as that, the enemy in the Sequatchie Valley screened by the mountains and having the option of emerging from the valley by any of the various routes you have described considering all the possibilities of concentration?

I should think it would require a force from one-third to one-half larger than that of the enemy to do this effectually and to save the detachments from being overwhelmed before concentration had taken place.

Question. State, if you please, general, the disposition of the people of Middle Tennessee toward the Government and the army of the whole country in which we were operating.

The disposition of the people at that time, amounting almost to unanimity, was exceedingly hostile. The people of the districts I passed through were, with few exceptions, all rebels. The only locality I have ever been in in Tennessee in which I met with any evidence of genuine loyalty was Shelbyville. Of course here and there I met with an isolated individual who was loyal and had maintained his devotion to the Government, and I made it a point to learn of such persons with a view of getting information from them.

Question. Do you suppose it possible to conceal the movements of an army from the enemy in the midst of such a population?

I do not, sir.

Question. Is it possible to procure supplies for an army in the midst of such a population otherwise than by using force, supposing there are supplies?

I have always found it necessary to guard all my trains and protect all my operations for gathering supplies in Tennessee, and I do not think it would be possible to supply an army without covering its foraging parties in such a country with strong guards.

Question. Will you state, if you please, general, what the condition of the country was at that time in regard to supplies? Were the supplies abundant and were they in the hands of producers, or were they collected in large quantities in different places?

The supplies necessary for an army were not at that time very abundant in the country, and, so far as my observation extended, were in the hands of producers, and not collected together in large quantities, and I always had to gather them by my own exertions.

Question. What were the supplies that the country afforded?

With rare exceptions only corn and beef; occasionally I succeeded in capturing a little flour.

Question. In what condition was the corn at that time?

For a period of twenty days before the Army of the Ohio commenced to evacuate Tennessee the corn could be used for the subsistence of animals by being cautious. Part of the twenty days I do not think it was in a condition for grinding, and could not therefore have been used as a reliance for breadstuffs for the men. A little of it was grated, I believe, by the soldiers themselves for making corn bread and mush, but that would be no dependence for feeding an army.

Question. Had the supplies of the men not been exhausted by the rebel forces before their retreat?

I think they had, sir, in a very considerable measure. In the country I was in some corn was left, but not a very great deal, and that was pretty much exhausted by us before the new crop came in.

Question. Can you state in a general way what the movements of the rebels were in the months of July and August in the organization of guerrilla bands and the use of a cavalry force in the country occupied by the enemy?

In the months of July and August last the rebels were active in organizing guerrilla bands to prowl through the country, and their cavalry force was actively employed in efforts to cut our lines of communication in rear of us, and this was frequently done.

Question. How did the cavalry of our army and that of the enemy compare in strength and efficiency, as far as you had an opportunity of judging.

I am not able to give an opinion worth anything in regard to the relative strength of our cavalry and that of the rebels, but I regret to say that I think the rebel cavalry generally showed much more efficiency and activity than ours did.

Question. Was there anything in the condition of our service which made it necessary to disperse our cavalry a great deal in small detachments, such as the occupation of a wide extent of country?

Our troops were very much scattered at that time, having long lines of communication and defenses to guard, and as a matter of course, for the protection of such small garrisons as many of them were, it was generally necessary to disperse the cavalry or divide it very much, with the view of furnishing all these garrisons the means of obtaining information of the designs and movements of the enemy.

Question. Do you know upon what point the army in Tennessee was dependent as a base of supplies?

I always understood Nashville to be the point. I never heard any other mentioned. The supplies were not furnished by Nashville, but brought to it from other points; and while it was also a base of our operations, in regard to our supplies it was merely a depot.

Question. What I mean to inquire is what was the source of supplies and the line of communication of the army with that source?

The supplies, as I always understood, were furnished outside of Tennessee. A great many, I believe, came from Louisville, by way of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. While the Cumberland River was navigable, my understanding was that some of the supplies were brought up the Cumberland by boats. Where these supplies came from, whether from Louisville or other points, I do not know, nor can I say what time the Cumberland River ceased to be navigable for us. But during the latter period of our occupation of Tennessee we were wholly dependent on the line of Louisville and Nashville Railroad for our supplies. Occasionally some small supplies were found, as I mentioned, in the country.

Question. Do you know anything of the interruption of the railroad between Nashville and Louisville, by which the army was cut off from its source of supplies?

It was a matter of notoriety to everybody in the Army of the Ohio that the line of communication between Louisville and Nashville, as well as between Nashville and points farther south occupied by the army, was interrupted, by which the army was cut off from its supplies. We were frequently for a number of days, but I cannot state how many, without mail communication, and the reason always assigned, and which I believe was true, was the interruption of communication. At one period while I was at Decherd I found it necessary, on account of the interruption of communication and the importance arising therefrom of getting supplies, to take possession of all the mills in the neighborhood to obtain breadstuff for the men by grinding corn; but this was a difficult operation, and could not have been depended upon for a long period, nor could a large body of men have been subsisted by such means.

Question. What was the extreme length of the line of communication of the army from Louisville to points which it occupied in Alabama?

I should say that the average extended over 300 miles.

Question. Considering the scarcity of supplies in the country and the numbers and efficiency of the rebel cavalry, regular and irregular, what do you think of the practicability of depending upon the country for supplies for the army and carrying on at the same time active operations in a mountainous region, beyond the sphere in which these supplies were to be obtained, if at all?

I do not think it would be practicable, sir.

Question. Is it an axiom in military science that the army on the defensive in mountain warfare has the advantage?

Yes, sir. I should regard it as a military axiom that the party holding the mountain and living upon it can with a much smaller force maintain their position than the attacking party. I think the history of all mountain wars will bear out the statement.

Question. Was it at the option of General Bragg in invading Middle Tennessee to assume the offensive or defensive?

Yes, sir. I have already described a number of routes by which General Bragg could have crossed the mountains and descended into the plains of Middle Tennessee. By these routes offensive operations were of course open to him. On the other hand, he could have occupied a position in the mountains from which he might have threatened different points in Middle Tennessee. At the same time he could with his cavalry have carried on active operations, as was done, without occupying these positions in the mountains in our rear. Had General Bragg occupied such a position in the mountains his general war, in reference to any operations against him by the Army of the Ohio, would necessarily have been a defensive war.

Question. Supposing it had been certainly known that General Bragg designed to pass through Pikeville for the purpose of taking either the road to Sparta or McMinnville at his option, would it have been possible for my army to occupy a position in the mountains which would have had more than the effect to delay his movements, considering the condition of supplies, considering also the circumstances we had in view, and would it or would it not have been necessary at length to fall back?

From my knowledge of the position in the mountains, I do not think there is any point the occupation of which would have prevented General Bragg from moving by the route passing through Pikeville, considering, of course, the state of our supplies and the facilities which would then have existed for occupying such a position for obtaining supplies for the army. It is furthermore my opinion that had such a position been occupied on the hypothesis that General Bragg would not attempt to cross the mountains or pass up the Sequatchie Valley around the spur of mountains by Sparta, it would have been necessary to fall back and concentrate at some point in the plains of Middle Tennessee. This opinion is based upon my knowledge of the difficulty of getting supplies through the mountain, the badness of the roads, and also my judgment that the occupation of a point in the mountains merely could not have so seriously threatened the enemy's movements up the Sequatchie Valley, and would have rendered it necessary he should have cleared the position in the mountains.

Question. Was it generally understood, about the time of the enemy's advance from Chattanooga, that Nashville was the enemy's objective point?

My recollection of the weight of opinion of officers with whom I conversed about the time of the advance of General Bragg from Chattanooga is that Nashville was the objective point. Up to that time no demonstrations had been made which could lead to entertaining any other opinion.

Question. If it was improper under the circumstances to oppose the advance of Bragg's army into Middle Tennessee in or near the mountains, what, considering the character of the country and the position of the roads, was the natural and necessary point for concentrating the army to oppose his advance upon Nashville?

I think Murfreesborough was the most eligible point in the case stated, considering also the position and disposition at the time of our own troops.

Question. At what point in the line of march from Sparta on toward Kentucky could it first be certainly assumed that Kentucky was his destination?

After the enemy had passed above the spur of the mountains north of Sparta, and the information of his movements not indicating that he had turned westward with the bulk of his forces, but was perhaps continuing his movements northward, it would leave ground for conjecture that he had another object than Nashville. My information would go to show that parties were detached from about Sparta in the direction of Smithfield and Lebanon about the time the enemy was in that region of country. What was the extent of these parties I do not know. This occurred about the 5th or 6th of September. I tried myself to gain all the information I could of the movements of the enemy, and I confess I was not satisfied fully in my own mind up to that time whether his object was Nashville or Kentucky. I arrived in this city with my division on the 6th of September. Upon thinking over all the information I had been able to gain up to that time I began seriously to believe, from the movements of the enemy, that he had another object than Nashville, and of course that was Kentucky. I do not wish it understood that it was a positively entertained conviction. In consequence of beginning to entertain this conviction seriously and to be prepared for either alternative, according to my judgment and the exigencies of the case, I suggested, in an interview which General Buell did me the honor to have with me that day, that it would be proper to pass his army or a portion of it to the north side of the Cumberland river. This arrangement was proposed for a double purpose, both in reference to the invasion of Kentucky or an advance upon Nashville from the northern side of the river.

Question. When was it certainly ascertained that Bragg's army was advancing into Kentucky? And state how it was ascertained.

In a previous answer I have already stated that I crossed the Cumberland River at Nashville with my division early in the day of the 7th of September. I also gave in that answer the instructions I had from General Buell in regard to certain movements indicated in my answer. On reaching Gallatin, on the morning of the 8th, I received a telegraphic dispatch from General Buell directing me to halt within two or three miles of Gallatin, on the Nashville side, and to remain there until I received further orders from him. He furthermore directed me to send out the cavalry attached to my division, and to try by all means to get information of the position, designs, and movements of the enemy. I conformed with these instructions. I sent out the cavalry during the day and kept them out till a considerable time after night-fall on Monday, September 8. On the return of the cavalry it was reported to me that they had met at various points in various directions a hostile cavalry force, but in no instance had they seen any infantry. It was, however, reported to me, from a pretty reliable source, that Cheatham's division of the enemy was advancing toward Gallatin. With the view of arriving at the information that I desired to get in the most specific and reliable manner I employed a person, of whose loyalty I became entirely satisfied, to go eastward from Gallatin, following up the course of the Cumberland River, till he could obtain accurate and reliable information of the strength, position, movements, and designs of the enemy.

This person left me at sundown Monday, the 8th. During the night of the 8th I received an order from General Buell to move with my division from Gallatin, by way of Mitchellsville, to Bowling Green. I marched early Tuesday morning, and encamped that night in the neighborhood of Mitchellsville; next morning the march was resumed, and I advanced 8 miles beyond Franklin, Ky., when, having made about 22 miles that day, I went into camp. While in camp, about 2 o'clock Wednesday, the spy I had dispatched from the neighborhood of Gallatin joined me. He brought me information, which I then believed to be reliable and subsequent events have to a considerable extent verified it, that the enemy had crossed the Cumberland River at two or three different points, but his information to me was that the bulk of the force had crossed at Gainesborough. He furthermore informed me that all the information he could gain induced him to believe that the enemy's force was about 35,000 strong. He was quite an intelligent person, showing it by his manners and description of things. He furthermore informed me that the line of march of the enemy, as he had learned from soldiers, would be Tompkinsville, Glasgow, and Munfordville. He then added, "Beyond this point, general, I cannot certainly tell you where they will go; but it is generally said in their army that Louisville is their destination."

Believing this information to be very important, although the man represented to me that he had ridden 150 miles since he had left me at sundown Monday evening, I told him he must go immediately with the information to General Buell, whom I supposed was then in Nashville. I gave him a fresh horse and started him off at once, and told him he must see General Buell by daylight next morning. I was then about 56 miles from Nashville and about 12 from Bowling Green. I sent the messenger himself because I did not wish to trust to writing, but wished him to see General Buell himself, that he might tell his own narrative. I do not know certainly what time the next day this person reported to him; but that General Buell saw him I know, because he told me subsequently at Bowling Green that a person had reported to him and gave him the information (whether it was the first time such information was communicated to General Buell I do not know) that the enemy had crossed the Cumberland into Kentucky. It was the first information I had which put the matter beyond all question and set at rest the doubts as to what was the object of the enemy. I wrote a note then to General Rousseau, whose division was ahead of mine in the direction of Bowling Green, communicating the information I had obtained from the spy. I furthermore dispatched the information by couriers to the rear to General Crittenden, who was the next in my rear, to General McCook, and requested him to see that General Mitchell, who was in command of a division, got it also. I broke up my camp near night-fall and marched to Bowling Green that night, namely, the 10th of September.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Examination of Brig. Gen. T. J. Wood continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Did you, general, know any reason for the movement of your division toward Bowling Green in advance of your information that the whole rebel army was moving upon Glasgow?

I did not have any positive information; in fact I did not have any. The dispatch I received directing that movement did not contain, so far as I recollect, any reason for it.

Question. Was it known while you were at Gallatin, with more or less certainty, that a portion of the rebel army had crossed the Cumberland River at Carthage and was moving northward?

I cannot say it was known by myself or by any person under my command or with whom I had communication at that time that any portion of the rebel army had crossed at Carthage and was moving northward. I heard a report either Saturday, the 6th, or Sunday, the 7th, and I think in General Buell's quarters, that some portion of the rebel forces had crossed the Cumberland River at Carthage, but how much reliance was to be placed upon the report I do not know; but I am certain I did not hear it stated then when I heard this report that any movement had taken place toward Kentucky; and my understanding of the movement toward Gallatin of my division, and what I understood was to be followed up by other divisions, was induced in part by this report. While at Gallatin, as I have already stated, reports came in that the rebel force that had crossed at Carthage would probably come to Gallatin. It was understood to be Cheatham's division. This information came from a well-known loyal man, and it was this opinion which induced me to employ the spy I have referred to in my preceding answer. The information I have referred to above as having been heard in General Buell's quarters came in directly through some lady who had been in that part of the country and had, I believe, brought the information to her husband.

Question. Supposing it to have been known that the rebel force which had crossed at Carthage was moving northward, was it probable that Bowling Green would be its destination, without having any positive information as to its destination?

Yes, sir; there is nothing in the topography of the country, nothing in the nature of the roads or communication, which would preclude the idea that Bowling Green would be its destination.

Question. Was there anything to entice the enemy to that point as a subordinate or minor operation?

Yes, sir; there was an important bridge over Barren River at Bowling Green which is one of the most important links in the line of railway between Louisville and Nashville. There had been at Bowling Green, at that time, to the best of my recollection, but a small garrison, which could not have made much resistance against a considerable force.

Question. Were there any supplies at that point which would have been important to the Army of the Ohio?

I was informed by General Buell in Nashville on the 6th and 7th of September that there were about a million of rations at Bowling Green. With the exception of one article, breadstuffs, there was a large quantity of supplies.

Question. What is the distance from Carthage and Gainesborough to Glasgow?

I think the distance to be about 50 miles and from Carthage to Glasgow about 50.

Question. With the information that the whole rebel army was moving upon Glasgow, would it have been judicious to bring a portion of the Army of the Ohio upon that point?

No, sir; I do not think it would have been a safe movement for half of the Army of the Ohio.

Question. What is the distance from Nashville to Glasgow by the way of Bowling Green?

It is 95 miles, according to my best recollection of the distance.

Question. After information of the fact that Bragg's army had marched over the Cumberland River toward Glasgow was it possible to concentrate the Army of the Ohio at that point in advance of them?

I do not think it was possible.

Question. Do you know when the division preceding the rear division of the Army of the Ohio arrived at Bowling Green?

My recollection is that it was on Sunday, the 14th of September, or Monday, the 15th, but on this point I cannot now be positive.

Question. What was about the strength of the Army of the Ohio at that time and at that point?

There were six divisions concentrated at Bowling Green about that time. I have no positive knowledge of the amount of cavalry force there, but I suppose the infantry force would have been somewhere in the neighborhood of 35,000 men. This estimate might be slightly under or slightly over the actual number.

Question. With what we know now of the strength of the rebel army, would it have been judicious or not to attack it without necessity with a less force than that when an additional force was coming up?

No, sir; it would not.

Question. Do you know when the rebel army marched from Glasgow?

From the information I received at the time of the movement from Bowling Green to Munfordville, the advance of the main rebel army left Glasgow on Monday, the 15th of September, and by Wednesday morning, the 17th, there was no rebel force at Glasgow. There might have been a few stragglers. Such was the information I received on the afternoon of the 17th of September from persons who represented themselves as citizens of Glasgow.

Question. Where was the rebel army supposed to be when the Army of the Ohio marched from Bowling Green?

The bulk of it was believed to be at Glasgow, and I think it was known that there was a brigade or more at Bell's or Glasgow Junction, and perhaps some parties thrown out on the roads leading from Glasgow to Bowling Green, of which there were two or three. Such was my impression, and I know more of the country and its topography than any other officer in the Army of the Ohio.

Question. Do you know whether it was a matter of newspaper information that a portion of Kirby Smith's force had been at Lebanon, and was it reported at Bowling Green that that force had moved toward Munfordville?

There were reports in the newspapers at that time that a force estimated at about 4,000 had been at Lebanon, and it was intimated that it belonged to a part of Kirby Smith's force; it was furthermore reported at Bowling Green, when the first attack was made on Munfordville, on Sunday, the 14th, that a part of Kirby Smith's or the force that was reported to be at Lebanon was concerned in it. The true facts of the case did not come out till two or three days afterward, when it became known that it was Chalmers' brigade that made the attack on Sunday.

Question. Was there even then any contradiction of the report that this portion of Kirby Smith's force was there?

No, sir; there was not.

Question. Was the report probable?

I cannot say it was, but I can say distinctly that there was no impossibility in it, and perhaps no improbability. There was nothing in the nature of the country or in the positions that could have prevented it. The country from the Kentucky River to Glasgow at that time was open to the movements of the rebel troops.

Question. Do you know with what immediate purpose my army marched from Bowling Green?

I believe I do, sir. I think I got it from the commanding general of the Army of the Ohio himself. It was with the intention of attacking General Bragg at Glasgow. Such at least was my understanding of it, and certainly I marched with my division from Bowling Green with that understanding. I talked with General Buell more than once upon that subject, and I think I knew his views. I remember distinctly that I gave it as my opinion that it would be a safe operation for us. I may be mistaken, but that is my recollection. The manner in which the army moved and the roads on which they moved all indicate that independently of any other information. Of course we all understood that information derived after leaving Bowling Green might change or modify the plan of operations. The army commenced to move from Bowling Green in the afternoon of Tuesday, the 16th of September, and my own division moved at 3 o'clock.

Question. How long were you precisely in marching from Bowling Green to Munfordville?

My division marched from Bowling Green Tuesday, the 16th of September. My division encamped in Woodsonville, on the south side of Green River, on Sunday, the 21st of September, making five days and a piece.

Question. Was there variation in the rate of marching during that time?

During the days that the troops marched, considering the number of the troops moving, the marches were about as usual. It was necessary to conform our marches to some extent to the places where water could be found. The country from Bowling Green to Green River is an exceedingly dry and badly watered one. There are scarcely any running streams, very few springs, and the dependence is upon ponds or surface water, and the season previous to and at that time was exceedingly dry.

Question. What is the distance from Bowling Green to Munfordville?

Forty miles.

Question. Do you think that movement an extraordinarily slow one to have been made by an army of 40,000 men almost in the presence of an enemy whose position had to be ascertained step by step?

No, sir; I do not consider it an extraordinarily slow one.

Question. It has been observed by some witness in this investigation that the marches were long when the enemy was distant and much shorter when they were near. Do you think that extraordinary?

No, sir; I do not. In approaching an enemy whose position and strength are not fully known, and from whom battle is expected, common prudence would require that he should be approached cautiously until sufficient information had been obtained to warrant a change of such movements with safety.

Question. When an army moves upon a single road is not the movement of the head of the column necessarily slackened to bring the forces simultaneously upon the ground when it is expected to meet the enemy?

It must be done, unless the commander would run the hazard of attacking with his force in detail or separately.

Question. Were there any other routes except that by Munfordville by which Bragg's army could have marched into Central Kentucky from Glasgow?

Yes; there are two or three certainly. He could have avoided Munfordville, passing entirely to the eastward of it.

Question. Was it to be supposed that a force of 1,500 men at Munfordville, with no other object than to guard the railroad bridge, which could be replaced in a week, would attempt to oppose the advance of a large army such as Bragg commanded?

No, sir; I do not think it would.

Question. To leave it there was it not merely offering a bait to the enemy?

Yes, sir; I think it was. My opinion is that the force was sacrificed by being ordered to remain there, when it could have been withdrawn had the commander been allowed to use his discretion.

Question. Do you know whether I had any control over that force or any communication with it?

My understanding at the time we were at Bowling Green was that the force at Munfordville and the post belonged entirely to the command of General Wright and his, and so far as I know there was no official communication between that post and Bowling Green. The only information we got of the position of affairs was from citizens who came from the country and who brought rumors more or less reliable. The orders given to the garrison at that post came from the authorities I have mentioned. Such was my understanding.

Question. Will you state, if you please, the more important particulars of your movements from Corinth to North Alabama and the cause of the delay on that march and the manner in which your command was employed?

On Monday, the 1st of June, 1862, my division left Corinth, left under an order to proceed to Iuka, Tuscumbia, and Decatur, the object of the movement being to aid in repairing and to protect the working parties engaged in the repair of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. A regiment of mechanics and engineers was sent along to aid in the work. The engineering department was committed chiefly to General Smith, while the military conduct of the whole matter was committed to me. My orders were to put the road in working order from Corinth to Decatur, to repair all the burnt bridges, and to make good any other destructions that had been committed on the road. Several important bridges were entirely rebuilt, tracks repaired and newly laid down—a great deal of such work, as would naturally occur to me as necessary to be performed. The most of the labor was performed by the troops of my division. The work was found to be much heavier than was originally expected, and much delay occurred in the completion of it for the want of locomotives and cars, which could have been usefully employed in transporting material used in repairing the road. The greatest diligence was exercised on my part and the troops under my command to get through this work. It was not an agreeable duty, and the great separation of my forces necessary to carry on different parts of the work at the same time made it a very dangerous one, as it exposed us to be attacked by the enemy when we were very much scattered. For these reasons it was my desire to prosecute the work as rapidly as possible and to complete it at the earliest day. It was not, however, entirely completed till about the close of June, when I marched with the last of my [command] from Tuscumbia to Decatur, the bulk of the division having preceded me to Decatur, and repaired the road between Tuscumbia and Decatur and put it in working order.

Question. When did your division cross the river at Decatur?

I crossed with the rear of it on Sunday, July 6, 1862. The facilities for crossing the Tennessee were the poorest and of the most inconvenient character.

Question. Will you give the subsequent movements of your division up to about the time when the army was being concentrated around Altamont?

About midday, Sunday, July 13, I received an order to move with two brigades of my division to Stevenson, Ala. I marched that afternoon in obedience to that order. On reaching Huntsville, early Monday morning, the 14th, I received information of the raid on and of the taking of Murfreesborough. I went immediately to General Buell, in advance of my two brigades, to report their approach; was instructed by him to move as rapidly as possible to Shelbyville by the way of Fayetteville, Middle Tenn. I moved on with my command in the afternoon of the same day, continued the march the same day to Fayetteville and the day following to Shelbyville, making the entire distance of 87 miles in a small fraction over three days.

I remained two days at Shelbyville, when I received an order from General Buell to proceed immediately to Winchester, and take position in that vicinity in such a way as most effectually to protect and cover the railroad in that region, as well as generally to prevent the irruption of rebel troops into Middle Tennessee and Northern Alabama. I remained three weeks in the vicinity of Decherd. While stationed there the troops of my command were employed in guarding the railroad of Middle Tennessee from Wartrace to Decherd. Of course a great deal of time was occupied in scouting and exploring the country, getting information as to the position and designs of the enemy, as well as all information in regard to roads. Also while there, after the arrival of General Thomas, I aided in commencing and carrying out to a certain extent the fortifications designed to protect Decherd, the intention being at that time to make it a depot for the supplies of the troops in that part of the country.

About the 14th of August I left Decherd under orders to aid in putting the railroad from Tullahoma to McMinnville in working order. I marched from Decherd on August 14, from there to Manchester, from Manchester to Morrison Station, on the railroad, and remained there till the road was open entirely to McMinnville. This brought us up to about the 22d of August. About this time came in the reports of the crossing of the rebels at Chattanooga, and then commenced the movements which subsequently followed with a view of concentrating the troops at Altamont.

Question. Will you state what you know of the character and extent of the cavalry operations of the enemy about this time?

Their operations were very active, and according to all the information I obtained extended from Central Kentucky to Middle Tennessee. The rebel cavalry seemed to be on the alert during the whole of this time and ready to fall on any exposed place.

Information was derived by our scouting parties of their presence at various points throughout the country; in fact you could not miss, in going out, hearing of them and their movements. It was my understanding that Nashville was seriously threatened by them. It was reported that they had made their appearance in the vicinity of Nashville, and I never heard the report discredited. I was informed that the people were alarmed for the safety of the place.

Question. Were these movements of the enemy in large or small bodies or both?

From the reports I received the movements were sometimes made in considerable force; at other times in smaller parties. I heard of them moving in bodies of from 1,500 to 2,000; at other times in bodies from 100 to 300. I think perhaps I heard forces estimated as high as 2,500, but I think I never heard a higher estimate placed upon a single body.

Question. Had your march to Shelbyville any reference to these movements?

So I understood it and such were my instructions. It was feared that after taking Murfreesborough the enemy would move westward rapidly and perhaps cut our communication at Columbia, and it was with a view to be in position to prevent such a movement as this that I understood I was ordered to Shelbyville. I might add further, on receiving my orders to go to Shelbyville General Buell, who gave them to me in person, thought it might be necessary for me to go on to Murfreesborough; that, however, was to be regulated by circumstances, to be determined when I reached Shelbyville.

The night I passed at Fayetteville, which was the day before arriving at Shelbyville, I heard that the enemy was still at Murfreesborough. It was my intention, and I sent back a report to General Buell that if I should find this report confirmed on arriving at Shelbyville I would move promptly to Murfreesborough, for the purpose of attacking and clearing up any enemy that might be there. On arriving at Shelbyville I learned that the enemy had retreated to McMinnville after the capture of the force at Murfreesborough.

Question. Do you know anything of a simultaneous movement of another force from the vicinity of Athens toward Nashville with reference to the same movement of the enemy upon Murfreesborough and Nashville?

When General Buell gave me my instructions to go to Shelbyville he told me he had ordered General Nelson to proceed by rail with a force from Athens by way of Nashville to Murfreesborough. That General Nelson did go I was assured by the fact of frequent correspondence and communication with him while I was at Shelbyville and Decherd.

Question. Did the movements of the enemy seem to make these dispositions necessary at that time?

Yes, sir; I think they did. Some such arrangements were necessary to keep open our communications.

Question. Did it appear to you during the months of July and a part of August, before the concentration of the army commenced, that the troops were idle or that they were uselessly employed?

No, sir; it did not occur to me that they were idle or uselessly employed. I speak from the information I received at that time of the service they were performing. I know that many marches were made, and that the troops were generally, as far as my information extended, actively employed.

Question. Will you state, if you please, if you know anything of the condition of the railroads and of the difficulties of transporting supplies from Nashville into North Alabama during the months of July and August?

My opinion and observation combined led me to the conclusion that the two lines of communication by rail by which the troops in Middle Tennessee and Northern Alabama was supplied with provisions had been badly injured and torn up by the rebels in their retreat out of Middle Tennessee in the spring of 1862; that it required much labor to put these roads in working order again, and furthermore it required great vigilance and attention to keep them so.

EVENING SESSION.

General WOOD's examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. State, if you please, what you think is likely to be the justice of criticisms upon the details of complicate military operations after the facts have all developed themselves, and the many circumstances whether real or supposed, which necessarily influence the judgment and acts of the commander are not at all in view.

My opinion is that such criticisms are in a large majority of cases unjust and erroneous.

Question. Did you ever hear that it was my purpose to abandon Nashville in following the rebel army into Kentucky, and have you any reason to believe that the very reverse was my determination and nobody else's?

The day that I arrived in Nashville and prior to meeting General Buell, as I described in a former answer, I heard a report or rumor, from what source I do not now remember, that General Buell had entertained some thoughts of abandoning Nashville. The report went further, to say that there had been some heated conversation and disagreement between General Buell and Governor Johnson on this point. This was during the morning of the 6th of September, 1862. I met General Buell, by his order, to report to him, about 1 p. m. of that day. I had a good deal of conversation with General Buell, at his request, in regard to the campaign probably ahead of us and in regard to what might possibly be the movements and design of the enemy, his supposed position from the best information at that time that we could gain of it, and of what means should be adopted on our part to meet the movements of the enemy. As I have said, the conversation was had at the request of General Buell, who spread out his maps for my examination. During the whole conversation, in which General Buell, with more than usual freedom and communicativeness with me, discussed his plans, there was not the slightest intimation of his intention to abandon Nashville, but, on the contrary, a statement of his intention to retain Nashville if possible. On the following day I had another conversation with General Thomas and General Buell at General Buell's headquarters, when the subject of the maintenance and defense of Nashville was discussed. I was present when General Buell informed General Thomas that he would leave him (General Thomas) in command at Nashville, and heard him give General Thomas various suggestions as to the defenses, &c. There was no intimation at that time of an intention to abandon Nashville, but every evidence given to induce me to believe that it was General Buell's fixed determination to hold it. I heard General Buell tell General Thomas what forces would be at his command to help him to defend Nashville, and that in his opinion this force would be sufficient to hold it against double the number; and it was further my understanding of the conversation in which I participated, as I have said, that General Buell considered that he was making sufficient provision for the defense of Nashville. I recollect an instance of that conversation, that General Thomas, after being satisfied that he was to remain at Nashville, said that he desired his own division to stay with him, and General Buell told him he could have it. So far as I know this opinion and intention of General Buell was not influenced by any other person.

Question. Do you remember how or from whom you heard this report of a disagreement between Governor Johnson and myself on this question?

I do not remember how or from whom I heard it. It came in so uncertain and vague a form that I attached no importance to it, and considered it one of the thousand idle rumors that float through camps and cannot be traced to any responsible source.

Question. Was it the opinion in the army on the evening or night of the 8th of October that the engagement of that day had resulted in the defeat of the rebel army, or merely the repulse of an attack made upon a part of the Army of the Ohio?

I cannot state what was the opinion of the army, as I had very little intercourse on the night of the 8th with any person that pretended to be informed as to the events that transpired that afternoon, but so far as I heard an expression of opinion there was no belief entertained that there had been a defeat of the rebel army, and an impression seemed to prevail, so far as I had any means of arriving at a knowledge of it, that there would be fighting on the following day.

Question. Was it the expectation that there would be a battle between the two armies?

The impression prevailed among all persons with whom I had any conversation on the night of the 8th that there would be a battle on the following day.

Question. Do you know whether orders were given for attacking the enemy the next evening [morning]?

I cannot say that I know that orders were given, but I received an order myself to be prepared to advance to attack at daylight in the morning; this order was communicated to me from General Crittenden, who commanded the corps that I was attached to, with an intimation that a subsequent order would be given for the movement. This statement is made to show that I did not get my orders from the general commanding the army, and hence do not know what orders he issued himself. I did, however, receive a message by one of my aids from General Buell to be prepared for work on the following day, from which I understood that we would have a battle and severe fighting the following day, and I made all my preparations accordingly.

Commission adjourned to meet December 17, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, Wednesday, December 17, 1862.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General Wood's examination continued.

Question. Do you know that Bragg's army depended for supplies upon the country through which it passed?

I cannot say that I know it of my own knowledge. I always understood that a considerable part of the supplies used by Bragg's army was drawn from the country through which it passed. I also understood that a great many supplies were collected at Chattanooga, and these we heard were taken along with him. It was understood that a considerable part of his dependence was upon the country through which he passed. I cannot say that I have any positive knowledge of this, as I was not exactly with Bragg's army nor behind until after he got into Kentucky some distance.

Question. What, in view of his dependence for supplies, would have been the consequence of a check to Bragg's army?

In my opinion it would have depended to a considerable extent upon the check he might have received. It would perhaps have compelled him to hazard everything on the cost of a battle, with a view of getting us out of his way entirely. On the other hand, it might have compelled him to change his line of operations very much farther to the eastward, which of course would have delayed his movements to a considerable extent, or possibly it might have compelled him to give up his intention of invading Kentucky and to abandon the enterprise. This of course would depend in a great measure upon his ability to get supplies independent of the country through which he passed by carrying them with him.

Question. Had General Buell made a stand in the mountains, which army would have had the advantage in the matter of supplies, one drawing from McMinnville and Nashville and the other from Chattanooga?

Of course my answer will be entirely a matter of opinion, and as I have already said in former answers that I had no personal knowledge of the nature of the roads on the southeastern slope of the mountains across the Sequatchie Valley and over Walden's Ridge, I cannot give a very positive opinion; nevertheless, I should think that with the aid of railroad facilities (although we were much annoyed and threatened) and with the understanding that our army is better equipped in the matter of transportation than the rebel army, we would have had the advantage in drawing supplies.

Question. Had General Buell selected a point in the mountain to oppose Bragg after Bragg was crossing at Chattanooga which party would have been acting on the defensive?

In the case supposed our army, I presume, would have been on the defensive, as we should have taken that position to resist the advance of General Bragg, and it was my understanding when the matter of concentration of the troops at Altamont was being considered that it was with a view to resist such an advance across the mountains.

Question. Had a stand been made by General Buell at any point on the plains to meet Bragg as he descended from the Cumberland Mountains, would he (General Buell) have had supplies to carry out his purpose?

It is difficult for me to give an opinion on this subject, as I am not well informed as to the question of provisions at General Buell's command at that time. It would be a matter of inference to some extent. From the quantity of provisions which I think was issued to the divisions of the Army of the Ohio on their arrival at Nashville I should think that by putting the troops on half rations there would probably have been enough for the purpose indicated. My recollection is that we drew six days' rations. My division did when it arrived in Nashville. We had frequently used half rations and made them do at the time.

Question. Did you not and was it not known at the time that Bragg was co-operating with Kirby Smith?

I cannot say that I knew it or that of my knowledge it was known. I know that it was discussed as a possible or probable intention of General Bragg that it might be within the range of his operations. We did not feel perfectly satisfied that his immediate intention was to co-operate with Kirby Smith at all until after his movements indicated that his object was first Kentucky and not Nashville. Then, of course, it became evident beyond doubt that his first operation was with the rebel forces in Kentucky. It was frequently suggested during the earlier operations that co-operation with rebel forces in Kentucky might be the immediate object of General Bragg. Nashville was equally discussed with other places as being the first point of attack of Bragg's army, which in regard to certainty left the matter very much in doubt with that part of the army with which I had immediate connection at that time. The troops were very much scattered. Among other reasons suggested among the troops I served with was that General Bragg's army was destined immediately for Kentucky, because there was a great deal of political discontent in Kentucky, and it was to give a chance for this feeling to show itself in a rising.

Question. Was not an attack upon Nashville a co-operation, in fact, with Kirby Smith?

Whether in strict military parlance it would be considered a co-operation with Kirby Smith would be a matter of opinion among military men; but I should undoubtedly consider it a powerful auxiliary to General Smith's movements in Kentucky.

Question. What would have become of Kirby Smith and his army had General Buell been left free to co-operate with General Wright in attacking it?

I do not think there would have been much of it left.

Question. State at what time you became acquainted with Bragg's crossing the Tennessee and what you did with the information.

On the 22d of August, 1862, I sent a regiment of infantry from my camp, which was then at a little place called Vervilla, about 9 miles from McMinnville, to Altamont. I had learned previously that there were a few reliable loyal men in the neighborhood of Altamont from whom information might probably be obtained as to the movements, designs, and position of the enemy at Chattanooga. I instructed one of the officers of the regiment to put himself in communication with those persons. I had heard that there was frequent communication with the rebels themselves between Altamont and Chattanooga. This officer to whom I had committed the obtaining of information reported to me on his return, on the 23d, that he had heard from the loyal men in question that it had been reported about Altamont, through rebel couriers and other persons coming from the direction of Chattanooga, that the army of General

Bragg had commenced crossing the Tennessee River as early as the 16th of August—that is my recollection; that by the 20th there were four divisions across. He furthermore reported that it seemed to be the understanding among the citizens around Altamont that General Bragg's army, or a part of it, would cross the mountains, passing through that place.

Having no telegraphic communication myself immediately with General Buell, and General Thomas being in immediate command of all the troops in that region of country, I, on the afternoon of the same day, 23d of August, sent him a distinct report of this information, and my recollection is that he requested me to send it immediately to General Buell—he was at the time in telegraphic communication with General Buell—from the telegraphic station at McMinnville.

General BUELL. This testimony is unnecessary. I admit that I had information of General Bragg's crossing the river earlier than that given by General Wood.

Question. If at the time of General Buell's receiving this information of crossing he had concentrated his forces at Murfreesborough for the purpose of operating against Bragg what probably would have been the result?

It is difficult to say what might have been the result. I can suggest what in my judgment might have been the influence of such concentration, more particularly if that concentration had been followed up by other movements. I think it very likely that a concentration of the troops immediately at Murfreesborough would have had for the first result, if General Bragg had persisted in his designs of invading Kentucky, to throw his line of march much farther to the eastward than it was; perhaps, turning off at Pikeville, he would have been compelled, in order to avoid the movement upon his flank by the army concentrated at Murfreesborough, to avoid Sparta, to go much farther toward the east than the line of march he pursued. This would have thrown him more into the mountains of Tennessee and perhaps Kentucky, or he would then have been compelled to turn westward, making a considerable detour. If, on the other hand, he had continued his line of march through Sparta and toward the point at which he crossed the Cumberland River, in my opinion the early concentration of the Army of the Ohio at Murfreesborough would have put us in a condition to have moved eastward and brought the enemy to battle somewhere in that region of country.

Question. What effect would this change of line to the mountains have had upon General Bragg as to supplies?

I think it would have diminished his facilities and means of obtaining supplies.

Question. Was this your opinion in reference to the concentration at Murfreesborough at the time of the invasion, or is not your opinion now helped by facts that have come to your knowledge?

I am sure I entertained the opinion at the time I gained that information that our troops ought to be concentrated and so expressed that opinion to others. Of course that opinion has been strengthened by subsequent events. I rather think in the dispatch I described as having been written by myself to General Thomas I suggested that there should be an immediate concentration of our troops. I did not of course mean to designate any particular point, for I had not the necessary knowledge of other parts of the army, even had I sufficient rank to warrant giving advice on that point.

Question. That not having been done, and it was yet a matter of doubt whether Bragg had designs upon Nashville or crossing the Cumberland, that would have been the effect of a concentration of the forces at Lebanon?

The general effect would have been the same as that produced by the concentration at Murfreesborough. I think it would have made the crossing of the Cumberland by the enemy much more dangerous and hazardous to them, and, as a consequence of that, compelled them to make their crossing higher up the Cumberland. My understanding of the country farther eastward is that it is more broken, and would have lessened the facilities for the enemy's getting supplies and otherwise have trammelled his movements; but as to the extent of this I cannot of course give a positive opinion.

Question. Is the lack of supplies complained of on our part a sufficient reason for the failure to do anything of this sort?

I do not know to what extent it is charged that there was a want of supplies. I have said that on arriving at Nashville my division drew six days' subsistence; if the other divisions of the army obtained a like amount of subsistence on arriving at Nashville by putting the troops on half rations, as I have said they were frequently, in my judgment there would have been supplies enough to have attempted the concentration of the troops at Lebanon.

Question. I understand you to say that while at Nashville it came to your knowledge that the enemy was crossing the Cumberland and that you urged General Buell to advance up the Cumberland and dispute their passage?

No, sir; I did not say that. I have previously described at some length how I obtained the first certain information that the enemy had crossed the Cumberland River and of his movement in Kentucky. I have also in a previous answer said that while in General Buell's quarters at Nashville I heard a report made to him, as coming through some person who had information from above, that a part of the enemy's force had crossed the Cumberland River. I am free to say that, not understanding the report very distinctly, I could not of course attach any great importance to it, but that in view of all the circumstances and, as indicated in a former answer, beginning to be strongly impressed myself at that time with the opinion that the object of the enemy was an invasion of Kentucky, I did not take the liberty of suggesting to General Buell that it would be a safe, indeed the best, operation to put the bulk of his army on the north side of the Cumberland River. This arrangement would have put the Army of the Ohio in a position to operate against the enemy in his invasion of Kentucky, or, if we should be deceived as to that, we should still be in a position to protect Nashville against a decided movement by the rebel army under Bragg. I recollect I said to General Buell on that occasion, although I had made a considerable march that day, that if he deemed it desirable that the passage of the river should be commenced at once my division could go on. This conversation was on Saturday, September 6.

General DANA. I think it is the duty of the court to object to such questions. I make an objection to the question, inasmuch as there is danger in asking a witness a question such as that, wherein the question states him to have given testimony which does not appear on the record; and in future I shall object to questions being put in that way. The question started out with the assertion that the witness has given testimony which he has not given, nor is there anything like it on the record. The witness might be misled by such questions.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. General Dana is correct in his objection; but I was under the impression that such evidence had been given.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. General, the two armies left the Cumberland and marched as far as Bowling Green and Glasgow nearly parallel. Did you understand at the time what the object of that march was on the part of our army?

General BUELL. I object to the question, inasmuch as it assumes as truth what is not true—that the armies were marching on parallel lines; whereas the fact is that they started from points from 40 to 60 miles distant and converged upon a point not more than 50 miles from the point of departure of one of them. In making the objection I do not consider that there is any question of law involved in it at all, and under ordinary circumstances I should not have thought of making an objection; but it has been the popular criticism upon the military operations under my direction that Bragg's army and my army have moved side by side of each other without an attempt on my part to molest him, whereas in fact they were moving from 60 miles to a less distance as they approached each other, with a country almost impracticable between them.

Question. Please state, general, while your army was moving from Nashville to Bowling Green at about the same time that Bragg's army was moving from the Cumberland to Glasgow whether you understood the object of our march at that time.

It is with me a matter of inference what might have been the intention of the commanding general of the Army of the Ohio in that movement. My own impression of the movement itself was that it was to bring about a concentration of the troops at Bowling Green for the defense and fortification of that place against any efforts of the enemy to capture its garrison and its supplies, and, the army being concentrated, subsequently to take such movements as circumstances and events might indicate as proper.

Question. As we did not attack the enemy at Glasgow, did not Munfordville become as important a point to us as Bowling Green?

General BUELL. I object to that question, inasmuch as it assumes that there was a neglect to attack the enemy at Glasgow, whereas the evidence shows that he could not have been attacked there.

The court is cleared for secret session.

The WITNESS. It is somewhat difficult to weigh with accuracy the relative importance of Munfordville and Bowling Green to us. I can say generally that I consider both places very important; in some respects the elements influencing the question of importance were about identical; and of course it was much to be desired that the enemy should not get possession of Munfordville.

Question. Are not the rules of prudence, caution, and so forth, as applicable to an enemy invading a country and moving in the same direction as the opposing force of superior numbers; and was not the success of the inferior invading army to be attributed to the wholesale disregard of those rules?

My answer to the first part of the question is, certainly, that all the rules of caution, prudence, watchfulness, &c., are equally applicable to the invading force as to its antagonist. But how far in this particular case the success of the enemy might have been due to the disregard of these rules I am not prepared to give an opinion. Of course a certain degree of audacity combined with a prudent degree of caution will generally lead to favorable results.

Question. Did General Buell give any reason for defending Nashville at the time he left General Thomas in command?

My recollection is that General Buell remarked in the course of his conversation to which I have previously referred that by abandoning Nashville we should almost entirely, if not completely, relinquish our hold on Tennessee; that in case Nashville should be strongly occupied by the enemy and we should be successful in driving the rebels out of Kentucky, it might and would probably cost us a great deal to retake Nashville, more particularly if the river should not rise at an early day, and especially if the enemy fortify the river in a way to oppose our ascent in case it did rise. And he furthermore expressed the opinion that the abandonment of Nashville would not only have a bad influence on our cause, more particularly in Tennessee, but throughout the country generally.

Question. Do you remember what gave rise to those remarks on the part of General Buell?

I do not now remember distinctly how that particular branch of the subject was introduced, but my best recollection is that the subject came under discussion in considering the difficulties of keeping Nashville supplied with provisions in case we should have a long campaign in Kentucky, and also in regard to leaving a sufficient garrison in Nashville for maintaining it with any reasonable degree of security. This latter consideration came up in connection with some conversation as to the probability of an advance from Northern Mississippi of a force under Price, Van Dorn, and Breckinridge, and other rebel leaders, it being reported in the newspapers and otherwise circulated at that time that such an invasion would be made.

Question. Was this conversation subsequent to the report that General Buell and Governor Johnson had words upon the subject?

It was subsequent to the time that I heard the rumor of such a conversation between General Buell and Governor Johnson. I heard this report when I first reached Nashville, on the 6th of September, which was about the middle of the day or before. I did not meet General Buell till about 1 o'clock that day or a little later.

Question. Do you know, general, the number of the army that marched out of Louisville under command of General Buell to attack Bragg at Bardstown?

No, sir; I do not know accurately the strength of that army. I made some estimate in regard to the strength of it myself, based upon information that I did possess.

Question. State what that estimate was.

I usually considered it, in round numbers, to be somewhere in the neighborhood of 80,000 men, artillery, cavalry, and infantry, all combined. My estimate was made by taking the strength of my own and other divisions I had some knowledge of and by averaging the whole number of divisions as nearly as I could consider their number. It might have fallen a little below or a little above. The approximation could not necessarily have been a very accurate one.

NASHVILLE, Wednesday Afternoon, December 17, 1862.

By General DANA:

Question. Had General Buell taken a defensive position in the mountains beyond Altamont, with the purpose of resisting Bragg's advance into the plains of Tennessee, was it or was it not possible for him then and there to have subsisted his army; and, if so, for how long a time?

I think this would have been a possible operation, upon the hypothesis, of course, that the troops in the rear charged with guarding the railway and line of communication had done their duty properly, and kept open our communication with the source of supply; but I do not think it would have been possible for a greater period than a few days, for the reason that the mountainous country itself affords very little that is useful in supplying an army and all the supplies for men and animals would have to be drawn entirely from our rear. Of course the transportation of forage for a considerable distance, which would have been a necessary result of this arrangement of troops, would in a short time have become a work of great magnitude and extent, and to this would have to be added the transportation of supplies from the line of railroad into the mountains.

Question. Was or was not the disposable force at General Buell's command at that time sufficient to enable him to place a sufficient force to defend his position in the mountains and at the same time place a sufficient force on his line of communication to guard them against any probable contingency?

The answer must be somewhat a matter of opinion, as I do not know the actual numerical strength of the force at General Buell's command at that time, but my opinion is that he had a sufficient force at his command to meet the case put in the question.

Question. At the time you subsisted your troops in Lower Tennessee on half rations what proportion of the other half rations was procured by them in the country to help out the short supply?

I can answer generally a very considerable portion; and without going into an estimate of the quantity, which would perhaps be very inaccurate, I can say generally that the troops of my command lived very well when they were on half rations. Certainly there was no suffering.

Question. What kind of supplies were gathered by the troops at these times to help out their short rations?

By my own particular command, which I can take, as a test of others, some flour was found in the country. I caused corn to be ground into meal to be issued to the troops, collected beef cattle from the country, and at that period we were generally able to get a pretty good supply of fresh vegetables.

Question. Supposing none of these supplies could have been obtained, how long could the army have subsisted on half rations brought from the rear and have continued effective?

I should think, sir, for a long time. I do not think a soldier would become wholly ineffective for the want of provisions so long as he was supplied with half rations.

Question. At the time the rebel army was marching up the Sequatchie Valley were these supplies such as you have stated above procurable beyond Altamont or in that vicinity, supposing General Buell had taken up the defensive position alluded to?

I have already described that region of country as a very poor one. I do not think that that region of country would have afforded the supplies we drew from the more fertile and cultivated plains of Middle Tennessee.

Question. Was there between Altamont and the Sequatchie Valley any position where an army could post itself and at the same time be supplied with water?

I do not know, sir; I never was farther in the direction than Altamont; but I can answer generally, from my own observation and the information I received from others, that that whole district was at that time very badly watered.

Question. How many years have you devoted to the study of the military profession and what campaigns and tours of active service have you been engaged in?

It is now more than twenty-one years since I first went to West Point, and my studies and reading since that time have been chiefly directed to the military profession. I joined the Army of Occupation, as it was called, commanded by General Taylor, at Corpus Christi, in the month of September, 1845. I continued to serve with that army, and participated in all its chief operations, movements, and battles, up to the time that General Taylor relinquished the command of it, in the month of November, 1847. I was then relieved from duty in that army and ordered to the city of Mexico. I joined the army in the city of Mexico as soon as I could, and remained with that army till it evacuated Mexico and returned to the United States, in July, 1848. I was then ordered to Texas, and remained on duty in that department till the summer of 1854.

During the time I was in Texas I performed a good deal of staff duty and was engaged in various Indian campaigns and enterprises. In the spring of 1855 I was appointed a captain of cavalry in one of the regiments, and from early in the autumn of 1855, after my regiment was organized and when it took the field, I was almost constantly on duty with it, engaged in various expeditions on the Western plains, till the month of September, 1859. I then left my regiment and took advantage of a leave of absence to travel in Europe. I returned from Europe in April, 1861, and was ordered to Indiana to muster volunteers into service; remained there till October, when I was appointed brigadier-general, and ordered to join the troops in Kentucky. I have since that time been almost continuously on duty with what was lately termed the Army of the Ohio, and is now called the Fourteenth Army Corps and sometimes the Army of the Cumberland.

When I first took the field in Kentucky I commanded a brigade for a short time. After performing some other duties, such as commanding a camp of instruction and organization at Bardstown and performing some other work in the way of road-making in the mountains of Eastern Kentucky, the division which I now command was organized in the month of February, 1862, and I have remained in command of it ever since. This division has participated in all the material operations, movements, and campaigns of the late Army of the Ohio.

Question. Supposing yourself in the position of General Buell while commanding the Army of the Ohio at the time he received information of the crossing of the Tennessee River by the rebel forces and being possessed of such information as he was then probably possessed of, what would probably have been your plans and dispositions in order to have performed your duties so as in the best possible manner to have subserved the interests of your Government and to have inflicted the most damage on the enemy, while at the same time guarding to the best of your ability the interests of the States of Tennessee and Kentucky; that is, supposing those States loyal?

Had I been in command of the Army of the Ohio at the time I received satisfactory information that the rebel forces were crossing the Tennessee River at and in the vicinity of Chattanooga, being satisfied from my knowledge of the mountainous country that in all probability the enemy would never attempt to lead a strong force through the mountains into the plains of Middle Tennessee, I should have made my arrangements for concentrating the troops at an early day at the most eligible point in Middle Tennessee. I should of course have had the mountain passes well watched and observed by means of cavalry through the agency of spies. I think it important to remark in this discussion on the utter improbability of the enemy's leading a strong force through the mountains. This is simply my opinion, but I was well satisfied the first time I ever made an examination of that country that it would never be done and so stated it to General Thomas, and it was in consequence of this opinion, which he entertained as well as myself, that the two divisions I have spoken of as starting from McMinnville to go to Altamont were withdrawn, that is, by direction of General Thomas. By concentrating the troops in Middle Tennessee, even if the opinion that the enemy would not invade the country through the mountains was not correct, we should still have been in position to fall upon him as soon as he came out of the mountains, and at the same time be prepared to meet any movement up the Sequatchie Valley around the spur of the mountains into Middle Tennessee or to guard against the movement northward along that line into Kentucky. The fact that the enemy would have got possession of the country between the foot of the mountains and Murfreesborough which might have been selected as the point of concentration I do not consider a matter of material importance. Had we beaten his army, of course the country would soon again have fallen into our possession.

On the other hand, he could not have dared to pass us with a view of attacking Nashville, and would have been compelled, of course supposing Nashville to have been his chief object, to have beaten the concentrated Army of the Ohio in position first. By concentration at Murfreesborough or some such point we should more effectually have protected our communications to the rear than was possible by concentrating in the mountains. We should have greatly lessened the difficulties of obtaining the supplies that were drawn outside the limits of Tennessee, as well as increased our facilities for obtaining those which we did get in Tennessee. By this arrangement the commander would better have had his forces in hand and been prepared to meet any exigency that the events of the campaign might develop. As I have already described in various answers the number of roads by which it was absolutely practicable, though highly improbable, that the enemy could move across the mountains, consequently the simple occupation of any single position by our troops would not have effectually prevented such a passage; hence the necessity of early concentration at Murfreesborough or some other point in Middle Tennessee.

Question. Continuing now the hypothesis in the preceding question, and supposing your forces concentrated, as you have stated, at or near Murfreesborough, and supposing that you have received reliable information that the enemy has passed to the north of Sparta, please to consider that you have the information which General Buell was probably possessed of from day to day. After that please continue your plan of campaign up as far as Munfordville, supposing the enemy to have pursued the line of march which he actually did pursue.

In the first place I will remark, in regard to the operations of the army after being concentrated at Murfreesborough, that by an early concentration of the army at Murfreesborough, with proper preparations,—it is problematical of course,—but I entertain the opinion that if this had been done early enough the rebel army under Bragg might have been prevented passing much farther north than Sparta. But under the supposition that he had evaded the army concentrated at Murfreesborough and got so far advanced that he could not be stopped before getting across the Cumberland River, which the question seems to indicate, I should have crossed my army over the Cumberland River at Nashville as being the most eligible point, and have tried, by a rapid movement of it along the line of turnpike from Nashville to Gallatin, Scottsville, Glasgow, and into Kentucky, to have brought the enemy to battle if he persisted in marching on that road or compelled him to abandon that line of march and conduct his operations farther to the east.

Supposing the enemy to have been brought to battle and a victory to have been attained, of course it would have protected Bowling Green, Nashville, Munfordville, Louisville, &c. But if he had avoided battle and had moved farther to the eastward, Bowling Green and Munfordville would both have been effectually protected.

Question. After it was known at Nashville that the enemy had crossed the Cumberland River was it possible to conduct the Army of the Ohio to Glasgow by the route you have stated in force before the arrival of the enemy there?

It is impossible for me to answer that question, because I do not know when it was known at Nashville that the enemy had crossed the river.

Question. Please answer the question under the supposition that it was known at Nashville the following day after the enemy crossed the river, supposing the Army of the Ohio to be concentrated at Nashville.

No, sir; under the supposition given I do not think the Army of the Ohio could have concentrated at Glasgow before the enemy concentrated his troops there. The supposition is, as I understand it, that the Army of the Ohio is concentrated at Nashville. The other hypothesis is that the information of the crossing of the enemy is not received at Nashville till one day after the passage had been effected. According to my information the bulk of the enemy's forces crossed the Cumberland River at Gainesborough. The distance from Gainesborough to Glasgow is about 50 miles; the distance from Nashville to Glasgow is about 85 miles. Of course from this data every one can make up his own opinion.

Question. Suppose the rebel army to have crossed the Cumberland River in its march to the North and the commander of the Army of the Ohio not to have been able to learn the exact whereabouts of the main force of the enemy on any particular day prior to his arrival at Glasgow, would it have been prudent, taking into view the danger of a flank attack and the number of roads by which such an attack might be made, to have pursued his course from Gallatin to Glasgow?

Under the hypothesis of ignorance of the enemy's position and the other considerations suggested in it, the danger of a flank attack, &c., and the hypothesis of there being a number of roads favoring such an operation, it would not have been considered among military men, in my judgment, a prudent movement. I think it would have been a bold and audacious one. I think, however, that with proper observation in regard to the movements of the enemy the very audacity might have made it successful, of course supposing it to have been carried out very rapidly and vigorously. It would not, very clearly, been a prudent one.

By General TYLER:

Question. For what length of time was your division engaged in the repairing of railroads after you left Corinth?

For one month, namely, the month of June, 1862, repairing the Charleston and Memphis road from Corinth to Decatur. Subsequently, that is in the month of August, 1862, it was engaged for about a week in opening and repairing the railroad leading from Tullahoma to McMinnville.

Question. Were other divisions of the army engaged in repairing these roads and to what extent?

So far as I have any information only one other division of the Army of the Ohio did any work in repairing railroads. This division was commanded by the late General Nelson, whose division relieved mine in the vicinity of Iuka and finished the bridge over Bear Creek, which had been about completed by my division, and also the bridge over Buzzard's Creek, in the same neighborhood. It was common notoriety, and I believe true, that other troops belonging to the Army of the Ohio were engaged during the summer in opening railroads in Middle Tennessee.

Question. To what extent and for what military purposes were these railroads used afterward?

I think the part of the Memphis and Charleston road I have described as being repaired by my division was used to a very small extent in transporting provisions and troops. I do not think it ever amounted to a great deal; very few troops and few provisions were ever carried over that part of it. The roads of Middle Tennessee were used during the summer and early part of autumn in transporting supplies of every kind for the use of the Army of the Ohio and for transporting troops. I mean the roads of Middle Tennessee; the road leading from Nashville by the way of Columbia, Pulaski, and Athens to Huntsville; also the road leading from Nashville by way of Murfreesborough and Decherd to Stevenson. There is a branch from this road commencing at Tullahoma and leading to McMinnville.

Question. Did the repairing of the Memphis and Charleston road delay the movement of General Buell's troops to Stevenson or facilitate it?

I think, sir, it delayed it.

Question. What time did you arrive at Stevenson?

I never was there.

Question. What time did the troops arrive there and how near is that to Chattanooga?

I do not certainly know when Stevenson was first occupied by our troops. There were troops there, I am quite sure, about the end of June or the beginning of July. In round numbers I think Stevenson to be about 35 or 40 miles from Chattanooga.

Question. How long a time, general, would the moving of the Army of the Ohio from Corinth to Stevenson require, ignoring the road entirely, or in what time would you probably have reached there with the transportation you had when in use of the road?

I suppose it might have been done in from twenty to twenty-five days. I give a margin for difficulties and troubles. The Charleston and Memphis road was of no advantage in the movements and operations of the Army of the Ohio. The route I should have taken in moving from Corinth would be across the Tennessee River at or near the mouth of Bear Creek; I should then have moved eastward in the direction of Athens and Huntsville to Stevenson. That this is certainly the most direct route my recollection is, without being positively certain.

Question. Was General Buell's army ever within striking distance of Bragg before the rebel army crossed the Tennessee River?

I do not think the Army of the Ohio was ever concentrated in a position previous to the passage of Bragg's army across the Tennessee River to strike it.

Question. Do you think it was practicable to have concentrated the army at some point to have struck the rebel army at Chattanooga before it crossed the river?

In the early part of the month of July, when I got as far as Decatur and Huntsville, I considered it certainly within the range of the capability and power of the Army of the Ohio to have taken Chattanooga; moreover, I supposed the object of our movement in that direction was for that purpose. This was simply a deduction of my own from our movements. I did not obtain information from any one competent to give me exact information. It might have been possible at a later date, but from my own particular employment later in the summer I had not an opportunity of giving such attention to the subject as I previously had.

Question. Supposing within a week or ten days after the evacuation of Corinth by the enemy the Army of the Ohio had as rapidly as possible, considering the necessity of supplies and the transportation furnished that army, pushed on to Chattanooga by the route you have specified, what in your opinion would have been the result?

I think we could have taken Chattanooga.

Question. Have you ever been higher up the Tennessee River than Chattanooga?

I have never been quite so high as Chattanooga. Stevenson is the highest point to which I have been.

Question. From the information you obtained last summer, if Chattanooga could have been taken do you suppose it would have been practicable for the army to have continued on to Knoxville?

I do not think it would have been a practicable movement without a very considerable addition to the force of the Army of the Ohio. This will become apparent from the greatly increased line of communication we would have had to keep open and of course the greater exposure of our lines of communication to be cut. At the same time the occupation of Chattanooga itself would have been very much of a protection to operations in East Tennessee.

Question. Did Bragg's army after it passed the Tennessee River receive any reinforcements from Kirby Smith?

My information led me to the conclusion then, and I now entertain the same conviction, that General Bragg did not receive any material re-enforcements to the army he led across the Tennessee River and into Kentucky by the way of Tompkinsville till he formed a junction in Central Kentucky with Marshall's, Smith's, and Stevenson's forces.

Question. I have alluded to your testimony that you stated Bragg's army was at Glasgow on Monday, 15th.

I stated in answer to the question that the advance of Bragg's army left or commenced to leave.

Question. What proportion of General Buell's army was engaged with the enemy at the battle of Perryville?

It is difficult to say what proportion was engaged. I know about the force that was upon the ground and I have some knowledge of how that force was employed. Two divisions of General McCook's corps, as it was called, were most actively engaged in the battle of Chaplin Hills, and, according to my understanding, did the principal part of the fighting. As I have always understood, one brigade from General Gilbert's corps was detached to re-enforce General McCook. A considerable part of General Gilbert's corps were engaged in one way and another in the battle, but I do not think any serious work was done by it. Certainly it could not be said it was hotly engaged, and its casualties, as compared with the whole number of the division, would indicate this opinion to be correct. I am quite sure that only one brigade of Crittenden's corps, as it was called, fired a shot, and that was a brigade of my own division.

Question. Did you know or hear of any movement made by General Buell's army on the night of the battle or the next morning or during the next day to renew the battle or to find the enemy?

I cannot say I knew or heard of any movement taking place either that night, next morning, or the next day that could properly be called an effort to renew the battle on the part of the Army of the Ohio. Some movements were ordered in the corps to which my division was attached for an advance toward Perryville during the morning of the 9th, but such advance did not take place until after it was known that the enemy had evacuated the position in and around Perryville, and in fact till I had been in the suburbs of the place myself. But in all this I wish to be understood as speaking of what I saw and heard, and could not of course pretend to give evidence of the movements of the whole body of troops assembled in the vicinity of Perryville.

By General DANA:

Question. State as nearly as you can the disposal General Buell had made of his army about the time Bragg crossed the Tennessee to invade Kentucky. What point of occupation marked his left and what his right and how long prior to the movement of Bragg had his army held such a position?

The principal part of the troops of the Army of the Ohio were disposed, according to my recollection, at the time suggested in the question, from Nashville along the line of railway which leads from Nashville to Columbia and south as far as Athens, from Athens eastward by way of Huntsville and Stevenson to Battle Creek. The troops of this army were also stationed along the line of railway leading from Nashville to Stevenson; also along the road leading from Tullahoma to McMinnville, and some of them in the mountains and along the foot of the mountains from Decherd eastward as far as McMinnville. I think also about this time an expedition was made from the troops stationed at Battle Creek some distance up the Sequatchie Valley, but how far I never was informed. The troops at McMinnville would be considered the farthest east, and those at Athens, Northern Alabama, farthest west.

Question. By whose order did General Buell march from Corinth toward Chattanooga, what was the object of the movement, and do you know whether the operation was left to his own discretion or prescribed by the order?

I do not know that I was ever informed by any official functionary, but my understanding was that the movements were made in obedience to an order from General Halleck; but I never understood what was the specific object set forth in the order directing the movement, nor have I any knowledge as to whether discretion was allowed to General Buell in the execution of the order.

Commission adjourned to meet December 18, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, Thursday Morning, December 18, 1862.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General T. J. Wood's examination continued.

Recross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Do you know any reason why the army could not have advanced on Chattanooga as soon as it arrived in North Alabama?

I have already explained that my division of the Army of the Ohio was engaged for nearly a month after it came into North Alabama in repairing the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. After the completion of this work, and when my division was encamped within one day's march of Huntsville and a considerable portion of the army encamped in the neighborhood of Athens and Huntsville there was a considerable want of supplies, as I understood. There was a serious break in the railroad from Nashville by the way of Columbia, &c., which had to be repaired before it could be depended upon for getting supplies. I cannot now remember whether the road from Nashville to Stevenson was in working order throughout all its parts or not at this time. This was about July 7, 1862.

On 13th July, 1862, according to my best recollection, the garrison at Murfreesborough was captured and the road in several places in that vicinity broken up and bridges destroyed; so I was informed and so believed. It was a matter of common notoriety from that time, or for a month or more, up to the time we began our march out of Tennessee. Various efforts were made by bodies of the enemy to destroy our communications on this road, and it required great watchfulness and care to prevent it. I think, if I am not mistaken, that there were occasional interruptions of communications on the road at the period referred to, but they were of no great duration, according to my present recollection. I can state that from the time the garrison at Murfreesborough was captured up to the time the army commenced to concentrate at Nashville my own division was never supplied with subsistence further ahead than from five to seven days, and it was during this period, while the communications were so very much interrupted, that I was compelled at Decherd to resort to the means described in a previous answer to subsist my division. Whether the causes I have described were the real reasons for not advancing on Chattanooga I cannot say, as I was not in command of the army and not in very close communication with the commander; but they would seem to constitute difficulties in the way, and may have been reasons why no advance was made in that direction.

Question. Of what importance is Chattanooga as a military position and as a strategic point?

It is somewhat difficult to say of what strategic importance Chattanooga alone is, but I should think that a military force occupying Chattanooga, and with sufficient strength to maintain itself there, and also with its military connections to keep its communications open to the rear, would be able to command what is called the East Tennessee Railroad and some of the rail communications farther south. The simple occupation, if per se, in a strategic point of view, and without the ability to command the country for a certain distance west and east and south and east, would probably not be of any great advantage; but as far as I have ever thought of the propriety of occupying Chattanooga, it would have been with the hope at least that the Government might have been able to put there a force that would have been able to extend its operations sufficiently far into East Tennessee, and, if not to occupy the country, to destroy the rail communications there.

Question. As a position in itself is it strong or weak?

I have never been at Chattanooga myself, and cannot give an opinion of its strength.

Question. Do or do not the railroads converging upon it from the east and south make it an exposed point for our troops?

I should say so, unquestionably.

Question. Would a force that might be sufficient to hold Chattanooga and cover its communications be sufficient to advance toward Cleveland, Dalton also, and especially to advance farther toward the south and east.

No, sir; I do not think it would.

Question. From your general knowledge of the force that the rebel Government could probably bring to bear upon Dalton or Cleveland, and supposing the communications of our army reasonably secure, what force do you think would be necessary to hold either of those points so as to cut the communications between Virginia and Georgia effectually by that route?

As I understand the matter, the occupation of Chattanooga, Cleveland, or Dalton, or any point in that region of country, would be with a view not only of preventing communication by what is called the East Tennessee Railroad in Virginia, but also to extend its operations far enough south and by the position it might occupy to cut off communication between the eastern part of the territory occupied by the rebel forces and the southwestern, or at least to impair those communications as much as possible. This would require such a force to extend its operations at least as far as Atlanta, Ga. Considering the importance of such communications to the rebels, and the isolated position which such a force would be in as regards its re-enforcements, I do not think it would be safe to occupy that region of country with any view to permanency with certainly less than 40,000 men, and probably 50,000 would be found necessary to accomplish effectually the purpose I have indicated above. This estimate of force would depend somewhat upon the vigilance and activity with which the commander handled his troops.

Question. Suppose the Army of the Ohio had marched to Chattanooga without meeting a man last summer, how long do you think it could have remained there with an enemy not more than 30,000 strong operating on its communications?

I should think only a few days; perhaps long enough to have broken up some important links in the railroad communications in the way of bridges, and then it would, in my opinion, with 30,000 men acting on its communications, have been compelled to fall back.

Question. Do you think in the long run such a result would have benefited the cause of the Government or have injured it?

I do not think it would have improved our cause in the long run. In considering myself the importance of occupying Chattanooga and that region of country I always did it with the expectation and understanding, and certainly that would be necessary in order that we should gain the full benefit of it, that we should be able to maintain that occupation; and with a view of making our forces, as far as I could exercise any influence with it, able to do that work, I constantly, during the past summer, in my correspondence with persons concerned in raising the military forces, insisted that our regiments should be filled up to the legal organization, they having fallen in the course of service much below it.

Question. Is there not, general, a good, level wagon road out of the Sequatchie Valley into North Alabama?

According to my best recollection there is such a road. I would not undertake to state positively how good a road it is, but I learned during my operations in Northern Alabama that there is a wagon road or route of the kind described. My knowledge of the road does not extend much farther than the east of Alabama.

Question. Is there not an old stage road crossing the mountains from Pelham and going on to Chattanooga called the Nashville and Chattanooga State road?

Yes, sir, I believe there is.

Question. Is there not a road from Jasper to Winchester by the way of Cowan or Decherd?

I was so informed while I was at Decherd during the summer. I never marched over the road.

Question. Did not our troops pass over these roads with their trains; at least two divisions of them?

I believe they did, sir; such is my understanding at least.

Question. What would have made you suppose that troops could not cross the mountains out of the Sequatchie Valley except by the way of Pikeville and Sparta?

I have not at any time, according to my recollection of my testimony, said that they could not have. I have habitually said that the roads through the mountains were practicable so far as I have any knowledge of them, but that they were not good, but on the contrary bad; and after learning something of these roads by personal observation and more of the other roads from information derived from others it was my opinion that they would not be used by the enemy.

Question. What makes the road from Pikeville to Sparta better than what is known as the Therman road? Is there anything in the character of the country, as you understand it, that would make it better?

According to my understanding of it there is. It is not so broken a country, and that part of the road in the mountains from Pikeville to Sparta is not so long as that in the mountains of what is known as the Anderson or Therman road. This opinion is derived from information which I picked up by inquiring in the country, and therefore may be an erroneous one.

Question. Is not the truth exactly the reverse in regard to the length of the mountain road? Is not the road from Pikeville to Sparta longer than the road from the Sequatchie Valley to McMinnville?

According to my understanding, supposing the enemy simply to wish to get over the mountains, the road from Chattanooga commonly called the Anderson or Therman road is shorter than the whole road by way of Pikeville to Sparta. But my understanding is that that part of the road by the Pikeville and Sparta route which lies in the mountains, and which is a great obstacle in either case, is shorter than the mountainous portion of the Anderson or Therman road. These are matters of opinion derived from information, and which may possibly be all wrong.

Question. Do you know of a good stage road from McMinnville to Altamont?

There are two or three roads leading from McMinnville to Altamont. I have traveled one such entirely between the two places, which is a practicable road for carriages and wagons except the ascent of the mountains, which is very difficult and bad. There is another advantage, I believe, in what is called the stage road from McMinnville to Altamont. I have traveled in part, namely, that part which is in the valley of Caney Fork, but I never ascended the mountain on that road or went as far as Altamont; consequently I can only give an opinion of that part of the road I passed over. I know nothing of the difficulties of the ascent of the mountain on that road.

On motion of General Tyler the court was cleared.

Question. You have spoken in your evidence of passing round the spur of the mountains by the way of Sparta.

According to my information the country north of Sparta and northeast for some distance is not so broken as that south and west of Sparta, and the mountains, as I believe from the information I gained in that part, "make off" into table-land in that direction.

Question. Are the ascent and descent the same?

Of course the elevated land would be crossed over, which makes both an ascent and a descent; but if the idea I have of the country from such information I was able to gain be correct, the ascent and descent would not be so difficult, and would probably give a better route for the passage of troops.

Question. Is it true, general, that the rules of prudence and caution are necessarily equally applicable to opposing armies or to the same army under different circumstances? On the contrary, is it not true that circumstances may force upon one general risks which the other would not be justified in assuming?

It is not true that the rules of prudence and caution are necessarily equally applicable to two armies always, and there may be reasons, such as the desperate nature of the enterprise the army is engaged in, why one such army might violate the ordinary rules of caution which in a general way are equally applicable to all military bodies, but which the antagonist of the first army might not be justified in disregarding.

Question. What was the strength of your division when you left Louisville on the march to Perryville?

My recollection now is, without being refreshed by reference to papers, that it was about 8,000; I think a shade over.

Question. What was it on the 8th of October, according to your returns?

I do not recollect what the returns would show for that particular day. I had left, by order of General Buell, one regiment at Bardstown, which of course would be subtracted from the strength I have given as marching from Louisville. That was all the loss of force by detail or order which my division suffered from the time it left Louisville to its arrival at Perryville; but there had been a great deal of straggling in the troops from Louisville to Perryville on account of the difficulties of the marches, the difficulty of obtaining water on the road, and other such causes, and it would be difficult to show accurately what diminution of strength any division might have suffered in that way. I do not remember what was about the strength of my division as shown by returns on or about the 8th of October, 1862, not having occasion to refer to that information since that time.

Question. Can you get that information by referring to your papers?

I am not sure that I can. I think it is doubtful. My division has marched a great deal since that time under circumstances calculated to hazard the safety of baggage and papers. I have been absent myself for a short period since the return of my division to Tennessee, during which time the records and papers were in the hands of other persons. I have not made an examination of them since with a view of determining whether such records have been preserved. By close investigation it might be determined pretty accurately from other data what it was.

Question. What time did your division advance on the morning of the 9th, after the battle of Perryville?

According to my recollection it was nearly midday. About 9 o'clock in the morning of the 9th I received orders from General Thomas, who was at that time second in command of the army and who more particularly marched with and supervised the corps of General Crittenden, to withdraw my division from its position in the general line of battle and which it had taken up during the afternoon of the 8th on its arrival in the neighborhood of Perryville, and place it in reserve in the rear of the divisions of Smith and Van Cleve. I obeyed this order, and subsequently, when the divisions of Smith and Van Cleve moved forward toward Perryville, my division followed them into the town and a little way beyond to the spring, where it encamped for the night.

Question. Was General Thomas aware that two brigades of your division were well advanced toward the town at that time?

I think he was informed of it, sir.

Question. Was it reported to you on the morning of the 9th that the enemy was marching off in sight of your advanced brigades?

Not until later in the morning than 9 o'clock, and after I had sent an order by the aide-de-camp for the two advanced brigades to fall back and take up a position in the rear of the divisions of Smith and Van Cleve.

Question. Do you know whether the enemy had retired at that time?

I cannot state of my own knowledge that I know it, but the reports made to me subsequently indicated that fact to be true.

Question. Did you report this information to your immediate commanding general?

I did, immediately. The report was made to me by my aide-de-camp, who had gone out to the front to order back the two advanced brigades, and as there seemed some little uncertainty and doubt as to whether it was so or not I rode forward myself, as mentioned in a previous answer, toward the town of Perryville, with a view to verifying the matter, and then returned and met Generals Crittenden and Thomas again and told them that nothing was to be seen of the enemy.

Question. Do you know any reason why this information of the movements of the enemy did not reach you earlier, if it was sent?

I do not, sir. I have described the manner in which it came to me and about the hour. During the whole of the morning of the 9th up to that time I was with my division and never probably more than 100 yards from it, and in a position to receive any information that was sent to me, as well as to supervise any movements of the division that might become necessary.

By General TYLER :

Question. Is not the Tennessee River navigable from Muscle Shoals and Knoxville during the summer for light-draught boats?

Without pretending to any very accurate information on the subject, I do not think it is navigable for most of the season from Muscle Shoals to Knoxville. I believe it is navigable during part of the year. I would not say for the greater part of the year.

Question. Is not Chattanooga the only Southern railroad connection between these two points; if not, what other Southern connection is there?

Chattanooga is on the line of the most direct railroad communication between Knoxville and the head of Muscle Shoals. But there is another way of going from one point to another without going to Chattanooga, but it is a very circuitous one and passes very far south.

GEORGE H. THOMAS (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. State, if you please, general, your name and position in the service.

George H. Thomas; major-general of the United States Volunteers.

Question. You will state, if you please, whether there was time between the 22d of August and the 2d of September to have concentrated the army under General Buell at Murfreesborough; and, if so, what effect that would have had on the invading forces under Bragg.

As far as I can remember now I think there was sufficient time to have concentrated the army at Murfreesborough. I do not think that would have prevented Bragg from taking the road he did take.

Question. What point, in your judgment, would have been a better one to have operated from against the invasion?

I should have concentrated the army sufficiently to have fought at Sparta and urged General Buell to do so. His reply to me was that we had not subsistence enough at Murfreesborough to enable us to do so.

Question. You can state what your opinion was and is upon the sufficiency of that reason.

I believe now that the supplies were very limited at Murfreesborough. I did not know at that time anything about the state of supplies, as I was far away on the flank of the army.

Question. You can state whether, depending upon the supplies we had and what we could have gathered from the country, that proposition of yours was practicable.

Well, I think it was practicable; I think we had supplies enough to have enabled us to have met the enemy, fought, and whipped him; but that is simply my opinion, for I do not know the state of supplies.

Question. State to the Commission, general, why you selected Sparta in preference to Altamont.

There was an ample supply of water for our troops at Sparta, greater abundance of forage on the Caney Fork, and the position, in addition to that, was a very strong one. The enemy could not possibly have passed Sparta without fighting. He would have arrived in an exhausted condition, both from fatigue and want of supplies, and in my opinion could not have fought more than one day.

Question. With the army concentrated at Sparta would it have been necessary to have watched the passes at Spencer, Altamont, and other points by which he might have gone into the plains of Tennessee?

Yes; it would have been necessary until we ascertained positively that the enemy was on the road to Sparta.

Question. Had the Army of the Ohio sufficient force to have accomplished that?

That is a difficult question to answer, because we cannot always tell what movements an enemy may make. If the enemy had turned either of the roads in force it might have compelled us to withdraw from some of those roads to meet him. If he had not attempted any of those roads in force it would not have been necessary to use so large an observing force. I cannot say positively whether the army had a sufficiently strong force to have accomplished that thoroughly.

Question. After the army was concentrated at Nashville what would have been the effect upon the invading force had our army moved to Lebanon, upon the Cumberland?

The enemy being at Sparta and having their flank protected by Caney Fork, it would have been affected but little by the removal of the army to Lebanon, because they could have thrown out flank guards sufficiently strong to have prevented us from making any decided attack upon them until they had prepared themselves.

Question. What point upon the Cumberland would your better judgment suggest as being sufficient to affect the invading force and at the same time cover Nashville?

Lebanon would be an excellent place to cover Nashville while the enemy were marching from Sparta to the Cumberland, and as soon as they arrived at the Cumberland it would have been necessary to cross our forces to prevent the enemy from approaching Nashville from the north side of the river. Therefore if I had been in command of the forces while the enemy were marching from Sparta and Gainesborough I should have thought the best plan to throw a portion of the forces into Lebanon and concentrate the remainder at Gallatin, so as to be as near supporting distance to the troops at Lebanon as possible.

Question. When General Buell and forces marched out of Nashville toward Gallatin and Bowling Green did you understand the object of their march?

I understood it generally to be to watch the enemy and if possible to get into Bowling Green before he could arrive, so marching, however, as to prevent him from striking at the railroad from Nashville to Bowling Green. I do not think that General Buell wished to engage the enemy before reaching Bowling Green himself.

Question. Having secured Bowling Green, did you understand what next was the object?

As far as I know his next object was to offer battle to the enemy, that is, if he could succeed by reaching Bowling Green in putting his troops between Louisville and the enemy.

Question. Having secured Bowling Green, what other point on the railroad became one of importance to our army?

Munfordville and the crossing of Salt River. Those were the two most important points.

Question. Had the enemy made a stand at Munfordville what would have been the effect on our army? Could we have passed that place without a battle, and if defeated what would have been the result?

If the enemy had made a stand at Munfordville it would have been necessary for us to have fought him, and if defeated it would have been disastrous, as it was a difficult position for us to get out of.

Question. You can state, general, what effort was made on the part of General Buell to possess himself of that point before the enemy came up.

So far as I know, without ever having conversed with General Buell on the subject, I think he made very strenuous efforts to get possession of Munfordville before the enemy reached there. I was not with the main army at the time and cannot speak from positive knowledge.

Question. Can you state to the Commission how General Buell regarded Munfordville; whether it was an important point or not?

In a conversation I had with him at Prewitt's Knob, when I arrived, I came to the conclusion that he regarded it as a very important point, so much so that he believed the enemy would resist him, they being in Munfordville when I arrived at Prewitt's Knob, and he immediately after my arrival made all necessary preparations for a battle at Munfordville.

Question. State if you know the number of the army that marched out of Louisville under General Buell to attack Bragg at Bardstown.

I do not know how many, but I should estimate that there were about 54,000.

Question. What was the object in view when that army left Louisville?

The object was to overtake the enemy, fight, and destroy him if possible, either by a disastrous defeat or by cutting off his retreat if he succeeded in getting off in considerable force from the battle-field.

Question. How was that object affected by Kirby Smith's forces?

It became necessary for General Buell to divide his main army and leave two divisions watching Smith, marching against Bragg with his remaining divisions.

Question. Where was Kirby Smith at that time?

A portion of his force was at Frankfort, but his main force was believed to be at Lexington.

Question. Was it known what point Kirby Smith had been threatening and in what direction he was moving at that time?

It was generally believed he was threatening Louisville. I do not remember that his forces moved about that time. They had remained stationary for some days.

Question. Looking at the positions of the two armies under Bragg and Kirby Smith, what roads would they follow and at what point would they form a junction and by what roads was it reasonable to suppose they would leave Kentucky?

After the battle of Perryville, when it became necessary for them to leave Kentucky, there were but two roads that offered them any security to get to Tennessee direct; the one by Somerset and the other by Mount Vernon and London. They might have retreated through Mount Sterling and into Western Virginia.

Question. With what expectation did General Buell's army approach Perryville in reference to the enemy?

We expected to be resisted by the enemy at Perryville.

Question. What reason had you for such expectation?

We had met with resistance all the way from Louisville, and the resistance became stronger and stronger every day. At Bardstown there was quite a skirmish; there was also a skirmish between Bardstown and Springfield as our troops advanced; and there being a very scant supply of water between Springfield and Perryville and a good supply at Perryville, I think that all thought the enemy would take and hold possession of the water and give us battle there.

Question. What, in your judgment, should have been the course of our army immediately following that battle?

I think as soon as we could determine whether the enemy was going to retreat across Dick's River we ought to have marched upon Danville or Lancaster or Stanford, whichever we could have effected.

Question. What would have been the effect, in your opinion, of such a movement?

I think, sir, we should have had, in all probability, another battle, depending entirely upon the good management of our army whether it would have been a complete disaster to the enemy or not.

Question. You can state whether that was your opinion at the time and what suggestions you made upon it.

As well as I can remember now I suggested to General Buell on the evening of the 9th that Crittenden's corps should be advanced as far as Danville; that future movements should depend upon what was developed by that movement.

By General DANA:

Question. Had you posted a portion of your force at Lebanon and the remainder of it at Gallatin while Bragg was approaching Gainesborough was it not at the option of the enemy to avoid you and march toward Munfordville?

Yes, sir.

Question. Why did not General Buell wish to engage Bragg's forces before reaching Bowling Green?

He wished to get his army between Louisville and the enemy and secure his supplies; for, his supplies secured, he could then attack him.

Question. At the time you were at McMinnville what number, from your best recollection, did you estimate the aggregate of Bragg's forces to be?

I never could make out more than 45,000, but the information I received at McMinnville was not very definite. The people who gave me information were generally ignorant and did not know how to estimate numbers. I therefore did not know how to estimate them.

Question. Taking into consideration all the information you then possessed, with what force would you then have felt justified to give battle to Bragg on his descending into the plains of Tennessee?

I think if I could have got 45,000 men at Sparta I would have given battle to him.

Question. Were Bragg's forces materially increased or diminished from that time prior to their reaching Munfordville?

I do not remember to have heard of any additional force joining him. I understood that he was marching by way of Sparta and concentrating his troops as he passed along. My estimate of his forces was based upon what I could learn—what passed through Sparta by the various roads. A force was left to watch his flank and rear and threaten Nashville. I do not think, however, that that force was more than 10,000.

Question. In the event of his having been compelled to accept battle on his line of march from the Cumberland to Munfordville was this force within supporting distance?

I think not. I believe that the greater part of it was south of the Cumberland, though I am not positive as to where the whole was.

Question. After General Buell became aware that Bragg probably did not intend to take Nashville, but would cross or had crossed the Cumberland, could General Buell then have safely reached Glasgow in sufficient force to have compelled Bragg either to retreat or accept battle?

I do not think he could.

Question. What was the earliest moment after the battle of Perryville at which it was known that the enemy would cross Dick's River?

I do not think that it was decided before 12 o'clock on the 11th. It was strongly suspected, however, on the night of the 10th. Colonel Harker's brigade, in Wood's division, had quite a skirmish with their rear guard on the morning of the 11th.

Question. Could any earlier information have been reasonably gained on this subject?

We were compelled, of course, to depend for our information on persons who were friendly to the Federal cause. We had to feel our way entirely from Perryville to the crossing of Dick's River. The information we received from some of those loyal persons was that they were retreating across Dick's River; but of course we had to ascertain that positively ourselves, and it was necessary to be sufficiently strong to resist any attack on their part.

Question. What was your position on the 8th of October?

I was in command of the right wing.

Question. What was the position of the right wing in reference to the town of Perryville?

The extreme right was about 3 miles southwest of Perryville, on the hills bordering the stream that runs by Perryville (Chaplin River I think it is called). The troops were facing toward the east.

Question. Where were your headquarters or personal position on the night of the 8th?

Half a mile in rear of the center of the right wing.

Question. On the morning of the 9th did you receive any report from any source as to the enemy being in view in retreat near the town of Perryville; and, if so, from what source and at what hour?

I did not receive any such report.

Question. Did you receive any report on the morning of the 9th of the fact of any officer in your command having been in the suburbs of the town of Perryville?

I did not.

Question. Where was General Buell during the day of the 8th of October?

He was at night, when I saw him, at his headquarters, immediately on the road between Springfield and Perryville. I do not know the exact distance, but I believe his headquarters were about half a mile beyond the line. I passed the camp of one division in going to his headquarters, which was but a short distance in front of this camp. During the day of the 8th I did not leave the right wing, and therefore do not know where General Buell was during the day.

Question. Was General Buell ill during that day?

Yes, sir; he was lame from the effects of a fall from his horse or the falling of his horse upon him.

Question. Was your personal whereabouts on the forenoon of the 9th probably known to the corps, division, and brigade commanders under your command?

It should have been. I sent word to all of them on the day of the 8th where I would be found, and it was understood that I should return to the same place on the morning of the 9th. After the troops commenced moving I could easily have been found by any one, as I was on the road all the time from the position the troops occupied in the morning until they reached the camp near Perryville, where they encamped that night.

Question. General, from the habits of the sub-commanders under your orders is it at all likely that any one of them on the morning of the 9th made any reports to the headquarters of the army which were not made through your headquarters?

I do not think they would have done it. They usually reported through me. I am not aware of an instance of their having reported direct to headquarters.

Question. On the morning of the 9th did you hear of any baggage trains of the enemy being seen in retreat?

I do not remember any such report being made.

Question. On the night of the 8th, after the battle was ended, what was your belief as to the relative condition of the two armies as affected by the work of the day?

The only information I received was after reaching headquarters (General Buell's) on the night of the 8th, that is, regarding the battle on the left, and the impression made on my mind then was that General McCook's corps had been very much cut up and could do but little fighting the next day, but General Gilbert's corps and the right wing were in as good condition as before the battle. I believed from what I had heard that the rebel army would resist us the next day; that they considered they had achieved a victory on the left and would resist us the next day.

Question. At what time on the day of the 8th did you become aware that the left wing was engaged with the enemy?

I did not know that a battle had been fought on the left until after night-fall, when, as I was riding to my tent, Lieutenant Fitzhugh, of General Buell's staff, overtook me and told me. This must have been about 7 o'clock.

Question. Did you hear any firing on that day; and, if so, what was the character of it?

I heard cannonading about the time that the head of Crittenden's corps reached the position it was to take up, and I directed Captain Mack, my chief of artillery, to report to General Buell that I had arrived in position and with the head of the column, and would superintend the placing of troops in position, and requested the general to send me any orders by Captain Mack. Captain Mack returned about 12, with a plan of the ground and directions from the general to dispose the troops in a certain manner preparatory to an attack the next morning at Perryville; but the arrangement was not positive; it left the arrangement of the troops somewhat to my discretion if I thought it was necessary. I asked Captain Mack if he knew what that firing was we heard on the left in front; his reply was that the report came to headquarters that it was Captain Gay, chief of cavalry, reconnoitering, and the enemy were firing upon him with artillery. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon I again heard very heavy cannonading, and directed General Crittenden to send a staff officer to General Gilbert to know what that firing was. The sun was probably half an hour high when he returned. General Gilbert replied to General Crittenden by a short note, stating that he had met with some little resistance himself, but was then amping his troops for the night; that General Rousseau had been engaged—I think he said had been driven back slightly, but had regained his ground. The firing continued at intervals from about half past two till about an hour of sundown, but I am not positive.

Question. Would such firing as that which you describe proceed from the resistance of a reconnaissance?

I do not think so; and for that reason I sent to General Gilbert to know why there was such firing.

Question. Taking into consideration the relative distance of yours and General Buell's headquarters from the scene of this conflict and the direction of the wind, would the sound of artillery or small-arms be more readily heard at General Buell's headquarters than at yours?

I think that with as high a wind blowing as there was that day the cannonading was not more distinctly heard at his headquarters than where I was. The wind was blowing very heavily.

Question. Was the wind blowing from his headquarters toward the firing or from the firing to his headquarters?

I think the direction of the wind was to his left from the direction of the firing.

Question. At the hour that General Gilbert sent his report in answer to General Crittenden's inquiry as to what the firing was, what was the actual condition of things in reference to his own and McCook's command?

With reference to his own, he reported that he was putting his troops in camp for the night. In reference to Crittenden's command, it had been in position for several hours and the troops were quiet in camp, with the exception of Smith's division, a portion of which was skirmishing with the enemy in front. Smith's division was moving up gradually to gain the hills which overlooked the creek and was skirmishing with the enemy till dark. The other two divisions of Crittenden's corps were in position and quite in supporting distance of one another. I cannot state what the condition of McCook's command was, because I had no knowledge of it at that time.

Question. The last question is intended to get the information as to whether the reply of General Gilbert at that time gave the correct information which was desired of him, or whether, from your subsequent knowledge, you do not know that his statement was incorrect.

I learned at General Buell's headquarters that night that the information received from General Gilbert was not a true statement of the case, but at the same time I believe General Gilbert reported all he knew at the time.

Question. Is General Gilbert's ignorance of the actual condition of things at that time a sufficient proof that he was not at those parts of the field where the presence of a commander is most called for while his troops are engaged?

No; I do not think it is. General Gilbert had the superintendence of three divisions, and while superintending those three divisions he could not reasonably be expected to know what was going on at a distant point from his command. There was no unusual delay in the reception of his reply to General Crittenden's note; therefore I think he must have been with his corps.

Question. How many years is it since you first commenced the study of the military profession; how and in what scenes of service have you been engaged since that time?

About twenty-nine years. I have served in the Florida war, in the Mexican war, and in this rebellion.

Question. Placing yourself in the position of General Buell, in command of the Army of the Ohio, at the time he commenced his retrograde movement toward Nashville from Northern Alabama, and being possessed of such information as he was then probably possessed of, what at that time would probably have been your plans and dispositions in reference to performing your duties in the best possible manner so as to have subverted the best interests of your Government, to have inflicted the most damage on the enemy, and to have properly guarded, to the best of your ability, the States of Tennessee and Kentucky? Keep in view in answering this question the information which General Buell probably got from day to day during the whole course of the movement.

I think it very likely that I should have pursued the same course that he pursued, although I believe now, from the information I had myself, that he should have met the enemy at Sparta and fought him there. The information I had, however, at that time was probably very different from that General Buell had. It is my opinion that could we have fought the enemy at Sparta we could have destroyed his army there.

Question. Were you second in command of the Army of the Ohio?

I was the second officer in rank.

Question. During the term of the campaign was General Buell as communicative to you as regards his plans as was proper for a commander to be and as was necessary to be in the event of an accident befalling him?

Whenever we met General Buell was always communicative, and after our arrival at Louisville I think that he explained to me his plan of the campaign as fully as was necessary. Previous to that we were not a great deal together, and although I did not know what his intentions were on all occasions, I believe he would have communicated with me freely if we could have been together so that we could converse with safety. He did not like to risk his plans to the hands of a courier or any other means.

Question. Do you know whether a failure to relieve the garrison at Munfordville is in any way to be attributed to the commander of the Army of the Ohio?

I do not know.

By General ORD:

Question. When you suggested to the commander of the army, General Buell, the propriety of concentrating a sufficient force at Sparta to meet the enemy, had you any reliable information of the enemy's position? If so, what was it?

I had information from the citizens of the Sequatchie Valley, the neighborhood of Kingston and Crossville, also from scouts sent out by myself, that the enemy was crossing that portion of the country, and said it was their intention to pass through Sparta, and some said attack McMinnville; others said Murfreesborough, others said Nashville, and again others said the army was marching by that road as the most direct to Kentucky.

Question. Did the position of the enemy, as located by this information, afford General Buell ample time, considering the roads and the condition of his men, to concentrate a sufficient force at Sparta to have met them?

I think it did.

Question. After arriving at Sparta, in case the enemy had delayed in the valley or taken another route, was the condition of our supplies such that we could have remained some time at Sparta as the best position for an army of observation?

We could not have remained for any length of time at Sparta with the amount of supplies we had at that time.

Question. Were there at that time other practicable roads leading toward Kentucky which would have enabled the enemy's army to have avoided the army at Sparta?

There is a road from Kingston to Montgomery and Livingston which they could have used. There was also a road from Knoxville, Clinton, Jacksborough, and Monticello which they could have used, and there are intermediate country roads, of which I have been told, on which troops could have moved, but they are very difficult.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. At what date would you have concentrated your army at Sparta to have resisted Bragg?

I would have concentrated at Sparta about the time that the army concentrated at Murfreesborough. Instead of moving the troops to Murfreesborough I would have placed them in such a position as to concentrate at Sparta the day it became necessary to fight; that I think was about the 2d or 3d of September.

Question. Where would the enemy have been at that time?

I believe the main body of the enemy would have been between Spencer and Sparta at that time.

Question. How long would it have taken you to move your army from McMinnville to Sparta?

The troops that were at McMinnville could have been removed to Sparta in two days from where they were and placed in position. The other troops could have been started in sufficient time to have arrived immediately afterward. The one division would probably require four days, the other two divisions would have reached in five days, as well as I remember the position of the troops now.

Question. You suppose, do you not, that the enemy would be apprised of your movement?

Yes.

Question. How close could the enemy come to McMinnville before deciding whether to go to Sparta or McMinnville?

They could come within about 24 miles.

Question. Not any nearer?

They might come nearer, but with a force at McMinnville, if they designed going to Sparta, they would turn off before getting so near.

Question. Is there not a road following the general direction of the mountain on its top nearly midway between McMinnville and Pikeville or McMinnville and Dunlap and running into the Sparta road; and, if so, how close would that have brought the enemy to McMinnville before he must necessarily determine whether to go to Sparta or McMinnville?

That is the road I had in view in answering the first question—about 24 miles. According to my recollection that road runs about midway of one edge of the mountain to another; it is nearer to Dunlap than it is to McMinnville.

Question. What is the distance from McMinnville to Dunlap?

The citizens there always represented it to me as being 40 miles. It is about 30 according to the military map and 25 by another map.

Question. Does your estimate of the distance from McMinnville to where the road turns off to go to Sparta remain the same?

The road, as I understood it, was on the top of the mountain, and ran along the mountain near the top of the ridge. It must be 20 miles at least from McMinnville.

Question. How far is it from McMinnville to the foot of the mountain, according to your recollection?

It is 12 miles by one road and 14 by another; there are two roads.

Question. How far is it from McMinnville to Sparta?

According to my best recollection now it is about 22 miles, and a little over 20 in a direct course. By the military map, reckoning the winding of the roads, I presume it would be almost 22.

Question. With your army at Sparta, the enemy concealing his movements by cavalry and other means which are possible, which do you think would reach McMinnville first, if he were suddenly to determine to march on that point?

I think I could march there first with my forces.

Question. Will you explain why?

Because the road is better.

Question. How much time would you allow yourself to get knowledge of his movements before commencing your movement?

That is a matter of uncertainty; but in concentrating my forces at Sparta I should not have left McMinnville unoccupied. I should have left a force sufficiently strong to have checked him in any attempt to take possession of the town, and as far as possible made him determine to take one road or the other decidedly; that is, either the road to McMinnville or the road to Sparta.

Question. Would you not in that way divide your force and render yourself liable to be beaten in detail?

I do not think I would have done so there. As a general rule the forces should not be divided, but the physical features of the ground at McMinnville and between there and Sparta are such as to enable an officer to divide his troops, in my opinion.

Commission adjourned to meet December 19, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, Friday Morning, December 19, 1862.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General THOMAS' examination continued.

Question. Would the enemy in descending from the mountains upon McMinnville have been able to use more than one road?

They would not have been able to use but one road direct from Dunlap. They would approach McMinnville by one road. They could, however, have approached McMinnville by turning off after reaching the road from McMinnville to Pikeville or they might pass from Dunlap to Manchester and descend the mountains toward Altamont.

Question. Or farther away toward Winchester?

Yes; they might descend into the highlands of Tennessee toward Winchester or Pelham.

Question. Or directly from Altamont to McMinnville by a good road?

That would be if they approached direct from Altamont. To reach McMinnville from Altamont they had to strike the road from Dunlap to Altamont in the valley of Rock River some distance from McMinnville. It is, as near as I remember, 8 or 10 miles from McMinnville where the road turns off.

Question. Would an army in descending upon McMinnville by these different roads meet with any greater difficulties than you would have in crossing Caney Fork between Sparta and McMinnville?

I think it would, for the reason that the roads I saw on the side of the mountain were very rocky and difficult. The only great obstacle on the road between McMinnville and Sparta is the crossing of Caney Fork at Rock Island.

Question. Is that a formidable obstacle?

It is; but an army could pass that easier than down those hill-sides.

Question. Did you travel over the road from McMinnville to Altamont by the way of Beersheba Springs, and is it not a good mountain stage road?

I did not pass over that road, but I have always heard that it was a good mountain stage road, and the only one that is good from the mountains to the highlands.

Question. When you were at McMinnville did you ever have any information which indicated that the enemy might cross or was crossing the mountains by the way of Altamont?

I did not get that information myself. The information I received from my scouts indicated that the enemy were passing toward Pikeville and Sparta, but I think, from the message which I received from General Buell, it was reported to him that the enemy were passing or might pass across the mountains through Altamont.

Question. Did your cavalry report the enemy on the Altamont road?

They reported a portion of the enemy on the top of the ridge, but marching toward Spencer, as far as they could learn.

Question. At what time did you propose a concentration of the Army of the Ohio at Sparta and in what manner?

As well as I can remember the dates, it was somewhere about the 28th of August, and I proposed to have the troops in readiness near McMinnville to either sustain the troops that were under my command there if attacked, or if the enemy turned in the direction of Sparta decidedly to take position there.

Question. How was this recommendation made?

I do not remember whether it was sent by a messenger or by telegraph in cipher.

Question. Have you a copy of the recommendation?

I have with my papers, but not here.

General BUELL. I request that it may be presented to the Commission.

Question. Have you ever heard that I proposed to abandon Nashville in marching the Army of the Ohio into Kentucky and what do you know of my determination upon that matter?

General Buell, in conversation with me after the army was concentrated in Nashville, frequently said that it would be perfectly disastrous to abandon Nashville; that we would lose more than we could gain in twelve months, or perhaps more than we could gain at all in Tennessee or in this part of the country. That was the substance of his remarks. I never had an idea that he thought of abandoning Nashville. When he left me to take command of Nashville in his absence he wished me to designate the number of troops I wanted to defend the place, and said that if he could possibly spare them I should have them. And I remember about the last conversation I had with him the subject was again spoken of in the same terms, and I replied that if I had to abandon Nashville I would leave it a heap of ashes.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that my determination upon that question was influenced by or was the result of any consultation with Governor Johnson?

I have no reason to suppose so.

Question. Did you see while at Prewitt's Knob a man by the name of Pratt, who came into camp and represented himself as having information from the rebel army?

I do remember him, sir. He came to my tent the evening before the army marched, and I sent him to General Buell.

Question. What statement did he make to you?

I was very busy at the time; just returned from the picket line, and did not have a great deal of conversation with him, and cannot say positively what information he did give me. I thought it of more importance that he should see General Buell, and therefore sent him to him immediately.

Question. Did you deem his information very important, if you remember it?

That was the reason why I sent him to General Buell. He told me in general terms that he was just from the rebel army and could give important information, and knowing he had gone out for the purpose of procuring it and his story being a very connected one I sent him at once to General Buell, thinking it was of very great importance that he should know what information this young man could give.

Question. Did he then or at any other time represent that he had counted the rebel forces, and that they did not exceed 22,000, infantry and artillery?

It appears to me that he stated he had counted the rebel forces, but I do not remember what statement he made as to the number.

Question. Whatever his statement may have been, have you at any time entertained a doubt as to his honesty?

I thought it a little singular that he should have appeared so suddenly at that time.

Since then the members of my staff have spoken of him, and without having any positive ground to base an opinion on I myself have doubted his loyalty and I think they have too.

Question. Were you present when General McCook came to my headquarters on the night after the battle of Perryville?

I was.

Question. Did you hear the conversation which passed between us?

I heard the greater part of it.

Question. Did you hear General McCook make application for re-enforcements to enable him to withdraw his corps from the position which it occupied, and did you from that conversation think that the re-enforcements were necessary to enable him to do it safely?

I do not remember that General McCook made any direct application for re-enforcements. It seems to me that General Buell was questioning him as to whether he had made certain dispositions of his troops, and General McCook replied that the dispositions were being made or that they were about completed, but represented that some portion of his troops were in bad condition and ought to be sustained, and I think that General Buell replied that if he could make this disposition he did not think support was necessary, but that he would give him support if he possibly could. I do not remember the particular words of this conversation, but think this was the purport of it, as my attention was particularly called to the dispositions of the troops on the right of the army for the attack in the morning that we were to make. I was thinking of these dispositions more than of the other.

Question. Was any such impression made on your mind as that General McCook asked assistance which was necessary for the safety of his command and that I peremptorily refused it?

No such impression was made on my mind.

Question. Will you state, if you please, what the orders were for the following day?

The orders for Crittenden's corps were to form in column so as to be able to deploy into line of battle immediately and march upon Perryville and attack the enemy if he was there in the morning, and it was the impression that we would have a battle the next day.

Question. At what hour was the advance to be made?

At 4 o'clock in the morning.

Question. Were those orders executed?

They were not executed at the time. The troops did not get fairly in motion, I presume, before half past six. I was detained at General Buell's headquarters till nearly 4 o'clock myself, but sent a message by signal to General Crittenden to commence the movement, and when I reached the ground, about half past six, I found the troops were just about to move. I believe the cause of their not moving was the result of General Crittenden's misconstruing the order. The impression was that he was to be ready to move at 4 o'clock.

Question. Will you give the particulars of the movements of that day, as far as they are important, stating where you stopped?

After the right wing entered Perryville I sent word to General Buell that the troops were in Perryville and that the enemy seemed to have retired toward Harrodsburg—this must have been about half past ten or eleven o'clock—and then asked for orders. The orders for Crittenden's corps were to go on to the spring beyond Perryville and encamp for the day. There was a considerable delay in getting this order, as it took some time for messengers to go to General Buell's headquarters and back. I do not know where General Gilbert's corps encamped that night nor McCook's. In advancing to the position in which I was to encamp the right wing, I was told to be particular in guarding against any demonstration of the enemy to attack us. One division was placed on the road between Perryville and Danville.

Question. Will you explain, if you please, general, why the right corps did not get into Perryville before the time you mentioned and what delayed its movements?

The division of General Smith had some skirmishing on the morning of the 9th with the enemy's cavalry. That was the only delay of which I know. After this cavalry was driven off the troops then marched into Perryville as rapidly as the ground would permit. A portion of the troops marched by the road and the other across the fields and pasture.

Question. How much of the time was occupied with this skirmishing?

The troops must have been engaged skirmishing through the woods from half past six till probably 9. I do not remember to have noted the time particularly, but the troops moved as soon as I arrived there.

Question. Did you know of a portion of General Wood's division being very near the town early in the morning?

I did not know of it.

Question. Did you know of their being recalled and why?

No, I did not.

Question. At what time and on what occasion did you recommend that the army should take position at Danville?

That was on the 10th, I think; the day after we left Perryville and marched to Mr. Harlan's farm, I think on the Salt River or a branch of it. My recollection is that I suggested that Crittenden's corps should be sent to Danville and that the whole army should be sent, its after movements to be regulated by what we might discover the enemy to be about.

Question. How far, in fact, was Crittenden's corps from Danville?

I think about 5 miles, as well as I can remember.

Question. Was one division encamped at Fry's Spring?

Yes, sir.

Question. Was it known then what the position of the enemy was certainly?

It was not certainly known.

Question. Was it known until the evening of the 12th that the enemy had certainly crossed Dick's River, and in moving from Harrodsburg might he not have gone toward the Kentucky River without his destination being certainly known until it was traced up?

I do not think it was certainly known that he had crossed Dick's River until the 12th, but from the information which we got from the citizens of the country I was under the impression that he would cross there, and that was the reason why I recommended to General Buell to place Crittenden's corps in Danville. He could have crossed the Kentucky River from Harrodsburg and either have gone to Camp Dick Robinson or to Lexington. I presume that that was one reason why General Buell was influenced not to send Crittenden's corps to Danville on the 11th.

Question. Considering the character of the enterprise the enemy had undertaken, do you think it unreasonable to suppose that he might go into the interior of Kentucky or that he might move on the Frankfort road and thence across to Louisville?

I don't think it is unreasonable to suppose that he might have gone to Central Kentucky, thence to cross Dick's River, and attempt to hold that part of the State, at least long enough for them to have completed preparations to get out of the State, but I do not think that he would attempt to march on Louisville without retiring from Perryville.

Question. Was there anything in the condition of Bragg's army or in its relative strength to justify the assumption that he was fleeing ignominiously, and that no enterprising service was to be expected from him?

Nothing but the fact of his having retired from Perryville; for, as far as I could learn, he had retired in good order. As I said before, I did not think that he would attempt to go to Louisville because he had retired before us from Perryville. There is no reason to suppose that he might not have attempted to hold Central Kentucky, and having selected a strong position, remain there and await a good opportunity to undertake some new enterprise or to resist us as we attacked him.

Question. Was not the attack which he made at Perryville made by a portion of his forces, and was it not calculated to inspire respect rather than contempt for him as an adversary?

As far as I could learn the attack at Perryville was made by a portion of the forces, and the character of the battle was such and the result such that it would have been imprudent to have marched against him without proper precautions.

Question. Is it to be assumed that he had no other design, and that he had no alternative except to retreat by Lancaster and Crab Orchard from Camp Dick Robinson?

No; it cannot be assumed that he had no other design.

Question. Suppose my army had been put in the way of his retreat by that route, what line of conduct was he at liberty to pursue by a study of the map?

If he should choose to run the risk of battle, and, if successful, he might have retired through Danville toward the south by Hustonville and Liberty and Jamestown or by the roads south, or he might have passed through Stanford and Somerset if he felt obliged to leave Kentucky. If successful against us, of course then he could have remained in Kentucky. If we had fought him and he had been defeated, he still might have been strong enough to have marched by way of Richmond toward the eastern part of Kentucky, but I do not think he could have retreated through Mount Vernon and the Rockcastle Hills or by Somerset if we had had a battle and had whipped him.

Question. Suppose he had crossed the Kentucky River at Camp Dick Robinson toward Lexington, what would you have done?

I would have secured all the ferries and fords on the river with a sufficient force to have held him there and then march against him by way of Frankfort, that route being the best for the security of our supplies.

Question. What force would be required, do you suppose, for these different crossings to prevent him from making use of any one of them at his option?

I believe a brigade of infantry and one battery of artillery could hold the Hickman Bridge against any force that could be brought against it. The crossing at the mouth of Dick's River, as well as I understood it, could be held by probably the same amount of troops; and I am also of opinion that a brigade could hold the crossing at Clay's Ferry.

Question. What force would have been sufficient to prevent you from crossing the river at Frankfort?

We had possession of Frankfort at that time, so I was informed.

Question. Was that possession in sufficient force to withstand Bragg's army, considering the character and the number of the troops?

I do not suppose it was sufficient to withstand it entirely.

Question. Suppose he had designed to pursue this course, crossing the river on the Lexington and Richmond road, which would have been likely to procure possession of that crossing first?

The enemy would, of course.

Question. What would prevent the enemy, then, while you were marching to Frankfort, from actually marching out of Kentucky by the Cumberland Gap?

If he secured the ferry, of course he could take that road to the Cumberland Gap.

Question. Is not the river fordable near that point at a low stage ?

It is seldom, if ever, fordable there ; so I am informed by the citizens.

Question. Are there many fords lower down on the river ?

There is one about half way between Clay's Ferry and Hickman Bridge which is fordable at a very low stage of water, but it is a difficult crossing. That is the only ford I know of.

Question. Is it your impression that the river is generally not fordable ; that is, only passable by ferries and bridges ?

Yes, sir.

Question. State, if you please, the more important particulars of your march from Corinth into Middle Tennessee last summer—the date of your orders, and the occasion of any delay you met with in the march, and the route you took, &c.

I do not remember now the date that I left Corinth, because I do not fix those things in my mind. It would have been in the latter half of the month of June. I left under orders to distribute my division along the railroads from Iuka to Decatur. The troops commenced moving the second or third day after I received the order. It was as soon as they could move and get rations. We reached Iuka the second day. As soon as I arrived there General Nelson marched, and I sent a cavalry force to distribute along the road for the purpose of relieving the bridge guards and allow General Nelson's troops to concentrate at Tusculumbia. I think it was about four days after General Nelson left that the troops again moved forward to Tusculumbia, leaving infantry guards at different bridges as far as that town. At Tusculumbia details were made to relieve the bridge guards which had been posted by General Wood from Tusculumbia to Decatur ; the remainder of the divisions remained at Tusculumbia. It took some little time to make these different arrangements, but I do not think there was any unnecessary delay.

About the last of July I received information that my division would be relieved from duty on the railroad, and General Buell ordered me to concentrate as soon as possible and march to Huntsville, I believe. Before that was commenced, however, General Fry's brigade was ordered to cross the river and go to Reynolds' Station, on the Nashville and Decatur Railroad, I believe it is called, for the purpose of guarding a provision train from Reynolds' Station to Pulaski. The railroad not being completed at that time, General Schoepf's brigade was ordered to march by way of Athens, and the third brigade was ordered to cross at Florence and Eastport and march to Huntsville by way of Athens. There was also some delay in effecting all these movements, because it was necessary to wait for the arrival of the division which was to relieve my troops, and also the difficulty of crossing the Tennessee River. The troops were occupied in crossing the Tennessee River probably two days. After the delay of about ten days from the time the order was given to the time the division was relieved from guarding that road there was no delay from Corinth to the point where the troops were finally ordered, namely, Decherd, after the crossing of the Tennessee River was effected. As well as I remember now the division was concentrated in Decherd about the 10th of August.

Question. Were there any rumors, about the time of your arrival at Decherd of an advance of the enemy into Middle Tennessee from Chattanooga and other points ?

Yes ; there were rumors that Forrest and Morgan were reported to be at Sparta.

Question. Do you know anything of any difficulty in supplying the troops in North Alabama in consequence of roads being out of order ?

I suppose I may say I know officially, as I was informed by Captain Darr, that it was a very difficult matter to get supplies for the troops. This, however, was in ordinary conversation between officers. I may have been told by General Buell himself when I met him in Huntsville, though I am not positive ; but I know that Captain Darr informed me.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, December 19, 1862.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Did you know of any petition having been gotten up and signed by officers within your own division for the removal of one of your brigade commanders? If you do, please state what you know about it and how that matter came to my notice?

There was such a petition, signed by a good many officers of the brigade, and it was handed to me with this officer's resignation. I tried to persuade him not to resign, but he insisted on doing so, and requested also to forward this application with his resignation. I permitted him to do so without approving of his resignation in the Army, and I presume that was the way in which the information reached General Buell.

Question. State, if you please, what I did in reference to that matter.

I think General Buell saw this officer, and after conversation with him his resignation was withdrawn and the application of those officers with it. I do not remember that any other action was taken in the matter. I sent for some officers and spoke to them myself about it, and I believe that the greater part of them apologized to the brigade commander for having signed any such paper; but I do not know whether General Buell saw any of these officers or not.

Question. Do you remember whether that paper was referred to you for official information with reference to official action?

That paper was referred to me, as I remember now, for a report of how it came to my headquarters, and I explained on the indorsement that was sent back with the resignation how it came to my headquarters. It came to my headquarters, and I sent it back to the officer concerned, the brigade commander. The officer concerned heard of it and tendered his resignation, and requested me to permit him to hand that paper with his resignation. I tried to dissuade him from doing so, but he still desired it and I permitted him to do it, but disapproved of the acceptance of his resignation, and that was the explanation I gave to General Buell when the paper was sent back.

Question. Do you know any reason why I could not at that time take any further steps with reference to such a breach of discipline?

I think about the next day after my division was transferred from the Army of the Ohio to the Army of the Tennessee.

Question. Who commanded that division immediately after the battle of Perryville and who were the brigade commanders in it, as well as you remember?

General Schoepf commanded the division up to the day of the battle of Perryville; and I was informed by some person a few days afterward that he had obtained a leave of absence about that time, probably the day after the battle, and that General Fry, being the senior brigadier-general in the division, commanded the division. General Steedman commanded the Third Brigade; Colonel Walker, of the Thirty-first Ohio, commanded the First Brigade, and Colonel Harlan, of the Tenth Kentucky, commanded the Second Brigade. Up to the battle of Perryville I presume General Fry commanded the Second Brigade.

Redirect examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. General, did you hear General Buell express any discontent or administer any rebuke to General McCook for his conduct on the 8th at Perryville?

I do not think I heard him administer any rebuke, but I heard him say to General McCook that he had no idea that a battle was being fought till it was all over. I inferred from the remark of General Buell that he thought that General McCook ought to have been certain of his being informed of the necessity of sending some reinforcements, though I might have been mistaken. The conversation was friendly—no harshness on the part of General Buell at all.

Question. General Buell is remarkable, is he not, for the manner in which he holds subordinate officers to what he considers their duty?

I regard General Buell as an excellent disciplinarian. I do not know that he is more remarkable than any other good disciplinarian in enforcing discipline.

Question. Can you state whether the signal corps was at work on that afternoon?

Yes, sir; part of it was.

Question. Do you know whether any information was sent regarding that fight in the afternoon by the signal corps?

None was received by me. The first information I ever received was through Lieutenant Fitzhugh.

Question. Do you know whether General Buell or any part of the army not immediately engaged did receive through the signal corps any information of that fight?

I do not know.

Question. Had we any higher respect or regard for the enemy after that fight than we had before?

I should think not.

Question. Was the attack there of such a nature as to throw us on the defensive?

It was not. General Buell made his dispositions to attack the enemy in the morning.

Question. Had the enemy attempted to hold Central Kentucky what position would he have selected and from whence would he have drawn his supplies?

If I had been placed in his position and should have attempted to hold Central Kentucky I should have taken a position somewhere near Lexington, where I could have drawn all my supplies. Of course every one has his idea as to the proper position to hold any territory.

Question. The enemy then would have had to draw his supplies from the country around Lexington?

Yes, sir.

By General DANA:

Question. Besides the instance you have mentioned of the officers of a brigade signing a petition for the removal of their brigade commander, do you know of any other instance in the Army of the Ohio of a similar petition being signed for the removal of a division commander? And, if so, state the time and circumstance.

I merely know from report that such a petition was signed by the majority of the officers of the division. Some of the officers of rank in that division refused to sign it. The paper never came to me, although the petition was forwarded, and I believe returned to the officers.

Question. What division was that, and did any of the brigade commanders refuse to sign it?

It was then the Seventh Division of the Army of the Tennessee, now the First Division of the Army of the Ohio. One brigade commander I heard of who refused to sign it—Brigadier-General Schoepf.

Question. Had General Schoepf any conversation with you and did he state any reasons for refusing to sign this petition?

He did have some conversation with me upon the subject, and stated that he refused to sign it because he did not think there was any reason for signing it; and in addition to that he regarded it as an act of insubordination, to say the least, and might be construed into a combination. If they were dissatisfied they should prefer charges against the officers; and he would have nothing to do with it. I think that was the only time that the subject was mentioned, when General Schoepf told me what he had done and asked me if I had heard of this petition being sent in.

By General ORD:

Question. In the retreat of General Bragg's army, after the battle of Perryville, did the enemy's cavalry sufficiently outnumber ours to require that our infantry or artillery should deploy at times in order to dislodge them ?

Yes.

Question. Did this involve the necessity of halts or delays on the part of our columns, that our infantry might form and take the road again ?

It did on two occasions, once at Stanford and the second time on the road beyond Crab Orchard. There were two other halts until our advance could dislodge the enemy's rear guard of cavalry. We did not halt for the night until 9 o'clock.

Question. Did these maneuvers of the cavalry in the rear of their infantry make corresponding halts necessary to the enemy's infantry on the retreat ?

No; not at all.

Question. In the pursuit of an enemy by the roads taken by General Bragg's army after the battle of Perryville did the country afford facilities especially for defensive positions ?

The country did afford facilities for defensive positions at intervals of 3 or 4 miles. Strong defensive positions could have been taken after leaving Crab Orchard.

Question. Did the enemy make use of these ?

Yes.

Question. Did this involve further necessity for slow and cautious pursuit ?

It did; that is, it involved the necessity for cautious pursuit. The pursuit was as rapid as we could make it under the circumstances.

Question. After the battle of Perryville do you think there were reasons why the enemy were not pursued farther than they were ?

The difficulty of obtaining forage was one cause; the difficulty of getting subsistence for the men over one narrow and bad road another cause; and the obstruction thrown in the road by felling trees to so great an extent that by the time the road was cleared the enemy had effected his escape.

Question. As the pursuit advanced did the country become more difficult for the pursuing army to form and more susceptible of defense ?

It did. It became more difficult and more susceptible of defense until we reached the neighborhood of London; there the country became open again. Before we could reach London the enemy had been enabled by the obstructions placed in the road to escape.

Question. Had we had as efficient and as large a force of cavalry as the enemy could we not have forced them to form the columns of infantry and give us battle on some ground favorable to ourselves ?

Not unless we could have anticipated their line of retreat before they reached Crab Orchard. We might, however, if we had had a very large force of cavalry, have attacked them at London as their column was passing through while their rear was involved in the hills of Rockcastle and have thrown them into confusion.

Question. Supposing the marching qualities of both retreating and pursuing armies the same, is plenty of good cavalry necessary to force a battle from a retreating army ?

I should think it was.

Question. Did the enemy's large force of cavalry and our deficiency, on the other hand, give them any great advantage in the way of enabling their infantry to form and select their own ground upon which to fight did they not feel disposed to continue their retreat ?

Yes, sir; I think it did.

Question. Which army can march the fastest, a large army or a small one?

A small one.

Question. Was our army larger or smaller than the enemy's after the battle of Perryville?

I think our army was the largest.

Question. Do you think the new troops which joined from Louisville in order to enable our army to pursue Bragg were able to march as fast as old troops or as fast as the enemy's troops? Were they any clog to our movements in rapid pursuit?

The new troops would have impeded our rapid march; they could not endure the fatigue of marching as well as the old soldiers.

By General TYLER:

Question. Was it a military probability that Bragg could pass his army and baggage over the mountain at Altamont, and was not the route by Perryville and Sparta in fact the only practicable military route up into the Tennessee Valley after he had passed forward into the Sequatchie Valley?

I think so.

Question. Crittenden was ordered to move on the enemy at 4 o'clock on the 9th of October, and moved at 6.30 o'clock, and Smith's corps engaged the enemy until 9 o'clock; during the whole of this time what kind of forces did General Smith engage? Did it or did it not indicate that the enemy was in force in his front?

He was under the impression that the enemy was in force in his front until he had cleared those skirmishers from the woods. The skirmishing had been quite heavy at times. There were some few dismounted men, whether cavalry or not I do not know; the largest portion was cavalry.

Question. Did General Buell's army ever get hold of Bragg's army before he fought the battle of Perryville?

We had several sharp skirmishes after the battle of Perryville between portions of our troops and the enemy's. I think it more than likely that portions of the two armies were opposed to each other at the battle of Shiloh. There were skirmishes in Alabama, but they occurred with General McCook's and General Crittenden's troops, not as army against army.

Question. The battle of Perryville was fought on the 8th; you testify that on the 11th was the first time you knew that Bragg's army had crossed Dick's River; between what places were the enemy's forces during this interval and what area of country did they go over?

We knew by 12 o'clock on the 11th that they had crossed, but we received information from the citizens that they were crossing before. Their rear guard crossed on the morning of the 11th either at King's Mill or at the mouth of the river. A portion of them were pursued by Harker to the crossing at King's Mill.

Question. What was the distance from Perryville to where Bragg crossed Dick's River?

I think about 16 miles; I am not positive.

Question. Where was the bulk of General Buell's army when the enemy crossed Dick's River; how far to the rear?

I believe the whole army was in the vicinity of Harrodsburg by 12 o'clock of the 11th, 6 or 8 miles from the crossing at King's Mill.

Question. If Bragg had been hardly pursued would not the crossing of Dick's River have been a serious obstacle to him?

It would, I think; though he would have crossed a portion of his forces at the mouth of the river.

Question. Assuming that Kirby Smith had occupied and plundered Lexington and had abandoned it, what possible military inducement could Bragg, after the battle of Perryville, have had in moving on Lexington?

He could have had none, except the desire to hold Kentucky or draw his supplies from the surrounding country.

Question. General, did or did not the battle of Perryville make it almost a military necessity that Bragg's army should commence its retreat, coupled with the abandonment of Lexington and that part of Kentucky, and that the intention was, if possible, to join the two armies and get out of Kentucky?

I thought so.

Question. We have heard of large trains of transportation, plunder, &c., which Bragg took out of Kentucky. What disposition did he make of those trains in the retreat and what was their position at the battle of Perryville, if you know?

I do not know what their position was at the battle of Perryville, but I believe they were assembled at Camp Dick Robinson, for we had heard before that they were assembling all their trains of transportation at Camp Dick Robinson; and after the retreat was decided upon these trains must have been sent in front, as we came across very few wagons on the road.

Question. Would you not consider it a very great military success for a small army, hampered with a large transportation train, retreating, to make its escape out of any country in the face of a superior army?

Yes; I should consider it a great military success.

Question. Is not the transportation train to an army a great hindrance to rapid military movement?

Yes.

Question. Were you encumbered by any of that kind of train except artillery in following up the enemy?

We were encumbered by the necessary subsistence train; nothing more.

Question. Where was Bragg's base of operations and supplies from the time he crossed the Tennessee River at Chattanooga or the vicinity?

I think he obtained his supplies from the country until he got to Bardstown; then he commenced collecting supplies from different points in Kentucky, with the intention of making a permanent depot at Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. What distance did Bragg march his army from the time he crossed the Tennessee River until he commenced what is now known to have been his retreat?

It was probably about 200 miles.

Question. During this whole march how did Bragg get his supplies?

I think he took ten days' supplies from Chattanooga; after that he drew his supplies from the country—Tennessee and Kentucky.

Question. What number of days did Bragg's military movement in Tennessee and Kentucky cover from the time he crossed the Tennessee River at Chattanooga until he was out of the reach of the army of General Buell beyond London?

I do not know precisely the date of his crossing the Tennessee River, but I suppose that it was about fifty days from the time he got fairly across the river to the time he got safely beyond London.

Question. During this time did General Bragg's army, with the exception of the ten days' provisions be brought from Chattanooga, necessarily subsist on the country?

Yes.

Question. Would not a country that would furnish provisions to a rebel army no more loyal than the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, under a proper military management, furnish at least half rations for an army of the same size as that of Bragg's?

Yes, I suppose it would.

Question. Have the military rules that an army occupying a section of country possessed by the rules of war [has the right] to draw provisions from the country, been efficiently exacted by General Buell during his command of the Army of the Ohio?

I do not know that any supplies have been drawn from the country occupied by General Buell's army except cattle, occasionally flour, and forage for the animals; the animals have generally been foraged on the country.

Question. And has not the result been that General Bragg, marching through the same country, has been consequently enabled to subsist his army?

General BUELL. I beg leave to suggest to the Commission that one of their members is proceeding to condemnation, when their business is consideration. I must say for myself that I am astonished it should be asked; I am very glad that it has been asked.

The court was cleared. On being reopened the witness proceeded.

The WITNESS. General Bragg has not marched over the same ground, except in Kentucky from Bardstown as far as London and from Chattanooga up to Murfreesborough. I presume he had drawn some of his supplies in the vicinity of the railroad from Chattanooga to Murfreesborough.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. From the time he concentrated his army at Murfreesborough to the time he reached Louisville was General Buell acting on the defensive or offensive?

I should consider it as acting on the defensive; that is, first defending Nashville and then Louisville, with the railroad to Louisville.

Question. In your judgment what circumstance, if any, required such a policy from General Buell?

The fact of the injury to the railroad making it necessary for him to keep between the enemy and Louisville, taken in connection with the fact that Kirby Smith had invaded and already had got possession of Central Kentucky.

Question. Do you mean to say that those circumstances required that policy from him from the time Bragg marched through the Sequatchie Valley until General Buell with his army reached Nashville?

I believe that General Buell thought so.

Question. I am not asking that; I am asking your judgment.

I have said already that I desired to concentrate the army and meet Bragg at Sparta and fight him, because I thought we had supplies enough to enable us to do it.

Question. How am I to understand your answer, general?

According to my judgment there was not a sufficient reason for falling back from Murfreesborough to Nashville.

By General BUELL :

Question. What force would you have required to meet the enemy at Sparta as you proposed ?

I believe that four divisions would have been sufficient.

Question. What number of men ?

Four divisions of 6,000 men ; 24,000.

Question. And by that estimate what force do you suppose the enemy to have ?

I supposed, from all I knew, that the enemy had marched into Tennessee with 45,000 men, but I do not believe he could have brought that many men into an engagement at Sparta.

Question. About how many ?

I do not suppose that he could have brought into an engagement more than 30,000 men.

Question. You think, then, that with 24,000 men you could have kept Bragg out of Tennessee ?

If I could have brought him to a battle at Sparta.

Question. Do you not regard that as a matter of certainty ?

I believe he could have been brought to battle at Sparta.

Question. How many days' rations would you require to make that result certain ?

Twenty days' would have been sufficient.

Question. Suppose that at the end of twenty days the enemy failed to give you battle at Sparta.

Then I should have been compelled to subsist upon the country.

Question. Could you have done that and maintain your position at Sparta ? If so, explain how.

I think we could have maintained our position at Sparta ten days longer by subsisting on the country ; that is, thirty days.

Question. Do you give that opinion from your knowledge of the supplies the country affords ?

Not from positive knowledge, but from reliable information.

Question. Do I understand you that you made a deliberate proposition to concentrate the army at Sparta and meet the enemy there ?

I did.

Question. And you have a copy of that communication ?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did you specify the force you thought necessary ?

I think that I proposed arranging the whole army so that it could be concentrated at Sparta.

Question. Did you give the details of your plan ?

Nothing further than the proposition to hold McMinnville, so as to compel the enemy to march by Sparta, and then concentrate the army at Sparta to meet him when he was compelled to march by Sparta on his way to Kentucky.

Question. Do you know what trains or supplies Bragg carried with him from Chattanooga ?

I do not know.

Question. How long was the principal part of Kentucky in possession of the rebel forces before Bragg's arrival there?

I do not remember; I expect a couple of months or so.

Question. Did the mass of the people make any active resistance to that occupation do you suppose?

They did not seem to make any active opposition.

Question. Was it very well known during that time that Kirby Smith was collecting supplies of various sorts necessary for the army; that he was making shot and shell and preparing other necessary supplies?

I heard after my arrival in Louisville that he had been very actively engaged in collecting supplies, and also had been preparing ammunition at Lexington, and one man also told me he had seen a train of twenty-five or thirty wagons going from Lexington to Camp Dick Robinson loaded with ammunition.

Question. As a source of supplies for an army, what comparison is there between Middle Tennessee in July and August last and the blue-grass region of Kentucky in September and October?

The resources of the blue-grass region of Kentucky were far greater than those of Middle Tennessee; there was an abundant supply in Kentucky. The supply in Middle Tennessee was not so great by half at least.

Question. Was it by seven-eighths?

The supply of some things in Tennessee was quite abundant—green corn, and there is some cattle; not a great deal of wheat, as far as I could learn; but a very abundant supply of all these in Kentucky.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that in retreating from Kentucky Bragg took with his army any greater train than was necessary to carry the subsistence for it on the march; if so, how do you know it?

I could not learn positively of any train larger than was seen to carry supplies for his army. We heard from citizens that he had sent before his army large quantities of dry goods and things of that sort.

Question. Has it ever, that you know of, been stated that the rebel army plundered Lexington?

I think I heard some reports of that sort from citizens, but I do not think it has ever been known that they plundered Lexington; that is, that they stripped it of everything. They may have taken some things from Lexington.

Commission adjourned to meet December 20, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, Saturday Morning, December 20, 1862.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Col. JOHN T. WILDER (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and position in the service and all you know about the surrender of Munfordville and the failure on our part to relieve it.

John T. Wilder; colonel Seventeenth Indiana Volunteers. I was ordered to Munfordville from Louisville by General Wright, on, I think, the 6th of September, to take command of the post. Shortly after I got there—I think it was the 7th of September—a party of guerrillas burned the bridge on the Salt River, 18 miles from Louisville, cutting off communication with Louisville. We had no rations, and telegraphed to Colonel Bruce at Bowling Green to send me some. He telegraphed back to me to be sparing of my rations, as General Buell's whole army was coming. He, however, sent me some hard bread. I collected the balance of my provisions from the country. On the 11th of September some deserters, reported to be from Buckner's division of Bragg's army, reached me. I questioned them as to the whereabouts of the rebel army. They stated that Buckner was 7 miles on the way toward Munfordville from Sparta, Tenn., and that Bragg's army was in the immediate vicinity. I telegraphed this information to General Buell at Nashville. Whether he received it or not I cannot say. I have understood since he had left Nashville. Here is a copy of the original dispatch:

Dispatch No. 1.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 11, 1862.

"Col. J. B. FRY,

"Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff, Nashville, Tenn. :

"SIR: Two deserters, Irishmen, from Buckner's division of Bragg's army, came in here this morning, and report Buckner, with 10,000 men and Forrest's cavalry, 7 miles this side of Sparta, Tenn., on Sunday last; have two batteries. These men came across the country on mules about 160 miles. I think they tell the truth. Bragg was in the vicinity. I am building fortifications here with two raw regiments. Deserters say that Bowling Green is their point (the enemy's) for concentration.

"J. T. WILDER,

"Colonel Seventeenth Indiana, Commanding at Green River."

A number of Kentuckian deserters from the army came and reported that Bragg's whole army was on its way to take, first, Bowling Green, and then Munfordville. That is what is meant in that last clause in that dispatch. On Thursday night, September 11, I learned that the advance of General Buell's army had reached Bowling Green. Trains ran through to Louisville from Bowling Green, I think, on Friday. On Friday night, the 12th, the rebels took possession of the railroad from Bowling Green to Munfordville. The advance division of infantry arrived in Glasgow the evening before.

Dispatch No. 2.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 12, 1862—3 a. m.

"J. EDWARD STACY,

"Chief of Staff, Louisville, Ky. :

"SIR: S. T. Purcell and R. Huggins have just come in from Glasgow, saying that Bragg's army arrived there at sundown last evening. Cheatham is reported in command. I have a force here of 2,600 raw men, with four pieces of artillery and provisions for eight days. What shall I do; fight them, or fall back if attacked? They are reported to be from 22,000 to 50,000 strong. I am posted on south bank of river.

"J. T. WILDER,

"Colonel, Commanding at Green River."

"Brigadier-General DUMONT, Lebanon Junction,

"Capt. A. D. BRUCE, Bowling Green, Ky. :

"Rebels under Bragg are reported at Glasgow last night, 22,000 to 50,000 strong, their infantry command arriving last night.

"J. T. WILDER,

"Colonel, Commanding at Green River."

I was under the command of General Gilbert at the time; in fact all the time I was there I was under orders from Louisville. This dispatch was directed to Louisville.

Dispatch No. 3.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 12, 1862.

"J. EDWARD STACY,

"Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff, Louisville, Ky. :

"Parties who left Glasgow late last night say they counted twelve regiments infantry and one of cavalry. Regiments small. Cheatham in command of advance of General Polk's division. Buckner reported not far off. My scouts left vicinity of Glasgow since noon; report no further advance of rebels to that time. Rebels say they are expecting division to-night.

"J. T. WILDER,

"Colonel, Commanding Force at Green River."

Dispatch No. 4.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 12, 1862.

"Brigadier-General BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

"Lacey, one of my scouts, left the vicinity of Glasgow since noon. The rebels are there enforcing conscription. Lacey thinks they will go toward Columbia.

"J. T. WILDER,
"Colonel, Commanding."

Dispatch No. 5.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 13, 1862.

"J. EDWARD STACY,

"Assistant Adjutant General and Chief of Staff, Louisville, Ky.:

"Scouts and numbers of citizens coming in state that the enemy are advancing 7,000 strong, and that a force has come in between here and Bowling Green to prevent re-enforcements from joining us. If I had one more good regiment and a few pieces of artillery that force could not take me. As it is I shall do my best to prevent it. Can you send me re-enforcements to-night? I shall send trains to Salt River for them.

"J. T. WILDER,
"Colonel, Commanding at Green River."

Copy of return dispatch.

"Col. J. T. WILDER:

"I send you what you ask.

"J. EDWARD STACY,
"Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff."

These are not all the dispatches I sent. The original copies formerly in my possession I committed to an officer, with instructions to destroy them in case we were taken. He did so. The dispatches here submitted I got from the telegraph office while I was prisoner.

Dispatch No. 6.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 15, 1862—9 p. m.

"Brigadier-General BOYLE, Louisville, Ky.:

"No advice from Bowling Green. Rebels at Cave City, under Bragg, in force. See J. E. Stacy, assistant adjutant-general; have telegraphed him all to-day. Rebels on north side of river coming down 2,000 strong.

"J. T. WILDER,
"Colonel, Commanding at Green River."

Dispatch No. 7.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 13, 1862.

"J. EDWARD STACY,

"Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff, Louisville, Ky.:

"SIR: I have construction train and light cars here. Citizens state that about 300 rebel cavalry are at Bills and 200 at Cave City; also that Rousseau's advance fell back yesterday. I have started scouts to try and reach Bowling Green. Some indications that main rebel force are going toward Lebanon.

"J. T. WILDER,
"Colonel, Commanding."

Dispatch No. 8.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 13, 1862.

"J. EDWARD STACY,

"Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff, Louisville, Ky.:

"Mr. Retter, one of the most loyal men in the county, keeper of the Woodland House, 10 miles south of here, sends his colored man, saying that Bragg is at Cave City with 20,000 men and that Buckner will join him to-morrow. His pickets are within 5 miles of here we know. The rebels boast of having taken off a dispatch from Louisville and exult over it. I believe half of this.

"J. T. WILDER,
"Colonel, Commanding at Green River."

General DANA. I do not see the use of reading all these dispatches. The colonel is not brought here to justify himself in the surrender of Munfordville. He was an officer acting under another general. He was not under the immediate command of General Buell, but under the command of General Wright. If the colonel has any testimony to give as to communications between himself and General Buell or bearing on the movements of General Buell's army, so far it is proper to have the testimony introduced; but I see no use in entering on the record this volume of dispatches, which go to the rear.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. These dispatches are introduced to show the position of the enemy at the time General Buell was marching to or occupying Bowling Green. I wish to show that General Buell had sufficient time to relieve Munfordville.

Dispatch No. 9.

"MUNFORDVILLE, KY., September 15, 1862.

"J. EDWARD STACY,

"Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff, Louisville, Ky. :

"SIR: I received the following dispatch this moment:

"ELIZABETHTOWN, KY, September 13, 1862.

"Colonel WILDER:

"My men must be relieved immediately; their time is out and they will serve no longer and we can't make them. They will go if not relieved; they will not remain.

"L. G. KNOX,

"Lieutenant-Colonel, Commanding Fifty-fourth Indiana."

"I cannot relieve them from here. Scouts say that no forces have left Bowling Green for this place. Rebels were last night camped 2 miles this side of Glasgow, at Beaver Creek. Artillery ammunition has not come. My intrenchments will be completed to-day.

"I just learn that rebel pickets are at Woodland, on railroad, 8 miles south of here, in considerable force.

"J. T. WILDER,

"Colonel, Commanding at Green River."

On the 13th of September I learned that the rebels were with their main force encamped on Beaver Creek, 2 or 3 miles north of Glasgow, with their line extending down near to Cave City; also that a force of 2,000 were coming down on the north side of Green River, which proved afterward to be Scott's cavalry, of Kirby Smith's forces. On Saturday night, 13th of September, he summoned me to surrender. On Sunday morning before daylight they attacked me on the north side of the river; also by an infantry force on the south side, commanded by General Chalmers.

I repulsed them after about five hours' fighting, and that evening, the 14th, I drove them back 3 or 4 miles in all directions around the town, and the next morning got up a telegraphic communication to Louisville again. On Sunday evening, after the fight, I was re-enforced by 400 men, under Colonel Dunham, of the Fiftieth Indiana, who remained in command till Tuesday, the 16th, until about 5 o'clock in the evening, when he was placed under arrest in order to report to General Gilbert. We had been fighting them nearly all day on Tuesday. Colonel Dunham had been summoned to surrender, and I was summoned to surrender on Tuesday evening by General Bragg. I refused to do so till I knew the force he had. We parleyed about the matter considerably, and finally they consented to let me see the batteries. I went out to examine their guns, and surrendered the whole force on Wednesday morning, the 17th. The reason why I wished to see their force was I believed they would have the major part of it to hold General Buell in check. I did not believe they had their whole force there to take me, although my information all the time was that they were coming up with their main force.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. During that time, colonel, what efforts, if any, were made to communicate with General Buell?

I had railroad communication to Bowling Green till Friday noon. I then sent out scouts. I sent one scout on Saturday, 13th—Mr. Wash. Miller, and two or three others.

I did not send written communications, only verbal ones, to the commanding officer at Bowling Green (I did not know if General Buell got them), stating that I must receive assistance, as a large force was coming in to take Munfordville. Mr. Miller got through to Bowling Green. Whether the others did or not I do not know. I have never seen them since. Mr. Miller staid there till Monday, the 15th, 3 o'clock, and then started back for Munfordville, and got back Tuesday night at dark, and told me I could expect no assistance from Bowling Green; that no troops had started to relieve me at the time he left. Up to that time I intended to fight them, be their force what it might, expecting, from the dispatch I had received from General Gilbert that I must receive assistance from Bowling Green. At the time Mr. Miller came in Polk's right wing of Bragg's army had crossed the river 8 miles above and come down on the north side, completely surrounding me. I knew that no force could relieve me from Bowling Green, except a large one, after Friday, the 13th, and that after the fight on Sunday a large force was between Bowling Green and Munfordville, and lay there apparently quiet, I think, two days. I afterward asked Colonel Walter, of Bragg's staff, what was their object in lying still, and why they did not come up in force and take me instead of having a small force so cut up as Chalmers' force was on Sunday. He said they had a cavalry force on the north side of the river to prevent my retreating, and that they lay there expecting a force would come from Bowling Green to relieve me, in which case they meant to fall upon it and cut it to pieces, but that when they found General Buell moving up with his whole army, they then moved forward to take Munfordville and hold Green River against General Buell's army.

When I was a prisoner by some accident they did not parole me. When I got into General Buell's lines I went to his headquarters and told all I knew about their forces, their means of subsistence, &c. This was on the night of the 18th, about 9 or 10 o'clock. His headquarters were at Prewitt's Knob. General Buell questioned me closely about their numbers and position. I told him they had from 35,000 to 40,000 men; that they had no provisions that would sustain them three days; that if their whole force fought as they had fought me, no reasonable force could drive them away from Green River; but if their supplies were cut off from the east they could not live there three days; they would either be compelled to come out and fight or fall back from there, which afterward proved to be the case. In the terms of surrender I obtained four days' rations for my men, leaving only one day's for their forces there. They seemed much disappointed at not getting more provisions.

On Wednesday and Thursday, 17th and 18th, they gave me liberty to go anywhere I pleased throughout their camp, and I went about as I pleased. I saw no trains of provisions. I noticed some wagons with ammunition. I examined a number of haversacks of the dead killed on Sunday, and found that their provisions consisted almost entirely of green corn. I never saw an army in a more perfect state of discipline. They were terribly ragged and dirty and apparently tired out. I was present with General Buell when the information reached him that the enemy had reached Munfordville. That was on Sunday, 21st, then about 7 miles from Munfordville. We were then moving forward in line of battle apparently. General Buell had immediately on my arrival in his lines ordered my exchange. I supposed I was on duty. I was also with him explaining the road and the character of the country when he received notice that Kirby Smith's and Bragg's forces had formed a junction, which proved afterward to be false. I then came through with the army to Louisville, and was there notified that my exchange was not consented to by General Bragg.

Question. What number of men, munitions, and other stores were surrendered at Munfordville?

There were 3,546 men, according to the parole list, ten pieces of artillery, tents for about one and one-half regiments, and one day's rations for the men.

Question. What sort of a man is this scout you speak of?

A very reliable man; at least, so I found him.

Question. State in what manner you made up your estimate of Bragg's army.

I received information on the 15th by way of Glasgow that Bragg's army consisted of one hundred and four regiments, including cavalry and artillery. I received information from another source, from a Mr. Simpson, of Glasgow, and by citizens and scouts, that Bragg had eighty-four regiments of infantry, that he had twelve batteries of artillery, and that his cavalry force numbered from 6,000 to 10,000; that the regiments would number about 350, some said 400, some not over 325; but from my own observation I think they averaged 350 men. One hundred and four regiments of 350 men would be 36,400; twelve batteries of 130 men each would be 1,560, making in the aggregate one hundred and four regiments, 37,960 men. If the regiments numbered 400 each, it would make an aggregate of 43,160. He had six divisions—one under Buckner, sixteen regiments; one under Anderson, sixteen regiments; one under Bushrod Johnson, twelve regiments; Cheatham had sixteen regiments; Withers twelve regiments, and a man named Jones with twelve regiments (I have never heard of him since). That would make eighty-four regiments of infantry. That they had six divisions I am satisfied. I was introduced to officers while a prisoner, and know that they were divided in that shape, and were divided into two wings. Hardee commanded one and Polk the other.

Question. At the time of giving this information to General Buell was he satisfied of its correctness?

I do not know.

Question. How did he express himself?

I am not certain. He simply asked questions and I answered them.

Question. Made any comments on them?

No; in asking about the position of Munfordville, and stated that he had in person examined the semicircle of hills about the river with a view of using them himself, and knew it to be one of the strongest positions for a large force he ever saw.

Question. What comments, if any, did General Buell make upon the surrender of Munfordville?

None at all.

Question. At the time you sent this scout Miller to General Buell where was General Buell's army, and can you state where at that time the main body of Bragg's force was?

The advance of General Buell's army was at Bowling Green, I think, in three divisions; this was my opinion. The main body of Bragg's army was in the vicinity of Glasgow. His advance forces held the railroads and the turnpike between Munfordville and Bowling Green.

Question. You can state to the Commission whether it was possible, from the position of the force of both armies, for General Buell to have relieved you at that time?

I do not know. I think he could not have relieved me unless he had thrown a very large force forward to relieve me; a small force would undoubtedly have been cut up.

By General ORD :

Question. You say that when you were summoned to surrender by General Bragg on the 16th, Tuesday evening, the words are: "I refused to do so until I knew what force he had." What was the literal meaning of those words; that as soon as you could learn what force he had you would surrender?

General Bragg summoned me to surrender, stating he had over 25,000 troops and over sixty pieces of artillery then in position. My answer was, as near as I can recollect, that Colonel Dunham had held a council of the officers commanding the regiments, and that they had unanimously agreed that if the force was as great as was represented it would be folly to hold out longer, and that if we could have evidence that his force was such as he had represented I would surrender, otherwise I would not. His answer was the only evidence he could give of his force would be the use of it. I then sent out another person to the bearer of the flag of truce, told him that we had been summoned to surrender four times before by a force incompetent to compel it, and that unless we had evidence that was indisputable to us that he had a force there sufficient to reduce us in a short time we would not surrender. They then gave me an hour. I told the bearer of the flag, Colonel Walter, of General Bragg's staff, that it was useless to parley; that I would not surrender until I knew what force they had. I did not believe that the bulk of Bragg's army was there, but that a part of it was held back to hold General Buell in check, and that against a part of their army I would fight. He said it would be useless bloodshed, and went back to take my message to General Bragg. I asked then to see General Bragg in person. He took me up to his headquarters. We parleyed about it for an hour backward and forward. I told General Buckner that I did not think they could take me by assault of infantry; they had been trying that twice on that day, Tuesday. Buckner said he had attempted twice to take us by assault, but when they came through the strip of woods they could not form in line, and that they had determined to shell us out by concentrating a fire in which we could not live for an hour. I told them if they had that force there it would be useless for me to contend against them, but if they had that force there was no reason why I should not see it, and that I would undoubtedly surrender if I saw it; that I did not suppose they could afford to waste as much ammunition as would be required to reduce me upon a mere quibble. General Buckner then went with me to see the batteries. Lieutenant Bullitt, acting adjutant of the post, went on the north side and I on the south side. I counted forty-six guns on the south side; he counted twenty-six on the north side, so he reported to me; fifty-four of which were in position. This was Tuesday, about midnight. It was 2 o'clock when the articles of surrender were signed.

Question. How much of the time during the defense of Munfordville did your men live on half rations?

I think only two days.

Question. Supposing you had put your men on the smallest amount of food possible how long would your provisions have lasted?

Probably fifteen days. It was not a lack of provisions that compelled the surrender.

Question. About what time Tuesday evening or afternoon did the council and yourself come to the conclusion that if their force was an overwhelming one you must surrender?

About 4 o'clock. This was while Colonel Dunham was in command that that council was held; before he was put under arrest.

Question. About what time were you satisfied that the time had come to surrender, from the overwhelming force around you?

About midnight. From all I could see of the force surrounding us and the nature of it I was satisfied before sundown that unless re-enforcements reached us I could not hold out. But for fear there was any mistake about the force there I determined I would know something more about it; and not to be deceived I would draw their fire, and sustain their whole fire before I would risk being deceived in the matter. I had fully determined I would not surrender except to an overwhelming force.

Question. About what time did you tell their flag-of-truce bearer you would not surrender except to an overwhelming force and that you would inspect it yourself?

That was about 7 o'clock in the evening. It was at 5 o'clock I received a summons from General Bragg, and the parleying was continued all the evening.

Question. About what time did the scout Miller bring you the information that you could expect no help from General Buell?

It was about half past five, a short time after I received a summons to surrender; not more than half an hour.

Question. Was there a strong disposition to surrender among the officers when they held the council in the afternoon in case the force was overwhelming.

I was present, and for fear there might be a disposition of that kind among them I suggested that I would not surrender under any circumstances and to no force unless I knew what it was, and it was adopted by all the officers present unanimously. This was about 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Question. Did you apprehend that it is no longer the duty of an officer to hold a garrison when he finds that he is surrounded by an overwhelming force and that the prospects of relief are remote?

I think that when everything looks as though there was no chance of success it would be folly to murder the men. This is the way I looked upon it at the time. The rebels had positions commanding us on every side, and my information as regards relief was such that I could not expect any in time to save us.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Had you received assurances from your scout of relief who you have made an effort to hold out and how much longer?

I do not know how much longer, but I should have held out till I was overpowered.

Question. Reference is made in one of those dispatches to conscripting. Do you know how much they added to their force by that process?

I do not know.

Question. Do you know whether they received any additions in the way of volunteers?

They did some; there was quite a number left the vicinity of Mumfordsville and joined them, their friends giving as the reason that they preferred fighting on that side to being drafted to go into the Federal Army. This was about the time they were preparing to force a draft for troops in Kentucky.

Questions. What actions, if any, have you been in; what service have you seen?

I was in the campaign in Western Virginia under General Rosecrans; under General Reynolds in the Cheat Mountain Division; I was in probably half a dozen small fights about Cheat Mountain and in one considerable fight at Greenbrier River under General Reynolds; I was in General Buell's army when that marched from Louisville to Corinth, and was in a number of skirmishes about Corinth.

By General ORD:

Question. Were you aware at the time of the surrender that in a position not easily taken by assault shelling out is a very slow business?

I have never been subjected to a very severe fire of shells. The rebels had positions within 600 yards around us; that on the north side especially commanded us. The ground in the main work sloped toward the north, exposing the men in the works to a fire from the north side.

Question. Were your guns under cover?

They were behind breastworks.

Question. Were the enemy's guns under cover?

They were not (except one battery), excepting the cover afforded by the woods and behind ridges.

Question. What small-arms had your men?

Mostly rifles. The men were chiefly raw recruits. Those engaged in the fight on Sunday had none of them been in service over three weeks. None of them had ever seen a battle before. A good many of them had not a complete outfit; some of them had no cartridge-boxes; quite a number of these men had no arms; a detachment of 102 had not a single gun; they were convalescents.

Question. After you made the statement you did to the council about not surrendering except to an overwhelming force, did the officers all concur that the force was too overwhelming and that it was time to surrender?

They all agreed about that, but I consulted none of them after having seen the fortifications of the enemy.

By General DANA:

Question. How many months have you been in service?

I have been in service over a year and a half. I enlisted April 21, 1861; have been in active service in the field since July, 1861. I have not always been in the capacity of a commander of a regiment. I started a private, and was at length elected captain of artillery. The battery was afterward put in the infantry service, and I was made lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, afterward made colonel. I have been in command of the regiment most of the time since July 1, 1861.

Question. Was the information brought by the scout Miller that you need expect no aid from Bowling Green founded on his own opinion or on information he received from General Buell?

He received none from General Buell whatever, he told me. He said General Buell asked him especially about the crossing of Green River, and about the road leading from Bowling Green to Elizabethtown leaving Munfordville to the right, but he sent no word to me whatever; that while he was present word was brought to General Buell that I had surrendered. The impression Mr. Miller had was that General Buell would try to reach Elizabethtown and get ahead of Bragg's forces by that short route to Elizabethtown. I was astonished that we got no information; no word sent by anybody. I had directed Mr. Miller to see General Wood and General Hascall, my brigade and division commanders, as soon as he could get there; that if General Buell was not there they would undoubtedly tell him what I might expect, as General Wood knew Mr. Miller personally and knew him to be reliable.

Question. At what time and in what manner were you placed under command of General Gilbert?

I had been in Indiana obtaining recruits for my regiment and came to Louisville; waited there a week for transportation, trying to join my regiment in Buell's army. The railroad was destroyed, communication cut off, and I was sent with my recruits, 214, to Munfordville; was then ordered back to Louisville by a telegraphic dispatch from General Boyle in person. I went to Louisville, there met General Wright, General Boyle, and Governor Morton. They were talking about the position of things in Munfordville. General Boyle was going to bring me to Louisville to take command of a brigade of new troops there; he wanted some one to drill them. General Wright opposed this; said I must go back to Munfordville and take command. I said I could not, as General Ward was the general in command of Munfordville at the time, and Colonel Dunham was also there; both of those officers ranked me, so I could not take command, but both of these officers were ordered away, and I was sent there to take command; having the Sixty-seventh and Eighty-ninth Indiana, both new regiments, the recruits of my own regiment, and two companies of the Seventy-fourth Indiana, and some scattered fragments of men, and about 400 convalescents without arms. The whole force was 2,600. I had 2,122 with arms. The principal parts of the works I built. Part of those built by General McCook I destroyed. His works were built for infantry; I wanted works for artillery. I tried to arrange the works to employ a small force, from 200 up to 1,000. There was a stockade built at the end of the bridge, which 1,200 men could have held against almost any infantry force. I was ordered to direct all my efforts to maintain Green River Bridge. About the 11th of September I was ordered by telegraph to send my reports and dispatches to General Gilbert. I was notified that he was in command of that part of Kentucky. Up to that time I had reported to General Boyle.

Question. Was it possible for these unarmed men to have procured arms at Louisville on their way down?

Three hundred of them belonged to the Thirty-third Kentucky, then organizing at Munfordville, and had not yet got arms; I had made efforts to have them drawn; and over a hundred were convalescents, joining their regiments without arms, who came there on Saturday, the 13th, in charge of Lieutenant Nichols, of a Wisconsin regiment.

Question. When you sent Miller and other scouts to General Buell at Bowling Green did you give distinct information as to the length of time you would be enabled to hold your position if not relieved?

I told him to say what force I had and that I had provisions for ten days. I did not say how long I could hold my position, not knowing what force was coming against me. I left that for them to infer. I simply sent a statement of my condition, the position I held, and the forces at my command, &c.

Question. Did you send information to General Buell that you were in a strait—that you must have relief; and did you inform General Buell that you had no reasonable expectation of relief from your rear?

I did not know General Buell was at Bowling Green when I sent my scouts. I sent to the officer commanding at Bowling Green that the rebels were in force between Munfordville and Bowling Green. I sent more to know what I might expect from there after giving a statement of my own condition than anything else.

Question. Did you give these scouts or messengers any official information for General Buell, or did they bear about any proofs by which General Buell could recognize them as messengers from you?

I gave them no official communication, nothing but verbal ones, but sent the men I knew could prove beyond doubt their reliability. I knew they had to pass the enemy's lines and would be thoroughly searched if taken, and I did not wish to inform the enemy of my position at Munfordville.

Question. Did these men, when they left your camp, know that you were in danger of surrendering to the enemy, and did they know that you were not to be relieved from the rear?

Neither did they know it nor I.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that these men gave assurances to General Buell that your garrison would not receive relief from Louisville or from your rear?

I do not think they did, as they had no directions to do so. I myself had no doubt, after informing my superior officers of the state of things, that I would be taken care of some way; to the last I believed I would be re-enforced.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that General Buell clearly understood, prior to your surrendering, that you would not receive relief from your rear?

I had no means of knowing what General Buell's opinion of the matter was; I really did not know myself what I might expect, but was confident I should get relief from some source.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. What time did you receive this dispatch which you have before referred to as coming from General Gilbert, telling you you would be aided or assisted from Bowling Green?

I think it was on the 12th September.

Question. How did you construe that dispatch; what meaning did you give it?

I supposed from that dispatch that General Buell's army would come to relieve me before Bragg could get there.

By General DANA:

Question. Did you ever send to General Buell or in the direction of General Buell an intimation that you had ever received such a dispatch as that?

I do not remember. I think I told Mr. Miller of it, that I had expected relief from Bowling Green. At the time I sent the rebels were in force between Munfordville and Bowling Green. I could not expect relief from Bowling Green except the rebels were driven out first.

Question. Do you now distinctly remember whether you gave Mr. Miller special instructions to inform General Buell that you had received an intimation from Louisville that he was expected to relieve you at Munfordville?

I do not remember that I did. I supposed, as a matter of course, that General Gilbert had information from General Buell that I had not, and was puzzled to know why he had not informed me more fully.

Question. Have you reason now to suppose that General Buell at that time knew that if he did not relieve you at Munfordville you could get no relief from your rear and would therefore be obliged to surrender?

I do not know.

Question. Do you or do you not now believe that the reason for your expecting relief from General Buell was owing to circumstances which might not probably have been known to him, inasmuch as you were depending for your supplies and support on your own commander?

My expectation was that General Gilbert would see that I was taken care of. I was under his command, and supposed he knew what relief I would get. I did not know what General Buell knew about it or what expectations General Gilbert had from General Buell except that dispatch. All the information I got of General Buell's forces, or from General Gilbert in regard to General Buell's forces, was this single dispatch in which Colonel Bruce telegraphed me that General Buell's whole army was coming, and that left me almost entirely in the dark. I supposed General Buell's army was moving north, but when I found General Bragg had got in his rear I supposed General Buell would drive him out of the way and relieve me. When I found he could not do so I telegraphed to General Gilbert. When the head of Polk's column was coming down the north side of the river I telegraphed back to General Gilbert that I had not force enough to hold the position, and that I was not alone in the opinion. This was on the 16th, after dark, that I got his answer. I do not know whether General Buell knew I expected relief from him or from Louisville. I believe I told Mr. Miller that I had been promised relief from Bowling Green.

Question. Have you learned since whether Mr. Miller distinctly told this to General Buell, that you had been promised relief from there?

I asked Mr. Miller some time this week in Nashville, and in fact when he came to Munfordville from Bowling Green, if he had conveyed my message; he said he had. This message was directed to the commander of the forces in Bowling Green. When Mr. Miller left I did not know that General Buell had got to Bowling Green.

Question. Do you know whether the commanding officer at Louisville or Cincinnati had any means of communicating direct with General Buell which was not known to you at that time?

I did not suppose but that the commanders of two departments, with such armies under their control, must certainly have communication with each other; I expect they had.

Question. Was there any other line of communication with that army except from Munfordville?

None that I know of. The cars had been running through Munfordville up to Friday, the 12th. I supposed, of course, there would be a concert of action between the commanders of the two armies.

By General TYLER:

Question. Your expectation that Miller would receive credence at headquarters was founded on the fact that he was personally known to General Wood?

I knew Mr. Miller had been employed in the secret service by General McCook, and he told me he was known to General Wood, and would have no difficulty in establishing his reliability. General McCook had had him in his employ in the same kind of service the winter before.

By General DANA:

Question. Does anything else now occur to you bearing upon this investigation which you have not stated in your testimony?

I heard General Buell say that General Gilbert had evidently placed too great a value on the possession of Munfordville. I could have got away from Munfordville with my whole force up to 5 o'clock on Tuesday if I had been allowed to, crossing the river on the north side, following the road down to the river through a woody, hilly country, and come around and joined General Buell's forces at Cave City or below there.

By General TYLER:

Question. Why did you not leave the position?

I had been ordered to hold out as long as possible and telegraphed the whole statement of facts to General Gilbert, expecting him to order me to get away if I could, which he did not.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, December 20, 1862.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. At what hour Tuesday were you summoned to surrender?

At 5 o'clock in the evening.

Question. Was the rebel force in position around your post before that hour?

On the south side of the river they were, and just coming around on the north side. They had not got all their artillery in position then; probably not more than four batteries.

Question. When you sent your messenger to me did you know of the position and strength of the force of the rebel army that was threatening you?

At that time I was pretty well aware that the whole force of the rebels was on their way, but did not believe that more than 7,000 were threatening me then; the balance was back, coming on, and were between Munfordville and Glasgow; part of them were not yet arrived at Glasgow.

Question. In what way did your informant arrive at the strength of the regiments of Bragg's army?

I was informed by a great many persons. Some of them arrived at it by counting the regiments in some of the divisions and learned from men belonging to them what the force was. There was one man who had a relative in the advanced cavalry who told him what the force was; and there had been parties of rebel cavalry scouting the country for two weeks before, some of whom represented the force to be as high as 60,000; but taking all the information I could get I think it was about 40,000. The community about Munfordville are largely loyal, and have a good many relatives in the Southern army, who would come in from a distance to within 10 or 12 miles to see their friends, and from these I obtained information of the strength of the rebel army. I also obtained it from deserters.

Question. Which of these sources of information would represent the minimum strength?

Those who counted. Reports went through the country that they had as high as 75,000, but I gave no credence to them.

Question. Would what is called the effective strength of the forces according to returns be represented by the number of men found in the ranks?

My experience is that the paper showing is always in excess of that you can get in line for action.

Question. And particularly is it not in excess of the number that would appear in the ranks on the march, where this kind of information would be obtained?

The ranks in a regiment on the march would count for generally much smaller than when in camp. There are always stragglers and details for wagon guards in every army.

Question. So is it not likely that the information of those who have actually counted the strength of a corps on the march would fall short of its actual strength?

Very much so.

MORROW P. ARMSTRONG (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State, if you please, your name and position in the service, and what you know of the number of the army under General Bragg at the capture of Munfordville, how you came by that knowledge, and all about it.

My name is Morrow P. Armstrong. My position in the Army is that of chaplain to the Thirty-sixth Indiana Volunteers. As near as I could form a judgment in reference to the numbers of Bragg's army they would be: Infantry ninety regiments, averaging 325 to a regiment, making 29,250; cavalry, I estimated at 7,000; batteries, twelve, which I averaged at 130; giving a total of 37,810. My information I obtained partly by sight and partly by conversation with officers in that army. I saw, I believe, all or the greatest part of Bragg's army I was with except Buckner's; two divisions of that were across the river. I was not across the river after the capture; did not pass through that part of Bragg's army.

Question. State, if you please, how you obtained those facilities for estimating the size of the army.

I was with the forces at Munfordville when they were captured and remained with them until they arrived within our lines; then I joined my regiment. I was unrestricted; I was privileged to go where I pleased. No person interfered with my movements. In fact, they told me they did not care where I went so that I did not go toward Louisville. The officers that I had most conversation with were a colonel on General Bragg's staff, a Tennessee captain, and a captain of the Mississippi Tenth; his name was [R. A.] Bell.

Question. State what you did with this information; whether you communicated it to any superior officers or not and whether it went to General Buell.

I told first General Wood, after entering our lines, all that I knew with reference to their numbers and of their position; secondly, I told General Smith; thirdly, General Rousseau; and, lastly, General Buell. General Smith and General Rousseau sent me to General Buell. If I mistake not it was on the 19th of September; at least it was on the Friday night after the night we were captured at Munfordville. I got to General Buell's headquarters somewhere near 11 o'clock at night.

Question. Do you know whether the rebel army had been increased after the invasion by recruits or volunteers?

I do not.

Question. Did you observe the condition of the rebel troops and can you state how they were off for provisions; whether they had any train accompanying them or not?

They had wagon trains accompanying them, but I think that their stock of provisions was scarce; at least they stated to us on Thursday morning that the reason why they did not give us more subsistence was they had it not to spare; that they had given us more than their men had. My share of that was about one hard cracker and a very small piece of fat bacon a day. This is what the officer who had that matter in charge said. A number of officers in that army told me that their men had to subsist on burnt corn and peaches, such as they could gather up. My observation among them was that they had little to eat.

By General DANA:

Question. Do you know whether the force you saw and estimated around Munfordville was the whole of Bragg's force?

From the information I had I am inclined to believe it was; of course I go on information I received, in making up my judgment, from the number of generals present and their rank; this must be the case. From them I learned pretty well the arrangement of their army under their commanders. I was informed that Polk and Hardee commanded wings. They had as division generals Buckner, Cheatham, Withers, Jones, Anderson, and Johnson; at least I got these names as division commanders. I saw most of these generals.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. How did you arrive at the strength of the regiments?

I arrived at the strength of a majority of those regiments by a comparison of them with regiments of our own with which I had been associated, carefully considering their length, estimating their numbers by the numbers of our own regiments, and hence I averaged those regiments at 325; some of them were quite small, others pretty large.

Question. Explain the process of this estimate.

I have been associated with a regiment of our own nearly nine months as a line officer of the regiment, and accustomed to measure with the eye the distance that a regiment would occupy drawn up in line of battle. Knowing what was the number of that regiment all along, at least during the nine months, I then with the eye measured the distance that those regiments occupied, and then endeavored to strike an average.

Question. What was the strength of the regiments that you compared these with?

My own more particularly.

Question. What was the strength of that regiment?

I made the comparison with my regiment, and the strength of that when I was last associated with it as a line officer was about 475.

Question. How was that regiment formed when you estimated the length of line it occupied?

On dress parade.

Question. What was the length of line it occupied when so formed?

It would be difficult to give it by feet.

Question. By yards?

That would be difficult too.

Question. By any kind of measure you choose?

The manner in which I have been accustomed to measure was by appointing a distance. It would be something near the length of this capitol.

Question. From that can you arrive at some standard of measurement?

I have no idea myself how long this capitol is. I do not know the number of feet.

Question. Did you ever see a regiment of Bragg's army on parade?

I saw them draw up in line and I saw them on the march.

Question. Did you estimate the length of the line occupied by any of them and how many of them?

I estimated the length of their lines in my mind thus: When I saw a regiment drawn up in dress parade or line I looked along that line carefully, made up my judgment, and compared it in my mind with my own regiment. I did that with a number, and the majority of their regiments that I estimated were not as large as my regiment; some of them were larger, in my judgment.

Question. Did you count any of them?

No, sir; I did not. I was afraid to do that, because I purposed, if I was not placed under pledge of honor, to reveal everything I knew in reference to them.

Redirect examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You say in reply to General Buell's question that you never measured by yards or feet the distance occupied by your regiment on dress parade?

I have never stepped it; I have only measured it with my eye.

Question. You did not count the number in the rebel regiment or measure by yards or feet the distance they occupied?

I did not.

Question. You arrived at the conclusion by comparing the length of one of their regiments with your own ?

Yes, sir.

Commission adjourned to meet December 22, 1862, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, TENN., Monday Morning, December 22, 1862.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present ; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General SPEED S. FRY (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. State, if you please, your name and position in the service of the United States.

Speed S. Fry ; I am brigadier-general of the volunteer service.

Question. Did you accompany the march of the Army of the Ohio in the pursuit of Bragg after he crossed the Tennessee ?

I did, sir.

Question. What was the condition of the Army of the Ohio as to discipline ?

It was considerably demoralized.

Question. State, if you please, the cause of that demoralization, as far as you know.

There were two or three causes tending to demoralize the army. One was the want of supplies and the necessity of foraging upon a destitute country. Another was the idea that Bragg would be permitted with a large army to invade Kentucky. There seemed to be an intense feeling throughout the whole army on the subject of permitting the rebel army again to invade Kentucky. Officers and men felt that Bragg could have been checked before reaching Kentucky if proper diligence had been used.

Question. What estimate was placed upon the number of the invading army by intelligent officers, from all their sources of information, previous to reaching Munfordville ?

From all the information obtained upon that subject the force of Bragg was estimated at 36,000. There were rumors, however, in the camp and throughout the country that Bragg had an army of from 50,000 to 60,000 men. The most intelligent officers with whom I conversed believed that Bragg's army did not exceed 36,000.

Question. You can state whether it was known at that time, that is, previous to your arrival at Munfordville, that Kirby Smith had invaded Kentucky, and what the object of Kirby Smith and Bragg was.

It was known before that that Kirby Smith had invaded Kentucky, and from all I could gather in regard to their object in this invasion it was to hold Kentucky as a part of the Southern Confederacy.

Question. You can state whether it was known at the time how Bragg was situated in reference to supplies and what expectation he had of forming a junction with Kirby Smith.

From the best information I could obtain Bragg was poorly supplied with provisions at the time of the invasion by his army. I could not ascertain certainly at what point they expected to form a junction ; but, judging from events since that time, they must have expected to unite at Perryville or Harrodsburg.

Question. I ask you, general, in reference to the information or opinion held by the army at the time ; that is, previous to the capture of Munfordville. I wish to know at what point it was expected that Bragg could get supplies for his army that he was then marching without.

I do not think he could have obtained supplies short of Bardstown, Lebanon, and through that region of country. Of course he could have obtained some supplies soon after reaching Kentucky; not I think to a very great extent.

Question. State, if you please, whether you were at the battle of Perryville; what you know of the number of the enemy, and of their movements on the night after the battle and the day subsequent.

I was at the battle of Perryville. I had no certain means of ascertaining the number of the enemy at Perryville during the fight. My only information was obtained from citizens living in and around the place. From that information I came to the conclusion that Bragg and Kirby Smith formed a junction at Perryville, and Kirby Smith, with the whole or a portion of his army, was there. The day after the battle the evacuation took place, and they moved in the direction of Harrodsburg, as I learn, with the larger portion of their army. A portion of it, I learned, moved in the direction of Danville.

Question. State, if you please, whether you are acquainted with that region of country and how you came to a knowledge of it.

I am very well acquainted with that part of the country. I was born and raised within 8 miles of the place and have traveled a great deal over it.

Question. What was your position, general, on the day of the battle of Perryville and the day succeeding the battle; that is, what field were you in and what were you doing?

I was made the officer for the day of the center of the army the night previous to the battle. About 11 o'clock at night I passed out with one regiment of my brigade to the house of Mr. Jardine Peter. I there filed a regiment off to the left of the Springfield pike, and ordered them to take a position not far in the rear of the ridge upon which the battle commenced in the morning. General Gilbert, after some reflection, concluded to send a strong picket out. He ordered out Colonel McCook with his brigade, from, I believe, General Sheridan's division. I directed Colonel McCook, with four regiments, I think, of his brigade, to take a position upon the right of the road and upon this ridge. I took one regiment from his brigade and placed it upon the left of the road and the left regiment which I had already stationed there. From the Tenth Indiana Regiment I directed one company to advance as near to the front as the officer might deem safe. They advanced a little beyond this ridge of which I have already spoken to a house situated on the west side of another ridge nearer the town. There they found the pickets of the enemy. A few shots were exchanged, and, according to the directions I had given, my pickets fell back out of reach of their guns in order to prevent any alarm. Colonel McCook, with his brigade, came upon the enemy just before day and had a considerable engagement, at least with the pickets. I immediately went out to where the two regiments were on the left and advanced them at least half a mile. I remained there some time watching the movements of the enemy, and felt satisfied from what I saw and from my knowledge of the position of the ground that just in front of me and to my left the enemy would make the most decided stand. In the course of an hour after I had advanced those two regiments two pieces of artillery, together with some two or three regiments of cavalry, came to this point. I inquired of Colonel Gay, who was in command of the cavalry, if there was any enemy just in front of that battery and of our forces. He said the enemy had taken their position, he believed, just on the point of the first ridge of the two of which I have spoken, and deemed it advisable that I should go there and drive them away. I followed his advice and succeeded in doing what he desired. The fight was still going on immediately to my right by General Sheridan's division. These two regiments remained there some time, but were finally ordered back; the Tenth Indiana to the rear to join its brigade, and the other, the Eighty-sixth Illinois, to join Colonel McCook. I was not in the fight after that during the day.

Question. What was the conduct of General Gilbert immediately previous to the fight, pending the fight, and subsequent to it?

General Gilbert's conduct toward me was generally courteous and polite. I had no reason to complain of him personally. I heard a great deal of complaint from subordinate officers in regard to his conduct toward the men. They spoke of it as being very unofficial and ungentlemanly. I, however, saw nothing of it myself. I saw very little of General Gilbert during the day of the fight. I cannot therefore say what part he took in the engagement.

Question. I ask you, general, in reference to what he did; whether he did his duty; whether it was done with ability as a general, if you know.

The two divisions besides my own under his command were in the fight and behaved well, and I suppose that they were under the immediate control and direction of General Gilbert. So far as I could learn in regard to the management of those two divisions General Gilbert behaved well, though I know nothing of the part he took in it personally. He gave me no directions as to what I should do during the day. All the directions I obtained from him were as to what I should do the night previous to the battle as officer of the day, and what I did on the day of the fight was done, I must say, upon my own responsibility. I do not think I saw General Gilbert any time during the day of the fight. What directions he gave to his other divisions I am unable to say, and cannot therefore say whether he displayed great military skill or not.

Question. Had General Gilbert's entire force been engaged in that fight what effect would it have had upon the fortunes of the day, in your opinion?

My opinion is that the fortunes of the day would have turned a great deal more in our favor than they did.

Question. At the time you were approaching Perryville was it known to the army what the movements of Kirby Smith were—in what direction he was marching?

I learned that information had been obtained to the effect that Kirby Smith was marching in the direction of Harrodsburg from the north of Harrodsburg; that a portion of his army and General Sill's division had a slight engagement near Hardensville, I think in Shelby County, and perhaps another slight engagement near Lawrenceburg, 20 miles north of Harrodsburg.

Question. At what time on the morning of the 9th was it known to your army that Bragg was moving toward Harrodsburg and was the object of that movement understood?

I do not know at what time it was reported at headquarters. I learned it between 7 and 8 o'clock in the morning. I do not know what was the object of the movement. I suppose what was the object, but do not know certainly. I was satisfied myself that they were anxious to get out of our way.

Question. Had our army moved from Perryville on the morning of the 9th to Danville, or in that direction, what would have been the effect, instead of going to Harrodsburg?

I think the effect would have been to have checked them at Camp Dick Robinson, provided our army had continued to move in the proper direction beyond Danville. There was but one way of escape, in my opinion, for them from Camp Dick Robinson, and that way was left entirely open.

Question. By your moving toward Harrodsburg instead of Danville?

Yes, sir.

By General DANA:

Question. What was your rank and the character of your command in the Army of the Ohio from the time Bragg crossed the Tennessee River during the retrograde movement of the Army of the Ohio?

I was brigadier-general of the volunteer forces, and in command of a brigade comprising four regiments and one battery. From October the 9th, the day after the battle, I was in command of the First Division, and have been up to this time.

Question. Do you know anything, during one or two days prior to the battle of Perryville, of General Gilbert taking possession of a spring of water for the exclusive use of himself and his staff?

I knew nothing of it personally; I only heard that such was the fact. General Gilbert ordered me the night before the battle to place a guard over a pool of water for the use of the men.

Question. Do you know anything of the size and quantity of water in the spring you heard he took possession of?

I do not, sir. I did not know there was a spring there. All the water I drank, except on one occasion, was from the pool before spoken of.

Question. At this time were the men suffering from the want of water?

They were suffering very much.

By General ORD:

Question. Before the battle of Perryville did General Buell place over you any officer with whose right and capacity to command you were dissatisfied?

I cannot say that I was wholly dissatisfied myself, that is, on my own account. I was dissatisfied, however, on account of the treatment of that officer placed over me by General Buell toward officers under my immediate command. As to his right to command, I know nothing about it except what I have heard since. I have learned that he had no right to command me; indeed, I may say I heard it prior to his being relieved of his command, but made no complaint. I obeyed his orders as cheerfully as though he had been my superior in rank.

Question. State the name of this officer.

C. C. Gilbert.

Question. You say the Army of the Ohio was demoralized at that time; do you know positively the state of discipline in other divisions besides your own at that time?

I was thrown a great deal among other divisions, and found them as much, if not more, demoralized than my own.

Question. Do you know of any petition to remove General Buell from the command of the Army of the Ohio either before or after the battle of Perryville?

I know of only one and that was never presented.

Question. What was this petition based upon?

Simply upon the idea that those signing it did not believe General Buell was commanding the army in such a manner as to secure success for our arms.

Question. Did it make any specific charges against General Buell?

None that I recollect except that.

Question. About how many colonels of regiments signed this petition?

I did not count the number. Eight or ten, I suppose; perhaps more; not less, I am satisfied.

Question. Did you consider at the time that this petition was right and well founded?

I thought it was well founded at the time.

This question being objected to by the judge-advocate, the court was cleared.

Question. Do you know the names of any officers of the rank of colonel or above that rank who signed this petition?

Yes, sir.

Question. Will you state those names?

General James B. Steedman, Third Brigade of the First Division; Col. J. M. Harlan, commanding Second Brigade of the First Division; Colonel George, commanding Second Minnesota Regiment; Col. J. M. Cornell, commanding Seventeenth Ohio; Col. M. B. Walker, commanding First Brigade, First Division; Col. John T. Croxton, commanding Fourth Kentucky; Maj. D. Ward, of the Seventeenth Ohio; Lieut. Col. F. W. Lister, of the Thirty-first Ohio, and several others whose names I cannot now call to mind.

Question. Did you sign this petition?

I decline to answer that question, sir.

Question. To whom do you consider that a general is responsible for the performance of his official duties—to his superior who places him in position or to his subordinates under his command?

I think he is responsible to his superior and to the people of his country, the subordinate officers included.

Question. Do you think this responsibility extends to the propriety of any move he may make?

In some instances I should think it did.

Question. How do you suppose a general should go to work to obtain the opinion of the subordinates under his command in regard to the propriety of any movement he was about to make?

I know no other means than by consultation.

Question. To what limit do you consider the responsibility to his subordinate officers extends, going down?

Under ordinary circumstances it is the duty of a general commanding an army to consult more especially general officers as low down as the commanders of divisions, and through them he could obtain the opinions of intelligent and well-informed officers of a lower grade. Under extraordinary circumstances there are many instances in which a general commanding an army would be greatly benefited in his movements by the consultation of officers of even the very lowest grades; and I think during the movements of our army in Kentucky there were many instances in which it would have been advisable that General Buell should have consulted the officers who were familiar with the country, and who, in my opinion, would have been of great service to him.

Question. Would it not be necessary, if the general had pursued the course you speak of in obtaining the opinions of officers of a lower grade, after consultation with higher officers, to postpone the movement until the officers of the lower grades might be consulted upon the special move about which they had no previous information?

If it were necessary to consult a great many officers, as a matter of course the movement would have been postponed to some extent; but generally speaking it would not be necessary to consult a great many officers; and the information necessary to be obtained from those officers who were acquainted with the character of the country and the strength of any particular position could be obtained very readily and very quickly.

Question. Is there any method or manner you know of by which the commanding officer can make these subordinate officers, to whom you think he is more or less responsible, responsible for the disasters which may ensue from following their advice?

General DANA. I object to that question as irrelevant.

The court was then cleared. On being reopened the witness proceeded.

The WITNESS. If an officer was called upon by his commanding general for information on any particular subject connected with the movements of the army, and that officer, having it in his power to give such information, should make a misrepresentation of facts, I do not see why he should not be court-martialed; but as a general thing, as I said before, I do not suppose there would be any way of reaching this officer for any disaster which might occur from following his advice.

Question. In your opinion do you consider that want of confidence which you state existed in General Buell was somewhat due to his not consulting the officers under his command enough?

I do, sir. There seemed to be a general complaint on that subject even with the officers who in the opinion of every one should have been consulted.

By General DANA:

Question. Within the precincts of whose corps and division was the meeting held to which you have testified?

It was at a house not within any officer's command.

MONDAY AFTERNOON, December 22, 1862.

General FRY's examination continued.

Cross-examined by General BUELL:

Question. How long had this scarcity of provisions lasted which you say tended in a measure to demoralize the troops?

Our supplies were cut off some time in the month of August. While my division was stationed at Decherd we were on half rations—from that time until we reached Louisville or Bowling Green, I do not recollect which; Louisville I think.

Question. Are you able to say, general, how far this interruption of our communications was my fault?

I cannot say how far General Buell was in fault in regard to the cutting off of supplies; but our forces were very much scattered, and at points where there was no protection to the railroads.

Question. Will you specify the positions of the troops by way of illustration on this point?

So far as my recollection now serves me a portion of our troops were at Huntsville, a portion on the road between Huntsville and Decherd, and some few of them at Pulaski. My brigade and Colonel Walker's brigade were for a time at Decherd and Winchester, which is close by. A short time after we reached Decherd the First and Second Brigades were sent to Pelham, 16 miles southeast, I think, of Decherd. General McCook was, if I recollect rightly, at Stevenson or near there. General Wood's division and the division commanded by General Ammen were sent to McMinnville. I do not know what troops there were between this place and Decherd. I do not recollect the particular locality of any of the rest of the command.

Question. When did the interruption occur in the communications of the army during the time the troops were occupying these positions?

I think the principal interruption was at the tunnel some 7 or 8 miles beyond Galatin. There were some other slight interruptions. I do not now recollect the exact point.

Question. Were they south of Nashville or north?

They were north.

Question. What force do you think would have been necessary to keep open the communications of the army between Nashville and Louisville?

I cannot tell what force it would take; at some points it would take a considerable force, at other points a less force.

Question. Do you know, or did you know, the object of the concentration of the troops on the line from McMinnville to Decherd?

I supposed the object was to meet the enemy, as I at first understood they were coming in that direction, but afterward satisfied myself that the enemy was rapidly making its way toward Kentucky, and so informed General Buell.

Question. When did you first become convinced that Bragg was marching for Kentucky, and not for Nashville, Tenn.?

I became thoroughly convinced while I was at Decherd, though I was fully of the opinion that that was his purpose while I was stationed at Tusculum, Ala., and so expressed it to officers of the army and by letter to my friends in Kentucky.

Question. On what was that opinion based?

It was based on information received from reliable persons who were conversant with the movements of the rebel army, and who told me they had conversed with citizens and with officers of the rebel army.

Question. Did that opinion have reference to the movements of the army under General Bragg or to those of the army under Kirby Smith?

It had reference to the movements of the army under General Bragg. When I became thoroughly satisfied that Bragg was moving toward Kentucky, Kirby Smith was already there with his army.

Question. What time?

I cannot specify the day of the month, but it was some time in the month of August.

Question. It was after the time, however, when you were first satisfied that an invasion of Kentucky would be made?

Yes, sir; it was.

Question. Was this opinion of such a character as to admit of no doubt?

I thought so, sir, and it turned out correct.

Question. Was it equally convincing to others as to yourself?

I believed it was universally believed that Bragg was moving toward Kentucky with the view of invading it.

Question. Did you believe that he had no intermediate object in the movement, particularly the capture of Nashville?

That idea was held out by some, and it may have been his purpose to have attacked Nashville; but from the direction in which his army went I did not believe myself that he contemplated any attack upon Nashville, knowing that he could do our army here as much injury by getting in its rear as he could by taking Nashville, and if his object in going to Kentucky would have been secured he would have gained more than by taking Nashville.

Question. In what way could he have derived advantage from getting into the rear of the Army of the Ohio in Kentucky?

He would have cut them off entirely from all supplies, and have had more and better opportunities of securing Kentucky to the rebel cause.

Question. Did you in your mind trace the route he would pursue in this invasion?

I traced it from information I received from others as to the direction in which he was going.

Question. I mean before the route was actually known by his own movements.

I cannot say that I traced it exactly, and had to be governed by information received from others as to the route he intended to take, but knew that there were routes by which he could very safely pass into Kentucky.

Question. What course would you have adopted in order to thwart him; and I ask, first, did you at the time form any definite plan with reference to it?

I thought we ought, under all the circumstances, to have attacked him at some point before he reached the Cumberland River, but not knowing well the geography of the country did not select any particular spot myself at which he ought to have been attacked. I gathered from well-informed officers that Sparta—I think that was the place—was the point at which he might easily have been attacked and driven back.

Question. From what officers did you get this information?

My impression now is that General Thomas gave it as his opinion that that was the point at which he might have been successfully attacked, though I would not say certainly that this was the point, but some point was designated.

Question. When was that opinion expressed?

I do not know that I heard General Thomas express it prior to the time of General Bragg's passing the point, but I understand that he had some time previously given it as his opinion and had urged the necessity of it.

Question. When did you hear that he had expressed that opinion?

I cannot specify the exact time, sir; I did not keep a memorandum of it; but it was while the army was at Louisville, I think.

Question. Do you know where the army of Bragg was when that advice was given?

I do not know exactly where General Bragg's army was, but I understood the opinion was expressed while General Thomas was at McMinnville. General Bragg's army was constantly moving in the direction of Kentucky, as I understood.

Question. Was the impression made on your mind that when this advice was given Bragg was actually in a position to be attacked at Sparta?

It was that Bragg was moving in that direction, and that there was an eligible point to concentrate our forces and prevent his passage into Kentucky.

Question. Are you well enough acquainted with the country to say now that Bragg could not have pursued any other route?

I suppose there are other routes he might have followed, but it would have thrown him, in my opinion, a great deal out of his way. His army would, in my opinion, have been checked.

Question. What routes do you think of now?

I do not know that I can exactly specify the route he might have followed, unless he had taken some other route higher up the Cumberland River and entered Kentucky somewhere near Birchville; that is, I understand there is a road in that direction through which he could have gone.

Question. Do you think that Bragg would have attacked your army in position?

I think it is very doubtful, sir.

Question. How strong a force would it have required to attack him in position?

It would have depended entirely upon whether he was fortified or not. If not fortified, I think we would have had force enough to have attacked him anywhere almost. He was not fortified anywhere on the road, as I understood.

Question. Do you not recognize that there are natural positions, particularly in mountainous regions, which have many, if not all, the advantages of artificial works?

Yes, sir; there are strong positions in the mountains and on rivers where there are bluffs through which the enemy would not venture to go; but, as I understood the region of country around the direction in which Bragg's army was at the time, we would have had as great an advantage as the enemy if we had pushed on and taken a position equally as good as we had at Murfreesborough, where our army was concentrated, as I understood, for the express purpose of meeting the enemy.

Question. Do you mean that the enemy could not have taken a position at Sparta which would not have given him greatly the advantage, numbers being equal?

I do not pretend to say so, if he had gotten there before we did.

Question. Suppose you had got there first and taken a position too strong for him to attack, could not he have changed his route and avoided you?

I have already stated that he might.

Question. In your plan for meeting the enemy at Sparta or thereabouts what force did you suppose he would have and what force did you suppose yourself to have?

My information was that the enemy had 36,000 men. I did not see the reports of our army, but understood we had nearly 50,000 men. I think that would have been sufficient to have met him.

Question. Suppose you could have interposed but 24,000, would you have thought it judicious to interpose yourself in that position when you could have increased the force by taking a position nearer your base?

I do not think so, unless the position taken was of such a strength as to have given us the advantage.

Question. Do you not think that in opposing yourself to an enemy that might choose his route, that might attack you or avoid at his option, it would be necessary for you to have a sufficient force to act on the offensive in order certainly to defeat his purpose?

It might be necessary and it might not; I cannot say. It is a very general sort of a question, and I do not suppose any man can answer it entirely satisfactorily.

Question. If an enemy may pursue various routes you can only put yourself on the defensive with reference to one of them; since while you are preparing yourself on one he may suddenly take advantage of the other and deprive you of the benefit of the position and thus compel you to attack him or let him alone. Perhaps you can answer the question with that explanation more definitely.

If he failed to attack me and I became satisfied that an attack on me would be disastrous I would let him pass. If I felt satisfied that I had an equal chance of securing a victory I should most unquestionably pursue him and attack him wherever I could catch him.

Question. Do you not think that under such circumstances, in order to defeat the purpose of your enemy, you ought to have a sufficient force to assume the offensive; that is, to pursue and attack him wherever you find him, notwithstanding some advantage of position he may have?

Of course it would be necessary to pursue him if you wished to attack him. It would not be advisable to attack 20,000 with 5,000 or 40,000 with 10,000.

Question. Would it always be advisable to attack 10,000 with 10,000 or 10,000 with 15,000?

Not always, sir. There are many instances in which it would be advisable and many in which it would not be advisable. I do not know, however, that this was an instance in which it would not be advisable.

Question. Has your condemnation of the campaign in Tennessee last summer been based on the supposition that we had an army of 50,000, or nearly that, which could be brought to bear upon any point, which could have been opposed to Bragg's army as it passed through the State?

I so understood it, sir; that when our army was concentrated—I mean that army with which General Buell left Corinth—we had something near 50,000 men, and perhaps more.

Question. Can you not see why Murfreesborough might have had some advantage over a more remote point for concentration and battle, supposing the enemy wished to advance upon you? Did the fact of its being nearer your base give it any advantage?

I had very little opportunity of examining the ground, and cannot say certainly that the advantages of Murfreesborough were greatly superior to those of other points. I had no objection to concentrating the forces there, under the idea that Bragg was moving on that point. I thought we could fight there as well as anywhere else in an open field fight. There was one advantage I might mention: it was a rich country, and we could supply our army better there than we could perhaps beyond there. There might also be an advantage in being nearer Nashville.

Question. How does the condition of Middle Tennessee compare now, general, with what it was in July or August in regard to supplies?

When our army reached here last fall I suppose, so far as forage was concerned, it was better than when we left here early in September. As to provisions for an army and for feeding the men I suppose it is not so good now as then, both armies having drawn supplies to a certain extent from Middle Tennessee. The last year's crop added some supplies to a country previously pretty well exhausted. In other portions, however, through which I passed there was a large amount of supplies prior to the coming in of the present year's crop.

Question. Has the crop of last summer increased that supply or not, do you think?

I suppose it did increase it; but in some localities the supply must now be as low as it was prior to the coming in of the last year's crop by being drawn upon by both armies.

Question. Was the crop of last year really available when we left here?

We made it so; we used it very freely.

Question. Had not the crop of 1861 been drawn upon by both armies and to a greater extent than the crop of this year is now?

In some localities I suppose it was; in other localities it was not. In the immediate vicinity of Nashville, Murfreesborough, and Gallatin I suppose the crop for this year (1862) has been well-nigh exhausted; whereas the crop of 1861, in a very large region of country in Middle Tennessee, when I passed through that country, was scarcely touched, except now and then by a brigade passing along the road. The crops in the southern part of Middle Tennessee this year were very fine, at least corn. The rebels may since that time have taken all the forage in that region of country.

Question. What crop were we fed from last summer; the crop of 1861 or 1862? The crop of 1862 is the one just gathered.

In some places we were obliged to forage upon the crops of 1862, owing to the scarcity of the crop of 1861. In many places, however, we found the greatest abundance of corn, and sometimes hay, sometimes oats, of the crop of 1861.

Question. Suppose the Army of the Cumberland to be cut off from Louisville now, would it or would it not be in a condition to assume offensive operations?

It would not be in a position to assume offensive operations, as I understand it; not for the want of supplies and provisions for the men, but for the lack of forage.

Question. You mean that the supply of provisions for the men—for the army—is greater than the supply of forage?

I understand so, sir; for they have to forage upon the country here and have to fight for a great deal they get.

Question. Suppose the communication with Louisville to be effectually severed and that this army was opposed by one which could fight it or not at its option, how long could it stay here, supposing it to have on hand now supplies for ten days?

If we were compelled to fight the enemy and were overcome its stay would be but short; if, however, it succeeded in driving the enemy back and scattering its forces, it might be able to stay some time; I cannot say how long.

Question. Suppose the enemy did not give it battle but simply hovered about to prevent it from foraging?

If the communication between this and Louisville was effectually cut off I should think that our army here would be most effectually ruined, unless they had provisions enough on hand to take them to a point where they could secure supplies from the westward or elsewhere.

Question. Besides the necessity which existed last summer for foraging on the country to some extent, do you think there was a prevalent tendency among the troops to plunder and maraud upon the community through which they passed?

Yes, sir; I do.

Question. Was that due to the neglect of the officers, do you think, general?

I cannot say that it was due to the neglect of the officers altogether; there might have been some instances, and no doubt there were, in which it was due to the neglect of officers; but there seemed to be, outside of the necessity of foraging and seizing food from the country, a disposition on the part of the men to pillage, arising, I think, out of the fact that they were not allowed to strike a blow at some point upon the enemy. I heard this among the men themselves, and used as much influence and power as I possessed to prevent these depredations from being committed.

Question. Would you believe in the honor and courage of a man who pretended that he pillaged his unarmed friend because he had not an opportunity to fight a manly and armed foe?

There are some instances in which I would have great confidence in men who would even be guilty of pilfering under such circumstances as those; but, generally speaking, men who are disposed to pilfer, and who pilfer under any and all circumstances, are not to be relied upon. Men, however, in an army act very differently from what they do under ordinary circumstances, when at home, under the influences of peace. I believe there is such a thing as making men who are generally considered honest and upright at home thieves in an army, and I think this can be done by inefficiency and neglect on the part of officers. I have twice in my life been connected with the Army of the United States, and I have found this rule to prevail in both instances.

Question. When did this disposition to pilfer first evince itself?

This general system of pilfering was more clearly evinced after we left Decherd to march to Pelham in the month of August.

Question. Do you not think that this disposition was in fact due to the encouragement which it had received from the popular sentiment through the country and the idea of carrying on a war of vengeance instead of one for the preservation of the Union?

I do not think it was, sir. That may have had something to do with it with some.

Question. You have stated in your direct testimony that Bragg was moving into Kentucky with the purpose of forming a junction with Kirby Smith at Harrodsburg. Was it probable that after forming that junction he would suddenly determine to abandon his purpose in Kentucky without a decisive battle?

My opinion is that Bragg and Smith had a double object in view in invading Kentucky. One was to provide their army with such provisions and clothing as they could take from the citizens there; another was, if it was in their power, to hold Kentucky by power of arms and make it part and parcel of the Southern Confederacy. They gathered together all the provisions and clothing they could find in that portion of the State through which they passed, but finding that they were unable to hold the State against the army that was pursuing them they determined to evacuate it.

Question. When do you think that determination was formed?

My opinion is it was formed after the battle of Perryville, if the statements of the people of Kentucky are to be relied on at all.

Question. Was there anything at the time to indicate that the battle of Perryville had been of a decisive character or of such a character as to determine the result of an important campaign?

I think they became satisfied that if our whole force had moved upon them at Perryville they would have been very badly beaten and were afraid to venture another battle.

Question. Is your opinion based upon the assumption that Bragg's army and Kirby Smith's—the whole rebel force in Kentucky—were concentrated at Perryville?

Not entirely. I understood that Kirby Smith, with a portion of his army, would form a junction with Bragg at Perryville; whether true or not I am not able to say; but I believe, whether they formed it there or not, they did afterward unite their arms somewhere between that point and Lancaster.

Question. Was there anything to prevent that junction from being formed at Perryville?

Nothing, sir, that I know of; and I think it was partly accomplished.

Question. Suppose it proved that it was not accomplished at Perryville and that the enemy deliberately planned to form a junction at Harrodsburg, would that indicate an intention to retreat from the State without another battle?

I do not think that would indicate an intention to retreat from the State without a battle, but I think they were satisfied that they were not able to cope with our army, and that if our army had been hurled upon them at Perryville they would either have been captured or scattered to the winds. That determined the abandonment of the main object of the invasion of the State by the rebel army.

Question. Was there anything in the movements of the enemy immediately after the battle to indicate that he intended to retreat from the State?

Their leaving their position which they held there at Perryville and moving toward Harrodsburg indicated to some extent to my mind a determination to leave the State.

Question. Why should they have moved toward Harrodsburg, supposing them to be concentrated at Perryville?

Some of them moved toward Danville, as I understand; some toward Harrodsburg; and I suppose their object was to concentrate their forces and get them together, if possible, at Camp Dick Robinson, and move them off from there with all the provisions they had collected together. They moved in different directions to expedite their retreat as much as possible.

Question. What portion moved by Danville?

I cannot say; I only learned that some of them did.

Question. Are you satisfied that any portion of the army marched that way?

I have the same evidence for that which I have for the other; that is, from citizens.

Question. Were they cavalry or infantry?

I cannot say for certain which.

Question. Would your opinion of their plans be affected by the question whether a portion of them actually moved off by Danville or whether they formed a junction with the whole force at Harrodsburg; is that a matter which would be likely to affect your opinion of their plans?

My opinion was that at the time they left Perryville, whatever direction they went, their intention was to leave the State, and it so turned out.

Question. Do you not think that opinion is rather confirmed by the result than founded in reason at the time?

I think there were good reasons for it. One is that if they had felt satisfied of being enabled to drive us back and hold a position which they did hold at Perryville they would never have left it, for there is no point between Louisville and the farthest point to which our army went beyond Perryville at which they could have successfully met us. Perryville was the point, and I learn that General Bragg so expressed himself.

Question. Do you know of their having selected a battle ground at Harrodsburg?

I heard such a thing, but the fact of their abandonment shows very conclusively to my mind that they did not consider the place tenable against an army.

Question. Which army suffered most in the battle of Perryville do you think?

From the best information I could get and from an examination of the matter the suffering was almost equal.

Question. Have you ever heard the enemy's loss estimated at 4,000 and upward in that fight?

I have seen it stated that it is about equal to ours. I heard various rumors as to the numbers killed, wounded, and missing on both sides, and they all seemed to corroborate the statement that the sufferings of the two armies were about equal.

Question. Do you know when the rebel army commenced their retreat from Camp Dick Robinson?

Not exactly, save from what citizens told us. They were leaving there for some two or three days. From accounts I received I understood they commenced leaving there about the 10th or 11th of October.

Question. How far was our army, or a large portion of it, from Danville on the 10th of October?

I think I left Perryville on the 10th. I cannot tell how far the army was away, as I was not with it.

Question. How far is the spring which bears your name from Danville?

It is estimated at 5 miles by the pike.

Question. What extent of ground, in miles, would the army we had at Perryville occupy?

Judging from what I was told by those who were on the extreme right and left of our army and my knowledge of the ground it must have extended over the space of 8 to 10 miles; perhaps farther. I speak of the ground over which the enemy would have extended on the day of the battle.

Question. What extent of ground would necessarily have been required for it in camp?

If the ground were level the army could be encamped, I suppose, in a space of half that length. If the ground were rough and uneven it would have occupied more space.

Question. Suppose it had been known that the enemy had designed to retreat by the way of Crab Orchard and that before he could do that our army was placed across his route, what course could he have pursued?

He might possibly have pursued the course of Kentucky River Bridge. I do not know of any other way he could have got out of Camp Dick Robinson. I stated this morning that there was only one way to get out of Camp Dick Robinson, and that way was left open. He could, as I have stated, have succeeded in getting across the Kentucky River Bridge, unless pursued too hotly.

Commission adjourned to meet December 23, 1862, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, Tuesday Morning, December 23, 1862.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General FRY's cross-examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Who were the principal movers in the meeting which had for its object to prepare a petition for the removal of General Buell from the command of the Army of the Ohio?

I believe I have said on that subject all that is proper to say.

The court was here cleared.

I cannot say who first moved in it. I gave yesterday the names of some of the principal parties concerned, and that is as far as I know.

Question. Was the object of that meeting made the subject of discussion by officers within your knowledge?

I have heard the matter discussed by those whom I have mentioned and others.

Question. Were these discussions attended by a knowledge of the facts which affect the question and had these discussions for their object to arrive at a correct understanding of it, or did they merely consist in expressions of dissatisfaction?

I do not know what knowledge they had of the facts affecting the question. There were expressions of dissatisfaction, based on the idea that the Army of the Ohio was not properly managed.

Question. Were these discussions in public or in private?

In one sense they might be called public and in another sense private.

Question. Were they in the presence and hearing of subordinate officers and soldiers?

I have in some instances heard expressions of dissatisfaction in the presence of subordinate officers and soldiers, and I have heard expressions of dissatisfaction among the soldiers, without having any reference to anything said by officers.

Question. Were these murmurings concurred in or discountenanced by officers senior to those who signed the petition?

I think that they were generally discountenanced.

Question. I put a question to you yesterday in regard to the causes of the demoralization of the troops in a form which did not express my meaning nor the idea which I wish to present to you. I now ask whether the disposition to plunder and pillage on the part of the troops was not encouraged by the popular idea, which at that time was heralded through the country, of living upon the enemy, as it is called, and regarding that as constituting a vigorous prosecution of the war?

I cannot say that I have heard that officers endeavored to advance the idea that it was proper on the part of a soldier to plunder and pillage; on the contrary, nearly all with whom I had anything to do seemed to discountenance it.

Redirect examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You have said in response to questions asked by the Commission that a general commanding is answerable to his subordinates as he is to the people. Am I to understand from this that he is to be controlled or directed by his subordinates or that by consulting them he can in any case escape the responsibility imposed upon him by his position?

Not at all.

Question. Do you know whether these propositions to remove officers by subordinates have been common in our army or not?

I understand it has, sir. I know of only one instance personally; that was in the case of T. W. Sherman, when he commanded the First Division. A large number of officers waited upon General Buell and requested him in person to have us transferred to his army and to aid us in getting General Sherman removed from the command of the division, and my impression now is that General Buell told us the proper way to come at the matter was by a written petition in respectful terms. We afterward, on the same day, waited upon General Halleck, and he gave us clearly to understand that General Sherman should be removed; that he knew our troubles and difficulties, and that he would remedy them as soon as possible, having for some days had the matter under consideration. General Sherman was in a short time relieved from the command.

Question. You have been asked, general, what confidence you would have in the honor and courage of a man who pretended that he pillaged his unarmed friends because he had not an opportunity to fight a manly and armed foe. How would your confidence in that soldier be affected by the fact of marching through a country where the inhabitants were hostile and the entire army subject to continued insult and abuse from the inhabitants?

My confidence in a soldier who was constantly insulted by the inhabitants of the country through which we were marching and who would commit depredations upon such citizens would not be greatly impaired. Although I discountenance pillage under any plea, I believe it is common with the best armies in the world.

Question. Do you not know that it is quite common in this war for the inhabitants of the country to be in arms against the forces of the United States as this force approached and then return to their usual avocations as farmers as the army goes through?

Yes, sir; I believe it has been very common.

Question. What has been the effect upon our army, so far as demoralizing it is concerned, by giving protection and guards to rebel property?

It has been, in my opinion, somewhat deleterious; I might say considerably so.

Question. Has not the jealous care of rebel property impressed upon our forces that our generals were really sympathizing with that side?

I think it has to a considerable extent, sir.

Question. You have been asked in reference to the lines of supplies. Do you know up to what time the trains were run upon the railroad between Bowling Green and Louisville?

I think they were running to within a short time before we reached Bowling Green, or about the time we reached there, in September.

Question. Do you recollect what interruption there was upon that line between Bowling Green and Nashville?

The tunnel was blown up; one bridge between the tunnel and Gallatin was destroyed; there were also some bridges destroyed between Gallatin and Nashville after we were on our return to Tennessee.

Question. Are you acquainted personally with the country about that tunnel that was destroyed?

I have only passed through it once and am not very well acquainted with it, but I know that it is quite a rough, hilly country.

By General DANA:

Question. Did you know or hear, at the time when General Buell was in command of the Army of the Ohio, of any proposition or attempt on the part of officers of his command, other than that already testified to, to depose him from the command and put General Thomas in his place?

I know of no attempt being made to place General Thomas in command. I have heard there was an attempt, but know nothing of the truth of it.

Question. Where and at what time did you hear that this proposition was made?

I heard it at Louisville, when we were marching back from Tennessee through Kentucky.

Question. Do you remember how you got this information?

From rumor, sir.

By General TYLER :

Question. General, I understand that you were born in the neighborhood where the battle of Perryville was fought and that you are acquainted with that section of country thoroughly. Suppose a vigorous advance had been made early on the morning of the 9th by General Buell's army upon General Bragg's force, would not obstacles of Dick's River render it almost impossible for Bragg to pass it under the circumstances?

I was born in that region of country and am pretty well acquainted with it. I cannot say that it would have been altogether prudent in the early part of the action to have made a vigorous attack upon General Bragg, as I understood that General Crittenden's corps had not yet gotten into position. After General Crittenden had gotten into position my opinion is that a vigorous attack ought to have been made and would have resulted in the route of Bragg's army; and that in the event of its being routed it would have been almost impossible for him to have succeeded in crossing Dick's River at the point at which I understood he had crossed. It is a rough, broken, bluff country, and my impression is that the passage across the river at that point at which he crossed is very narrow. I mean if the victory had been followed up rapidly.

Question. At what time, general, was General Crittenden's division [corps] in position?

I think I heard General Crittenden himself say that he was in position somewhere in the middle of the day; between 10 and 12 o'clock on the day of the battle.

By General ORD :

Question. General, you stated that the divisions of General Gilbert's corps, as far as you know, were not mismanaged at the battle of Perryville; do you know whether the divisions of Crittenden's corps were mismanaged?

I remarked that the divisions of Generals Sheridan and Mitchell, of General Gilbert's corps, so far as I know or observed, were well managed. The First Division I thought was very badly managed, from the fact that it was kept lying still during the greater part of the day and while the heaviest portion of the fight was going on. I cannot say, for I do not know, whether General Crittenden's corps was badly managed or not. I understood that when that corps was in position General Thomas and General Crittenden were both very anxious to advance and engage the enemy, and they seemed to be satisfied with the position of that corps. General Crittenden expressed himself in my presence as being highly delighted with the position of his corps, and said that all he desired at that time was to be allowed to advance upon the enemy.

Question. What position did your division occupy in the corps relative to the corps of General McCook; about how far from it and in what direction?

During the greater part of the day my division was lying within a short distance of and in front of General Buell's headquarters, and I suppose it must have been 2 miles to the rear and to the right of General McCook's corps. I understand that in the evening General Steedman's brigade was ordered to the support of General McCook, but learned that it was not allowed to go into action. This I heard from General Steedman himself. I understood from General Steedman that the battery connected with his brigade fired a few rounds.

Question. Do you know anything about the position of the enemy in front of General McCook's corps?

I know the ground pretty well, and from what I learned they occupied a pretty strong position, where they had the advantage in the ground.

Recross-examination by General BUELL :

Question. When the officers of the First Division called upon General Buell at Corinth was he their commander or in a position with reference to them that would have justified him in admonishing or rebuking them?

He was not the commander of the First Division; it was not in his corps; but I suppose, being a superior officer, he would have the right, if we were guilty of any violation of military etiquette, to admonish or rebuke us.

Question. Was not the visit rather a social and complimentary one, though having for its object that which the witness has stated?

The visit was not intended merely as a social visit; it might be in one sense a complimentary one. We went to General Buell believing that he would give us such aid and such advice in the premises as were necessary, and he gave us the advice, according to my recollection, stated in a previous answer.

Question. Did he not decline to apply for a transfer of the division to his command, while at the same time expressing himself much gratified that they should desire to return to it?

He did decline to use his influence to have us transferred to his command, but gave us all the advice we wanted in regard to the particular object of our visit.

Question. Did he not advise you delicately, but as pointedly as would be becoming under the circumstances, that as far as your proceeding had for its object the removal of your commander it was improper; that the same course might with equal propriety be pursued by your subordinates in reference to any and all of you; and in parting with you personally did he not say to you that he would be very much gratified to have you back again, but that you must not, as he expressed himself pleasantly, be insubordinate?

He did express a desire to have us back in his command, and warned us not to be insubordinate, and told us that our manner of proceeding, he thought, was a little improper, and that subordinate officers might act in the same way toward us; but, as I have before stated, advised us as to the proper mode of getting our removal. We assured General Buell that there was no disposition on the part of any of us to be at all insubordinate; that what we did or what we should do in the premises should be done in the most respectful and officerlike manner.

Question. Have you ever of your own accord given protection to the property of citizens in the vicinity of your command and without troubling yourself about inquiring as to whether they were loyal or disloyal?

I have scarcely ever been called upon by citizens for protection until my arrival at Gallatin. I there, under the direction of General Thomas, gave protection to citizens, both loyal and disloyal; but in most instances it was done when we had taken from them all the forage and such other articles as were necessary for us, leaving only enough for the support of the family and stock during the winter. In some few instances I may have given protection when the parties had been foraged upon to the extent authorized.

Question. Will you please state, general, who they were who proposed to depose General Buell from his command and from whom you acquired the information in regard to such a purpose?

I do not know who they were, sir; I had nothing to do with it.

Question. Can you not remember the names of those who mentioned it to you?

No, sir.

Question. Whom did General Steedman complain of as having prevented him from going into action on the evening of the 8th, after he was detached from his division?

I do not recollect that he named any particular person.

Question. In your answer to the question by the judge-advocate did you mean to convey the idea that General Thomas and General Critenden complained during the day that they were not permitted to engage the enemy?

I do not know that they complained during the day, for I was not with them; but I thought from General Crittenden's conversation that he felt a little aggrieved because he was not allowed to engage the enemy, though he did not say so in so many words. I heard General Thomas say that it was very late when he heard the fight was going on, and wondered why he had not been informed of it. He heard the artillery, and my impression now is that he said that upon inquiring as to what it meant the reply came that Colonel Gay was amusing himself with the rebel cavalry.

The judge-advocate proposes, in view of the movement of the Army of the Cumberland, to arrest for the present the case of the Government, reserving to himself the right hereafter to introduce further evidence, for the purpose of summoning the witnesses General Buell wishes to have examined.

Col. G. D. WAGNER (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State, if you please, your name and position in the United States service.

G. D. Wagner; colonel of the Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers.

Question. State whether you were at the battle of Perryville; whether you took any part in that fight, and what you saw of the enemy on the night of the 8th, and what you know of his subsequent movements on the morning of the 9th.

I was at the battle of Perryville and took part in that fight. On the night of the 8th I saw very little of the enemy except his fires, or moving of troops except stragglers and unorganized bodies around the fires. These were on the left—about a mile in the left and half a mile to the front—till about daylight or a little before. Some time before daylight I heard considerable moving of wheels, which I supposed to be artillery. It was retiring. I did not see any troops at the time, but at break of day I rode some distance to the front of my command, gained an eminence from which I could look into the town of Perryville, and saw the enemy, as I thought, retiring by the Danville road. This was so early that I could just see a black line, but could not tell whether it was infantry or cavalry. When it became a little lighter I heard this column passing up the creek toward the right of our army, and the thought struck me that they were changing position of their forces from the left of Perryville to the right of our army—about an hour and a half after sunup—a body of cavalry—I should think a thousand—from the front on the right of our army. These I supposed to be the troops I saw going in that direction early in the morning. When I became convinced that they were retiring I immediately ordered forward my brigade and Cox's battery and commenced shelling them. Colonel Carlin, who was at my right, also advanced. Colonel Connor, [?] commanding a brigade of the division belonging to General Gilbert's corps, made a similar advance. The skirmishers of my command entered the town and took possession of it, capturing a few prisoners. They entered the town about sunup, or it might have been half an hour later. It was as quick as it could be done after daylight. I made another small advance to gain a better position for the battery; another body of rebel troops then appeared coming out of the woods to the left of the town near the springs, with the evident intention of gaining the Danville road, by which they retired. There were scattering troops seen in front, but after a few minutes there was no body of troops in sight. This was after shelling the first column. These troops marched down the road, and we had our battery in such a position as to enfilade the road. The enemy had two guns, which were put in position just at daylight back of the town, and they remained there till the last troops came. Captain Cox's battery again opened upon this body of troops and scattered them. A portion of the troops went up the road very orderly.

Immediately after these troops passed the cavalry I have referred to retired from the right of the army in the range of my guns, and I ordered my battery to open upon them, but two or three colonels and officers standing by insisted that they were our cavalry advancing. They came out cautiously from the wood and formed in line, but did not act like an enemy advancing, so we did not open fire on them. I think that cavalry was the body of troops going, as I supposed, toward the right in the morning just at daybreak, as when they passed half a mile from the town to the right there was some timber which obscured them from view, and I could not see their position until they again retired across the open space of ground over which they had to pass.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Colonel WAGNER's examination continued.

Cross-examination by General BUELL :

Question. Do you know any reason why you were not ordered to attack the enemy when he was so near you, or could any other attack have been judiciously made than that which you made without the concurrent action of other troops ?

The reason that I did not advance farther that morning into the town and beyond it and undertake to cut off those troops that were retreating was because I was then much farther advanced than I was ordered to go. I had gone about as far as I thought I dared go without being ordered. After I had at dark ordered the troops to lay upon their arms, not even allowing them to go for water, a staff officer of General Gilbert came to me, with the request that I would advance up to the edge or into the town with my brigade. Colonel Carlin was at the edge of the town, and did not think it safe to remain in that position without support. I declined to do so, saying that he could get support from the rear from General Wood or General Crittenden to protect the right. This was for the reason that I was informed during the day that there was a large force in front of General Crittenden's main body, which, if I had advanced to that position, would have left them in my rear. I went with the aide-de-camp back to General Wood's headquarters, reporting the position of affairs in front, and joined with him in asking for support so as to enable us to hold the town during the night. General Wood sent one of his officers with the aide of General Gilbert to General Crittenden. I returned to my command. We received no further orders. Colonel Carlin took position on my left. When I went to the rear at this time I heard from officers a confirmation of the report referred to, that there was a large force in front of General Smith's division, on the extreme right of the army. This information, it is but just to say, was said to be reported by General Smith.

Redirect examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. At what time did you arrive on the battle ground on the afternoon of the 8th ?

I arrived in the rear line about half past two, as near as I can remember.

Question. How did this arrival of yours place Crittenden's corps on the battle ground at that time ?

His forces were upon either side of the pike leading from Perryville to Lebanon, or about 2 miles from Perryville.

Question. How was that position in reference to that held by General McCook ?

I do not know what General McCook's position was. I know only the position of General Gilbert.

Question. How was it in reference to General Gilbert ?

My orders were on arriving in the rear of the line to form in line of battle on the left of General Van Cleve, who was the left of General Crittenden's line, prolonging the line in the direction of General Gilbert's right; therefore the general direction of these two lines was parallel to each other or nearly so.

Question. What was done for the next two or three hours after your arrival upon the battle-field ?

Before I had quite formed my brigade in line of battle General Wood gave me an order to march immediately to the support of General Sheridan's right, which he said was being turned; this I immediately did. That was about half a mile directly to my left. On arriving within 600 yards of General Sheridan's forces I came in contact with a brigade of the enemy advancing upon General Sheridan's right, which I immediately attacked; but the mere appearance of my force upon their flank caused them immediately to about-face and retire, we advancing and they retiring until night.

Question. Can you say, colonel, from your knowledge of the ground, how far you were in the afternoon from General McCook's corps?

I could see the troops that were engaged with him off to our left; I should think it was about a mile; but I never rode over the ground, and it is only by looking from one point to another that I form this judgment.

Question. What did the movement of troops and firing that afternoon indicate to you?

Very little, if anything, of a fight, and it was remarkable and perfectly astounding to me and many other officers when we heard that there had been a great fight and there was heard so little firing; that was a common remark of the officers. Four miles before I arrived in the rear of the line of battle General Wood ordered me forward as fast as possible; to leave all transportation. He said it was reported that a fight was going on. He and I rode up the road till we got within 2 miles of Perryville, he frequently remarking, "How is it possible that there is a fight going on when we can scarcely hear firing at all?"

Question. How was that firing after you arrived there?

After I arrived in line for some time my own firing drowned that of everything else. I have no distinct recollection about the firing after that. But when I was within a mile of General Gilbert's corps I scarcely heard any firing worth talking about. I thought there was a skirmishing going on, but did not think there was a battle raging.

Question. About what time of day was it that General Wood ordered you hurriedly forward?

It was about 1 o'clock.

Question. Was the information you obtained given to your superior officers?

I made my report from time to time to General Wood, my division commander. All the time from daylight or soon after daylight there was quite a dust upon the Harrodsburg road, the road leading from Perryville to Harrodsburg, as though there was a movement of troops taking place. The road was hidden from view by timber. I supposed this to be the retiring of troops.

Question. How late in the day did you observe this, colonel?

That was about two hours after daylight. It went on at the same time that the movement took place on the Danville road, and continued, I should say, till about 8 o'clock.

Question. You say you were not engaged in the contest that day but slightly?

My brigade was engaged in Wood's division the first day.

Recross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Do you know what time the corps to which you belonged advanced that morning?

I think the command began to move at about 7 and left about 9. Two divisions preceded me; two brigades followed me. This refers to the march from camp on the morning of the 8th.

Question. Do you know at what time your corps advanced toward the position of the enemy on the morning of the 9th?

I do not know the exact time, but can tell pretty nearly from certain facts. At about 9 to 9.30 o'clock, my brigade being at that time near the town of Perryville, with no enemy in view, I received an order to report to the rear of General Crittenden's corps. The explanation was that General Crittenden was going to advance upon the town of Perryville with his corps. General Wood's division, of which my brigade was a part, was to form a reserve in that advance. I pointed down to the town and told the aide-de-camp who brought the order that I had had possession of it from about sunup, and that there had not been a rebel near it, at least in sight, for an hour, and the last I saw of the enemy's cavalry they were retiring from the front of General Smith. At that time they were entirely out of sight, and I could see from the town in the direction of their retiring at least a mile.

Question. Did you report this information, and was any change made in the disposition of your brigade in consequence of it?

I can only state that from the information of others. I remarked to the aide-de-camp that he should go and inform the general of the fact, and that I could not consent to march my troops 2 miles to the rear and back again for nothing, as I supposed from the order it was known at headquarters that the rebel troops had retired. I retired my brigade some half mile to the rear, where I soon received orders to await further orders before I made any movement. I supposed that order to be the result of the information that I sent back by the aide-de-camp.

Question. Did you understand that these details with reference to the movement of the right corps were directed specially by myself or that they were under the direction of the corps commander, General Thomas?

I certainly supposed, sir, that all our orders came from ——. I had no knowledge as a brigade commander that you specially directed our movements. My intention was to send information to General Thomas and General Crittenden. I knew—at least I heard—that you were not on that portion of the line by one of your own staff.

Col. D. McCook (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Co.onel, will you state to the Commission, if you please, what you know of the operations in front of Perryville on the evening of the 7th and on the 8th? Confine yourself, if you please, to important incidents, so as not to occupy more time than is necessary for yourself and the Commission. Also please state your name and position in the service of the United States.

My name is Daniel McCook, colonel of the Fifty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, at that time commanding the Thirty-sixth Brigade and still commanding it, forming a part of the Tenth Division of the Third Army Corps of the Army of the Ohio. On the night of the 7th of October, 1862, my brigade went into camp within about 4 miles of Perryville, on the Springfield pike. We encamped on the right of the road, three-quarters of a mile from it, in line of battle. The Eighty-fifth Illinois, one of the regiments composing my brigade, was detailed for picket at 2 o'clock that night. I had just got my troops into position when I received an order from Maj. J. M. Wright, one of General Buell's assistant adjutants-general, ordering Major-General Gilbert to throw forward one of his brigades and seize the ground in front of Doctor's Fork, which our corps was depending upon for water, and also to consult Captain Gay as to the position and conformation of the country. This order was properly referred to General Sheridan by General Gilbert, and General Sheridan ordered my brigade to execute the duty. I immediately got on my horse, wakened up my men as quietly as possible, left orders for them to file into the Springfield road and there await further commands, while I went to find Captain Gay. During my meanderings to find Captain Gay I stumbled into General Buell's camp, and asked the sentinel if he could tell me where Captain Gay was. General Buell, I suppose recognizing my voice, requested me to come in. I found Captain Gay, got the information desired from him, put my column in motion for the high ground, which I subsequently learned to be called Peters' Hill. On the advice of General Buell I had dispatched a staff officer to get a battery from General Sheridan. He sent me Captain Barnett's Illinois battery. As soon as I got to the outpost Colonel Greusel pointed to me the enemy's picket line, which was on the crest of Peters' Hill. I formed the Eighty-fifth Illinois on the right of the Springfield pike, the Fifty-second Ohio (my own regiment) on the left of the Springfield pike, throwing forward well to the front and flanks two companies of each regiment as skirmishers. I formed the One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois, another regiment composing my brigade, the right wing on the left side of the road and the left wing on the right side. My skirmishers had scarcely taken intervals, it being a bright moonlight night (between 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning), when the enemy opened upon me with a heavy musketry fire. My skirmishers advanced steadily up the hill on the left of the road, it being open ground; but being wood on the right of the road, the principal force of the enemy was concentrated there, and the Eighty-fifth Illinois made very slow progress. As soon as I discovered that their progress was so slow I ordered my skirmishers to change direction to the right, followed by the battalion, attack the rebels in flank, and drive them from the woods, thereby gaining the crest of Peters' Hill. In carrying this position I lost 6 men killed and 27 wounded. I threw my skirmishers 1,000 yards to the front, far enough to keep my main line from being annoyed, and ordered my men to lay down on the crest of the hill, well covered by it. By this time Barnett's battery had arrived. I put four guns into position on the left of the road, commanding the open country and valley, upon which part of General Rousseau's division subsequently formed; two guns I put off to the right of the road, commanding another open plain stretching off toward Perryville.

By this time it had got daylight. I dispatched staff officers to General Buell and to General Sheridan, informing them that I had carried the position and would await further orders. I hardly had the right section in position when the rebels came down the Springfield road from Perryville with a battery and what seemed to be two brigades of infantry. They put their battery in position on the hill at the back of the Bottom house and began shelling the woods. As soon as I saw them go into position I ordered the right wing of the Eighty-fifth Illinois onto the crest of the hill to the right of the section of the battery, as a support to it, which I had before ordered to the right of the road. I then ordered my men to lay down. The rebels shelled the woods for an hour and a quarter. Supposing from the quietness which I required my men to keep that they had run us out of the woods they deployed in the open ground to attack us. I restrained the impatience of the men till they got within 200 yards of me, and they only waited for one volley, which was delivered by the Eighty-fifth Illinois and the right wing of the One hundred and twenty-fifth Illinois and the section of artillery.

About this time two regiments of rebel cavalry showed themselves on the left of my position on the Mackville road, their infantry pickets being scattered through the field. The cavalry was heading from Perryville out toward Mackville. I opened on that cavalry with the two James guns which I had left on the left of the road and drove it back. About this time I became apprehensive from clouds of dust which I saw on my right hand and dust also which I saw to my extreme left along the bottom of Chaplin Creek that they were turning my position and surrounding me, and sent back to General Sheridan or General Gilbert, I do not remember which, for re-enforcements. General Gilbert came out, preceded a few minutes by General Sheridan, and examined my position, and told me not to advance any farther and that he would go back and report to General Buell. That was about 6 o'clock in the morning. Two brigades of General Sheridan's division were immediately dispatched to my assistance.

About this time there seemed to be a lull in the firing; occasionally a sharpshooter would annoy the line; my skirmishers would reply. Immediately on the left of the Springfield road was a grove of timber. Buckner came up with two brigades, slipping along the dry bed of Doctor's Fork, and got into those woods about 250 yards in my front. As soon as this was discovered the Second Missouri, supported by the Forty-fourth Illinois, with a section of artillery, was ordered to dislodge them. A few minutes before Captain Gay came out with his cavalry. He desired me to throw forward my skirmishers and clear the wood, which I declined to do. He then reported to General Gilbert, from whom I received a note telling me to hold my position—not to advance. This was between 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning. Captain Gay started his cavalry into the woods, and they came back very rapidly; then he dismounted a portion of his command, and the Second Missouri and Forty-fourth Illinois, with Gay's cavalry dismounted, drove the rebels from that piece of woods, which movement was hastened by General Fry opportunely ordering forward the Eighty-sixth Illinois Regiment, which was on picket, to charge the left of the piece of woods over the open fields. The Second Missouri followed up their advantage, following the rebels over the open-country clearing beyond Sam. Bottom's house up through his orchard, and seized the line of heights, over which they could see Chaplin River very plainly, being the same line of heights and the same orchard occupied at a later period of the day by eighteen guns of the enemy. By some person's orders this regiment was ordered to fall back to the wood from which we had cleared the rebels. About this time all firing and appearance of the enemy ceased in our front. This happened between 7 and 8 o'clock.

Between 9 and 10 o'clock I received a note from General Gilbert informing me that General McCook was coming up immediately to my left, and that I must not be alarmed at any appearance of forces in that direction. About 10 o'clock I saw the head of Rousseau's column coming up to the Russell house on the Mackville and Perryville road; they went beyond the house a short distance and seemed to be halted there awaiting orders. Between 11 and 12 o'clock the same day General Gilbert, I think, ordered forward Hescoek's battery and Sheridan's division to occupy the same woods from which he had driven General Buckner. We went into those woods and formed a line of battle, our right resting over the Springfield pike. About this time Captain Gay, finding that he could not get down the Springfield road to Perryville, made a detour off to the left, and went down through the open fields to the left of Peters' Hill, and an artillery fire opened. A short time after this the rebels began to make their appearance with their artillery on Bottom's Hill and in the mouth of Doctor's Fork with their masses of infantry. Captain Hescoek, whenever he saw them appear on this hill with their artillery, would open upon them or enfilade their position, and whenever the rebel masses would show themselves in the mouth of this Doctor's Fork he would drive them back. Between 12 and 1 o'clock everything was quiet except these occasional escapades of artillery, happening about every half hour; between 1 and 2 o'clock General Rousseau put Loomis' battery into position, which soon opened, and formed his line of battle, the right of it resting on a barn, which was subsequently burned by the rebel artillery, and his left stretching off obliquely in the direction of Chaplin Fork. His line was a continuation of General Gilbert's line. With the aid of Hescocock, Loomis soon silenced this battery on Bottom's Hill, part of it in Bottom's orchard, and for some time the battle seemed to be over.

About 2 o'clock General Gilbert ordered us to fall back from our position in the woods. General Gilbert's line was separated from General Rousseau's by the rocky and dry bed of what I learned to be Doctor's Fork and about 150 paces distant. About 2 o'clock we were ordered back on this hill, our troops being raw. The regiments fell back individually in good order, but the brigades became so mixed up that I halted mine and would not move a step till the other brigades passed me. We fell back, forming a circular line on Peters' Hill, and with our left flank to the woods above referred to and the original line. I pointed out to General Gilbert the danger of our left flank and requested him to permit me to fill the woods we had just left with skirmishers, which request he granted; and in order to prevent a flank movement, under the cover of the woods I put the Eighty-sixth Illinois behind a picket fence, faced it by the rear rank, and told it to open on any troops it saw coming through the woods. We had scarcely got into this new position when eighteen pieces of the enemy's artillery galloped up to Bottom's Hill and opened on General Rousseau's right. This position had been enfiladed, and no doubt by Captain Hescocock's battery. Two brigades of rebels formed in front of the new line of General Sheridan and attacked us. They came within 100 yards of our batteries, when the whole line charged bayonets on them and they ran. Our whole division was laying there, about four regiments deep, not covering more than a brigade and a half in front. The rebels reformed under the crest of the hill and attacked us again. By this time some troops on our right attacked them in flank and they fell back and left us; this was about 3 o'clock. The two attacks of battle lasted an hour.

After we drove them off the excitement which attends such little affairs as this subsided. I turned around and saw the barn on General Rousseau's right in flames, and saw the rebels in three lines in line of battle, with two regiments doubled on the center, their left flank coming up Doctor's Fork. They changed direction slightly to the right; these two regiments doubled on the center made a right partial wheel. They were so near I could see the daylight through their ranks with my glass. I saw them envelop and drive back Lytle's right flank. At that time our division, with two batteries, was lying idle. I begged General Sheridan to at least allow us to open on them with artillery, for from the fierceness of the engagement on our left and the weak attacks on our right I felt satisfied that the rebels were concentrating their whole force against our left wing. The answer I received to this earnest entreaty was that it might concentrate the fire of the enemy's artillery upon our troops. This came to me from General Gilbert through General Sheridan. I suggested that the troops could be moved over on the other slope of the hill, which was a backbone, and would be perfectly safe.

The rebels, after they had pulverized Rousseau's right with their eighteen guns, moved a portion of their artillery from Bottom's Hill to the clump of trees on the left of the Mackville road as you go toward Perryville. At the time I made the request to turn our batteries on them we could see them going into battery in this new position spoken of. We at last did, by General Sheridan, get permission for these batteries to open on the rebel battery and rebel column as we saw them on our left. We then opened a concentric fire upon them, crossing our fire in the enemy's battery. At the second discharge I saw one of their caissons blow up, and in one of those regiments doubled on the center that I spoke of before I saw the standard go down three times, caused by the execution of our artillery. This seemed to check them, which check we afterward learned was assisted by the arrival of Gooding's brigade on the field. By marching my regiment 250 yards over an open-plain corn field I could have taken the rebels in rear and flank and had them between Lytle's battery and my own.

About this time or shortly afterward darkness fell upon the scene, and we bivouacked on the hill I had originally carried in the morning. There was a strong wind blowing in the direction of General McCook's army corps from the direction of General Buell's headquarters; it was so high that at times I could distinguish musketry a half mile from me. It is my impression that I was informed by one of the signal officers on our hill, about fifteen minutes after 2 o'clock, that General Rousseau had telegraphed he was attacked along his entire front by infantry, cavalry, and artillery. I am not positive that the signal officer informed me that General Rousseau sent that dispatch, but I am satisfied that such a dispatch went through the signal office, and that this conversation was extorted by a burst of indignation of mine, coupled with a few oaths, demanding of General Sheridan why we had been ordered out of those woods.

Commission adjourned to meet December 24, 1862, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, Wednesday Morning, December 24, 1862.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Col. C. G. HARKER (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By General BUELL :

Question. Will you state your name, rank, and position in the service of the United States ?

C. G. Harker; colonel of the Sixty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteers; commanding Twentieth Brigade, Sixth Division.

Question. State, if you please, colonel, what march you made on the 7th of October last, as the army was approaching Perryville; where you encamped, and at what hour you marched the next morning.

We left camp in the vicinity of Springfield, Ky., on the morning of the 7th. After marching slowly all day and all night of the 7th we arrived at camp on the stream known as Rolling Fork about daybreak on the morning of the 8th. We took up the line of march about 11 o'clock or somewhat after, and started in the direction of Perryville. The march was retarded by the trains and troops in front causing delay.

Question. Was your camp on the night of the 7th on the direct route to Perryville ?

It was not, sir; we turned off the direct route in order to get water; we were informed there was no water on the direct route suitable for the troops and animals.

Question. Do you know where you were expected to have encamped that night ?

We were expecting to encamp $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Haysville, at a point about 6 or 7 miles from Perryville.

Question. How much did your march to get water on the 7th take you out of your direct route ? What distance was lost in your march of the following day ?

I have learned from 3 to 4 miles.

Question. State, if you please, what position you took when you arrived near Perryville and what your command did, what you saw and what your command did on the evening of the 8th and morning of the 9th, and what you saw of the movements of the enemy on the morning of the 9th.

About half past two o'clock on the day of the 8th we received orders from General Crittenden, through General Wood, to go forward with my brigade, and arrived at a point on the right of Colonel Wagner at a late hour in the afternoon. We had previously received orders from General Wood to form in line of battle on the right of Colonel Wagner's brigade. At that time there was some artillery firing on the left. No enemy could be seen in our front and my troops were not engaged. After having formed in line of battle we received orders to advance to the front, which we did; perhaps we advanced three-quarters of a mile from the position where we first formed in line of battle; we still saw no enemy in our front. It then being about dark, we received orders from General Wood to fall back in some timber and bivouac for the night, which was done. Some time during the night orders came from General Wood to be in readiness to march at daylight. I believe he said "march;" he may have said "attack." The order was a verbal one. My command was under arms as per order, but received no further instructions from General Wood or any higher authority until a late hour in the morning, perhaps between 9 and 10 o'clock. We, however, heard firing a little after sunrise; there was skirmishing upon our right; there was also one or two rounds of artillery, but from the conformation of the ground I could not tell the direction of the artillery. The position I then had not being a good one, I advanced to the front without orders, taking a commanding position, from which I had a good view of the surrounding country. From this position bodies of cavalry could be seen to the front; we could not see whether they were our own troops or those of the enemy. By my glass I could see that they had on a blue uniform similar to our own. Not knowing what troops they were, I sent word to the rear for information and orders. These troops, after halting a short time in front of us, filed off to the right toward the direction of Harrodsburg. We could distinguish no infantry for a certainty, but a body of troops on the left could be seen, which were supposed to be infantry, and which also filed off in the direction of Harrodsburg. I sent a messenger to General Wood to the place where he was expected to be found and reported all the circumstances. The messenger returned, stating that he could not be found at that point. This was about one hour after sunrise.

Some time after this Captain Lennard, aide to General Wood, came to the front, stating that the Sixth Division was ordered back to the reserve. I reported to him what we had seen. He replied that we were too far in the advance; that we had exceeded our orders; and that it was General Wood's orders to fall back, taking a position to the rear of the division on our right to the left of the Fifteenth Brigade, resting upon the Perryville and Lebanon road. We fell back as ordered, having troops resting upon our right. We were halted about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Perryville and awaited further orders. Some time in the afternoon we received orders to proceed to the springs near Perryville; took up the line of march, and arrived there late in the afternoon; encamped. The springs were but a short distance, about half a mile, beyond Perryville, near the road leading from Perryville to Harrodsburg.

Question. Did you see any infantry on the morning of the 9th?

In my answer to the preceding question I stated that we could distinguish a body of troops that were supposed to be infantry, but could not tell for a certainty.

Question. Did any infantry move off on the Danville road or a road to the rear of the troops you supposed to be infantry?

No, sir.

Question. Did your brigade form a part of the right corps?

Yes, sir.

Question. What part of the line of that corps did it occupy?

The Sixth Division formed the left of the line. My own brigade had a central position in the division.

Question. What time did you get into camp on the night of the 9th?

I stated at a late hour in the afternoon; some time before sunset.

Question. What movement did you make on the following day?

The Sixth Division moved off to the right of the Perryville and Harrodsburg road and halted at a place known as Cecil Farm, about equidistant from the towns of Danville, Perryville, and Harrodsburg.

Question. Did you make any movement on the 11th?

My brigade was ordered to make a reconnaissance in the direction of Harrodsburg. I proceeded in that direction, leaving camp between 8 and 9 o'clock. My orders were to approach as near Harrodsburg as I could with safety; the enemy was supposed to be in force at that place. I reached a point on the Danville and Harrodsburg road about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Harrodsburg about 11 o'clock; proceeded down this road cautiously to the town of Harrodsburg, skirmishing slightly with the enemy's cavalry; the way from about a mile from where we encamped in the morning until we reached Harrodsburg, the rear of the enemy's cavalry having left the town on our approach. It was after 1 o'clock that I reached the town. I received positive orders from General Thomas not to bring on an engagement, as he thought the enemy was there in force.

Question. Were the instructions of General Thomas distinct and impressive with respect to the presence of the enemy in force at Harrodsburg?

They were decidedly so.

Question. Did you ascertain certainly on the 11th what route the enemy took and whether he had crossed Dick's River at all?

I learned that he had taken the Bryantsville road in the direction of Dick's River, but did not learn positively that he had crossed. There was a strong force of cavalry reported to be a short distance from Harrodsburg, near Cave Run. It was not deemed safe to push the reconnaissance beyond Harrodsburg from the best information I could get.

Question. Did you report the result of your reconnaissance to General Thomas, and what further instructions did you receive, if any?

I sent him verbal messages of my reconnaissance, and received orders to take up a strong position near the town of Harrodsburg and await further orders.

Question. When did you receive further orders and what were they and what action did you take upon them?

I received orders on the morning of the 12th from General Wood to proceed on the Bryantsville road until I came to the crossing of Cave Run and there await further instructions. I proceeded as ordered, and after some skirmishing with the enemy's cavalry arrived at the crossing of Cave Run about 12 o'clock. I was there joined by a body of cavalry, in the command of Colonel McCook, who proceeded to the front with his troops. Learning that General Wood, with the balance of his command, was on my right and a little to my front, I pushed forward my own brigade to a point about 3 miles from Dick's River. I remained there in position till between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when I received orders from General Wood to fall back and join the division, which was about to go into camp at a point about a mile from the Danville and Harrodsburg road and 4 miles from Harrodsburg.

Question. What time did you get into camp that day?

About dark.

Question. Did you see General Thomas at that time; did you know where he was?

I did not see him. I made my reports to General Wood in person. I learned that he was in camp near General Crittenden's headquarters; it was so reported. He was encamped on the Danville and Harrodsburg road.

Question. Did you find any of the enemy's property in Harrodsburg when you arrived there on the 11th and any of his sick?

I found about 70 head of cattle, some 200 barrels of pork, and 1,000 to 1,200 sick and wounded. This latter was reported by one of our officers, from the best information he could get and visiting the hospitals. We had taken quite a number of prisoners, stragglers, on the way and also in the town. As these cattle were in good condition to be driven, I imagine the enemy left very hurriedly.

Question. Will you state the particulars of your service in North Alabama during the months of July and August last, the date of your arrival there from Corinth, the position you took, and the service you were engaged in?

I was sent to the town of Stevenson, Ala., about the middle of July with my brigade. This was at the time a depot for supplies for the army serving in Alabama. I was ordered to fortify the place, and for that purpose was ordered to impress the services of the slaves in that vicinity and any private property that might be necessary—to make use of every means in my power to fortify and strengthen the place. I constructed a large earthwork, making use of some 400 negroes for that purpose. I also constructed a series of stockades to secure the place from an attack of the enemy or a dash of cavalry. I remained there until the troops left Battle Creek under General McCook, when I was ordered to join General Crittenden with three regiments of my brigade and a battery of artillery, leaving a regiment of infantry in the works at Stevenson.

Question. What garrison were the works at Stevenson designed to accommodate?

The earthwork was designed for about 500 infantry, a battery of four pieces of artillery, the larger stockade for about 60 infantry.

Question. Did you understand that these works had for their object to make the place secure as a depot for supplies for the army?

Not as a permanent depot, but as a depot of reception; the other troops were supplied from this point. That was my impression.

By General TYLER:

Question. On your arrival at Harrodsburg did you see any signs of burning up camp equipments, wagons, &c., on the part of Bragg's army?

They had undertaken to burn up the stores that were left there. I received no report as to the camp equipage.

Question. Did you find any amount of tents, wagons, &c., left behind?

There were none reported to me.

By General BUELL:

Question. What is your opinion in regard to the supply of camp equipage which the rebel forces had with them in Kentucky?

All the information that I received went to show that they had but little camp equipage; they were without tents.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Do you know anything about their destruction of property, their stores and wagons, subsequent to their leaving Harrodsburg, on their route to Cumberland Gap?

I know nothing about it, for the reason that our division was left back in the reserve.

Question. You accompanied the army through Danville?

Yes, sir; to a point some distance from Crab Orchard.

Capt. J. H. GILMAN (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Will you please state your name and position in the service of the United States?

J. H. Gilman; captain Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and inspector of artillery in the Army of the Ohio.

Question. What was your position in the service during the recent campaign in Kentucky?

Inspector of artillery on the staff of General Buell.

Question. Did you inspect the ground in front of Perryville on the 8th of October last, with a view to posting the troops for battle?

I inspected a portion of it.

Question. Explain, if you please, what portion of it you inspected, what time you went on, and what time you left it.

I left camp about half past 8 on the morning of the 8th, returned about 11; inspected that portion of the ground near that occupied by General Sheridan's command along the road leading from Springfield to Perryville and on the right of the road.

Question. Were you in front of the troops at that time or did your inspection extend to the front of them?

We commenced near the road, just a short distance in the rear of the skirmishers. In passing toward the right about one-fourth of a mile from the road we got between our lines and the enemy's. The ground from which we selected our positions was in the rear of our line at the time, for the ground was occupied by them; they were partly on the ground.

Question. Were there any movements of the enemy in front, while you were there, that indicated preparation for an attack?

Firing was going on all the time we were there, but not very heavy. There was nothing there at that time that would indicate an immediate and strong attack. When we passed between the enemy's line and our own there was no firing between the two until we discovered we were between the two lines by the enemy's rising up in a small number, apparently not more than 200 or 300.

Question. Were the enemy to be seen in force anywhere?

Not from where we were. We went on the top of the high hills and we could not see the enemy in any large force.

Question. Was a reconnoissance being made by the cavalry while you were there?

It was; Captain Gay was there in charge of cavalry. Just as we left the Perryville road to go off to the right Captain Gay went off to the left with a heavy cavalry force, and I think with a section of artillery.

Question. Where were you during the balance of the day?

At or near General Buell's headquarters.

Question. How far was that from the ground on which General McCook's corps fought that day?

I think about 3 miles.

Question. Did you hear any firing which indicated to your mind that a battle was going on any time during the day?

We heard artillery fire, but not very heavy; nothing to indicate that anything more than skirmishing was taking place; about the same as occurred the day previous, when Captain Gay was engaged with the enemy near the same place.

Question. Did you hear any musketry?

I do not remember hearing any musketry after I returned to camp.

Question. At what hour in the day did you first become aware that a serious fight had taken place on the left?

I think between 4 and 5 o'clock I received the first intimation of it.

Question. Did you go to the scene of the fight that night; if so, with what orders and for what purpose and what did you see there?

I went to the ground occupied by our left on that day about 9 or 10 o'clock. The same night I had orders to collect what I could of General Jackson's division, find out who the senior officer was that was left in that division, and get them into position. I found a very small part of this division; got together what I could under Colonel Hall. I went there with General Rousseau; found General McCook there just in the rear of the line. He spoke to me about moving two batteries back which were apparently very near the enemy. There was a large fire just in front of these guns, at which place it was reported to General McCook that the enemy were putting up a heavy battery to enfilade this battery of his. I asked him if he felt sure that the enemy was putting up a battery there. He said there was very little doubt about it. He said he thought they had better be moving back, and asked if it was not my opinion, and I said it was. He then told General Rousseau that he had better move back. General McCook then went to General Buell's headquarters (this was between 11 and 12), word having been brought to General McCook that General Buell wished to see him. Soon afterward this line was moved back. The left of the line was moved very little and the right was thrown back some 300 or 400 yards. In going and returning I noticed that there was a large gap between General McCook's right and General Gilbert's left not occupied by troops. The troops before this movement were in front of the Perryville and Mackville road; afterward they were thrown to the rear.

Question. Did General Rousseau proceed to make this change without further orders from General McCook?

So far as I know he did. He may have received other orders, but not to my knowledge.

Question. Was there anything in the condition of things as they appeared to you to make it necessary to re-enforce General McCook in order to effect this change safely?

There was not. I thought it probable they might be fired upon in withdrawing the guns, but did not think it probable that the enemy would follow.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You moved down toward Perryville expecting to find the enemy there in force, did you not?

I supposed we were to meet the enemy in force at some place or other, but I did not know whether it would be exactly at Perryville, but supposed it would be near there; as soon as we could overtake them.

Question. Upon what was the expectation founded?

Upon the fact that we knew the enemy were not very far off; their rear guard was often in sight of our advance guard, and there had been several skirmishes between them.

Question. Was it not known that Kirby Smith was moving in the direction of Perryville and that a junction would be formed at or near that place?

I do not know.

Question. What report did you make to General Buell, on returning from a survey of the battle-field, as to what you saw, and what conclusions did you draw?

I do not know that I made any report to General Buell personally. I spoke to Colonel Fry, chief of staff. I reported to him that there was some skirmishing going on and that there seemed to be too much firing of artillery, and that they were evidently wasting their ammunition, as I could see no enemy in large force.

Question. What time of day was that?

About 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Question. Did that firing continue from the time of your survey up to 5 or 6 o'clock in the evening?

It did not seem to be continuous, but we heard occasional firing of artillery and sometimes quite heavy. I think about 5 o'clock we heard it quite heavy.

Question. Was it continuous between 3 and 5 o'clock?

I do not think we heard it continuously during that time.

Question. Do you mean to say that it was not continuous or that you were so situated that you could not hear it?

I mean to say that we did not hear it. I have understood since that the firing was continuous.

Question. Do you mean to say that the firing on the 8th was as heavy or not heavier than it was on the 7th, only that it was more continuous; that it was of the same character as that on the day before?

No; I mean to say that it sounded where we were not like a severe battle. We did not hear the musketry.

Question. Were you about headquarters all that afternoon?

I think I was there all the time during the afternoon.

Question. Whom did you see there during the afternoon; that is, officers arriving from the direction of the battle-field, or did you see any one?

I do not think I saw any one until about dark arriving from the battle-field. I then saw Lieutenant Parsons and another officer.

Question. Did you not see Colonel Harlan there that afternoon?

I do not remember seeing him.

Question. What was said about headquarters in reference to that firing at that time?

Most of the remarks made in regard to the firing were that they were probably shelling the woods or firing at skirmishers and that the enemy probably intended to make a stand. The firing seemed to remain pretty much in the same place; it did not appear to advance or recede.

Question. Do you say that General Buell's headquarters were about 3 miles from the ground occupied by General McCook; was it not in fact 3 miles from Perryville?

I think his headquarters were fully 3 miles from Perryville. The ground occupied by General McCook was, I think, much farther to the left than Perryville. I rode over the ground but twice from where General McCook fought to General Buell's headquarters, and that was at night. I should think the distance was about 3 miles.

By General TYLER:

Question. You say the enemy's rear guard were often in sight of our advance guard and that skirmishing in consequence took place; do you suppose from this that Bragg's army was in retreat before General Buell's army?

I supposed that General Bragg was either retreating before the army or was going to select his own ground to fight upon.

Question. In throwing back General Rousseau's line was the particular ground he was to occupy pointed out and ordered by Major-General McCook?

I think not, from the fact that General Rousseau spent some time after General McCook left in reconnoitering the ground. The movement did not take place immediately on General McCook's leaving.

Question. You stated that General McCook's command would not be attacked in changing his line because it was in the night; was this the only reason? If not, what other reasons had you for supposing he would not attack?

I have stated in my answer that I thought it probable they would be fired on in withdrawing the guns, but that it would not be followed up by the enemy in the night-time, as I supposed it would be considered a dangerous thing, they at the same time knowing that there was a higher good position in the rear, where they would naturally suppose we would have a force posted to check them in case they followed.

Col. W. P. INNES (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Will you please state your name and position in the service?

W. P. Innes; colonel First Regiment Michigan Engineers and Mechanics.

Question. Were you in command of your regiment during last summer?

Yes, sir.

Question. Please state the manner in which your regiment was employed from about the time that it left Corinth in June until the army marched into Kentucky in September.

It was employed in the month of June with eight companies rebuilding the Memphis and Charleston Railroad; two companies were employed during the same month between Huntsville and Stevenson rebuilding the bridges and assisting to operate the road. In July we were engaged on the Tennessee and Alabama road and on the Nashville and Chattanooga road. We were also engaged in building pontoon boats. We were then ordered, with part of my regiment, in the latter part of August, to come up here and repair the Louisville and Nashville road. We were employed building the bridges on this road when we were desired to take up the line of march for Kentucky.

Question. Please explain the extent of the work, particularly on the Tennessee and Alabama road and the Nashville and Chattanooga road; whether your troops were constantly and industriously engaged upon the work and when it was completed so that the roads were in use throughout.

We built one bridge on the Tennessee and Alabama road across what is called Elk River. It was 700 feet long and 58 feet high, in about 20 feet of water. That was the heaviest bridge built. Four companies were employed on that work, with a large infantry detail. At that time we worked incessantly at it, rain or shine. At the same time I had three companies at work at what was called Richland Creek No. 1, which is a bridge 375 feet long, I think, 28 feet high, and in about 6 feet of water. I had two companies at the same time engaged on what is called the heavy trestle near the tunnel; we rebuilt 1,050 feet of it; that was about 64 feet high. I had then another set of men working at Richland Creek No. 2; that is a bridge about 300 feet long and 30 feet high. We also relaid about 2 miles of track and cleared out the tunnel on the same road. We also built a bridge across Mill Creek at Millville; came up to Columbia with two companies and repaired the bridge across Duck Creek that had been washed away by the high water. The companies that were at work on Elk River Bridge joined me about the middle of August on the Nashville and Chattanooga road. While this work was going on I rebuilt Crow Creek Bridge No. 3, as it was called; also cleared out the tunnel and built the bridge at Cowan.

Question. At what time were these works completed so that the roads were in use to Stevenson?

About the 28th of August.

Question. Are you an engineer?

I have engineered for about eighteen years.

Question. Were these works prosecuted with industry and energy; was any time wasted?

They were. I took some pride in it. I think there was more work done during the time, considering the force, within a short time, as has ever been completed by the same amount of men. I could say also that I had a double incentive, for I was continually being urged on verbally and by telegraph that everything depended on the opening of these roads.

Question. Were these roads essential for supplying the troops with a view to advance the army?

I should consider them very essential. I hardly see how the army could be supplied without them.

Question. You have spoken of being engaged in the construction of boats for a pontoon bridge. Will you explain the object of that bridge as far as you know it and what progress you made in the construction of them?

I understood the object of the boats was to cross the Tennessee River in the vicinity of Bridgeport, for the purpose, I understood, of marching to Chattanooga or some other place. The boats were completed before I left them, except putting the bottoms together, which I decided had better not be done until they were ready to be launched, probably half a day's work on the whole of them. The tackle, anchors, and everything were on hand ready to launch them. The boats were finished about the 20th of August, except putting the bottoms together. They would have been finished long before if we could have got the timber. There was but one mill on the road that could saw the long timber required for the bridges, and I ran that mill day and night, not only with the force belonging to the mill, but with the detail from my own regiment. We used, I think, every means that we could to get it out in as short time as possible.

Question. Do you know anything of the construction of works at Stevenson for the protection of a depot of supplies for the army?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did you understand that depot was with a view to advance the army?

Yes, sir, I so understood it; for the purpose of protecting the supplies.

Question. State, if you please, colonel, of what value the Memphis and Charleston Railroad was to the Army of the Ohio as a means of supplying it; that is, west of Decatur.

The Memphis and Charleston Railroad from Decatur to Huntsville and from there to Stevenson was of incalculable advantage to the army as a means of transportation. It was the only possible means except by land carriage.

Question. State whether that portion west of Decatur was of any value to the army.

I think not, sir.

Question. State its condition with regard to rolling stock from Decatur west.

It was very poorly supplied with stock. When I first went there there were a number of engines that could have been made available by a small amount of work.

Question. Do you know whether those engines were used or any serviceable amount of rolling stock was put in use between Corinth and Decatur?

I think not, sir; the road was very poorly managed; that was my impression at the time. I know I was three days making the trip from Decatur to Corinth.

Question. Who had the control of that road?

General J. B. McPherson. I was desired to report to him while constructing the bridges there. I think he was styled military superintendent.

Question. Was it under my immediate control in any manner?

I think not, sir. I should have had control if it had been.

Question. Did you go directly from the work on that road to the work which you have described in your previous answer?

Yes, sir; in less than twenty-four hours from my arrival in Huntsville, when I was ordered with a detachment of my regiment on to the Tennessee and Alabama road.

Question. Explain, if you please, how and when you were employed on the Louisville and Nashville road.

It was on the 25th of August I commenced building what is called Therman Cove Creek Bridge and completed it as soon as possible; it is a bridge 300 feet long, 64 feet high, and a very difficult bridge to construct on account of the quicksand foundation. I then proceeded to the Pilot Knob Bridge; that is a bridge 350 feet long and 20 feet high; and then to the Alexander Creek Bridge, which is a bridge about the same size as Pilot Knob Bridge. I was engaged upon that when we had orders to march to Kentucky. That was about the 7th or 10th of September.

Question. Were hired workmen employed on the road at any point about that time?

I think not, sir. I understood they were getting out some timber for these bridges, but at the time I was working at Pilot Knob Bridge there were parties working at Saundersville. I think there were parties working beyond the tunnel, at Gallatin, but they did not come under my observation.

Question. Will you state what the condition of that road was at that time as a means of transportation for the army and what was the cause of its condition?

I consider the road was perfectly useless from Gallatin to this point from my own knowledge, made so by the destruction of the bridges and the filling up of the tunnels by the rebels.

Question. Do you know how long it had been in that condition ?

I could not state the exact time. I heard when I was at Stevenson that the road was destroyed before I started to come here.

Question. Do you know anything of the condition of the Edgefield and Kentucky road at that time ?

I understood, sir, that that was perfectly destroyed. With respect to that road I should say it was hardly competent to supply the army, on account of its heavy grades.

Question. Do you know anything of the Cumberland River as a means of transportation at that time ?

My knowledge of the river now is that it was useless at that time, as it now is.

Question. Did you perform any work on the march to Louisville and from Louisville toward Bardstown ; and state, if you please, what ?

Yes, sir ; we rebuilt the pontoon bridge at Barren River on our way up ; also planked the railroad bridge for transporting troops over. We also did some work on the fortifications at Bowling Green ; made platforms for ten guns. We rebuilt the bridge on the march from Louisville to Bardstown across what is called Floyd's Fork, and got out a large part of the timber for the bridge across Salt River. We may have done other little pieces of work, such as repairing roads, but none of any great consequence.

Question. Was the army on its march from Louisville depending on wagon transportation ?

Entirely so.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. Was the railroad from McMinnville to Tullahoma and from thence to Nashville in running order on the 22d of August, 1862 ?

If so, it must have been just completed and that was all, for I find I was ordered by telegraph to go to McMinnville and put the road in immediate order. I also had a personal interview with General Buell at that time.

Question. What was the date of that order and when did you have that personal interview ?

It was Tuesday, August 19.

Question. How soon thereafter can you say positively that that road was in working order ; that is, the two roads from Nashville to Tullahoma and from Tullahoma to McMinnville ?

As far as the road from Tullahoma to McMinnville is concerned, I do not know when that was from my personal knowledge, though I heard on my way there that the road was in order on the 23d.

Question. What bridges were destroyed between Nashville and Bowling Green at that time ?

Therman, Cave Creek, Saundersville Trestle, Pilot Knob Bridge, Alexander Creek, and two other bridges between there and Gallatin and two small bridges having no name.

Question. What time did it take you to repair those bridges ?

We were about fourteen days.

Question. How long has it taken to open that tunnel that was destroyed ?

I cannot say of my own knowledge. It was under the charge of General Steedman. It was some ten days after those other bridges were built and longer than it took us to rebuild those bridges.

Question. Where is that tunnel?

It is about 7 miles from Gallatin.

Question. What sort of a road is there around this tunnel?

Very bad indeed; impracticable for teams.

Question. How long would it require to make it practicable?

You could not do it, on account of the elevation to be overcome.

Question. What time did you arrive in Nashville?

From the 23d to the 25th of August.

By General BUELL:

Question. How long has it taken to put this road in order since the return of the army to Tennessee?

I think about thirty days.

Question. What force do you suppose has been employed on it or present along it during that time?

I think that between Gallatin and this point, on our way back to repair the bridges, there were four brigades besides General Wood's force; that I understood was in the vicinity of Gallatin. These were all the troops I had knowledge of, but I never went off the railroad and therefore had no means of knowing.

By General TYLER:

Question. Was the railroad from Corinth to Stevenson after its repair of any practicable use to General Buell's army in the transportation of provisions and men?

I think not, sir. There was great complaint that we could get neither men nor provisions over the road.

Question. And why not?

Because I think the road was not well managed.

Question. You spoke of some road with heavy grade that was of no use.

The Edgefield and Kentucky road.

Question. Why do heavy grades make a road useless?

Because of its requiring greater motive-power to transport the same amount of tonnage.

Question. What do you suppose would be the requirement for the daily transportation (in tons) for an army of 50,000 men?

I could not say, sir, without calculation. It would depend entirely upon the amount of transportation allowed to each regiment, and the amount of forage depending upon the number of horses they had.

Question. What was the capacity of this road; what would an engine of 25 tons carry?

Over that grade three or four cars would be considered a load for a 25-ton engine.

Question. Is the grade uniform over the entire road, so that a 25-ton engine will take only three cars?

No, sir; there are portions of the road where a larger train than that could be taken; probably ten or twelve cars.

Question. What is the maximum grade per mile on that road?

I understand, going over the mountain, the grade is over 200 feet to the mile.

Question. Do you mean to say that a 25-ton engine would not take more than three loaded cars over a grade of 200 feet to the mile, supposing the grade did not extend over one mile?

I think, sir, if the track was wet it would be about as much as a 25-ton engine could do.

The Commission adjourned to meet December 25, 1862, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 25, 1862.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Major SIDELL (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service, if you please, and the special duty upon which you have been engaged for some months past as far back as the month of July.

W. H. Sidell; major of the Fifteenth U. S. Infantry. I have been engaged on special duty as assistant adjutant-general since July 20 at Nashville.

Question. Give, if you please, major, a concise statement of the operations of the enemy in the vicinity of Nashville during the last summer, and of the effect of these operations and the measures adopted to counteract them.

The operations here were irregular and generally of small significance. At the time that I arrived Morgan, with his force, entered Kentucky, and I was detained in Louisville by General Boyle with reference to that condition of things. When I arrived here I found a small garrison of perhaps 1,200 effective men, with a body of convalescents, who were considered available to a certain extent, under the command of Col. J. F. Miller, Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, who commanded the post. Immediately on my arrival the aggressions of these parties or forces, under various leaders and sometimes without leaders, began in cutting off couriers and interfering with forage and general trains of the army and interrupting the communication between this place and the various corps of the army in the vicinity. We had to be on the alert all the time in order to counteract these operations as they occurred, the general meaning of which is that the country was alive with these irregular forces. Among their operations they made an attack on Gallatin, or rather they entered there, for there was no great force, and there were two expeditions to go upon the road and endeavor to drive them away, which was effected by Colonel Miller. Subsequently to that a third movement was made by Lieutenant-Colonel Heffren, of the Fiftieth Indiana, who went to Gallatin and went into the tunnel, which was burning, 3 miles beyond Gallatin, and to prevent its falling in was lined with wood. The burning out of the interior was of very serious detriment. It is only now just repaired. This Lieutenant-Colonel Heffren, going without proper precaution, met with a disaster, that Colonel Miller was careful enough to avoid, in having his communications cut off in the rear. This so encouraged the enemy that nearly all the communications were destroyed between here and Gallatin. All this occurred toward the end of July and the beginning of August. Some cavalry were sent, under command of R. W. Johnson, brigadier-general, to Gallatin, going by the way of Lebanon, in this State, for the purpose of driving away such of these forces as were concentrated (a force of four companies at Gallatin, under Colonel Boone, a Kentucky regiment, had been taken by surprise, without any firing, and were captured). General Johnson met the rebels at Gallatin and was repulsed. Stragglers began to arrive in this city by way of Lebanon about 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening, giving us information.

This movement of Colonel Heffren and this repulse of General Johnson was the finale to the communication between this city and Louisville. This was early in August. In the other direction from Nashville, south, there were no large conflicts, but a continued series of annoyances, sometimes taking, in one instance 80, prisoners, who went out with wagon trains; at other times squads of from 8 to 10, who were sent in here for parole, as they called it. There was no knowledge that the enemy were always in an organized condition; in fact it was fair to be inferred that they were countrymen, without any organization.

When affairs had arrived at this point, as the forces here were not adequate to any large movement, it was thought proper to organize a light brigade; that is, a brigade so organized as to move with the facility of cavalry. Men were mounted as cavalry or artillery or infantry with the means of a mount, and provided with the means of transportation in wagons, the intention being to follow the enemy and to be self-supporting. This was under the command of Colonel Miller, and was organized, I think, about the 20th or 25th of August. Before, however, there had been any efficient action of this brigade the army returned from the South, and it was no longer necessary. Previously, as testified, the garrison here was very small and could spare a very indifferent force, but subsequently sufficient was spared to organize this light brigade, which would have answered a good purpose had the general army remained in the south. It was considered expedient also to throw up works of defense about the city, and I received an order from General Buell to reconnoiter for that object. At the same time he informed me that an engineering officer would be sent here to carry into effect whatever measures might be considered good in that relation. This officer was Captain Morton, of the Corps of Engineers of the U. S. Army, who planned his works with reference to their speedy completion, but with the capability of being indefinitely extended; and essentially the same works exist now with the strength added. About the 1st of September the army came here from below, and within the first ten days had gone north, leaving a garrison of about 20,000 effective men, or rather it was strengthened to that point by the arrival of the Army of the Mississippi. It was originally about 10,000 men of all grades. This was under the command of Brigadier-General Negley. General Negley was ordered to exercise vigilance and to defend the place to the last extremity, and accordingly did everything that occurred to him as a vigilant officer to do, particularly strengthening the works, sending out expeditions to the country, preparing a boat bridge on the river, laying in supplies, such as could be obtained in the country, with reference to a protracted siege, and building the bridge and defending themselves when attacked. The city was thereby held until the arrival of this army, and I think could have been held with the supplies we had some two or three weeks without getting further supplies.

When Colonel Miller was in command here, with his small garrison, he was ordered to defend the three railroads which go from this place, one north, the Louisville road, as far as the Tennessee line, and the two south, about 15 or 20 miles. The remaining portion of the road south also had a defense organized, without our having much information with regard to their particular means here in Nashville; we knew simply that there was a sufficient force on those roads to protect them. I believe General W. S. Smith was charged with that duty.

Question. Were those operations of the enemy at any time of so formidable a character as to give ground of apprehension for the safety of Nashville?

At one time, when there was a small garrison and no works of defense, and an ill-disposed population, as there has always been, it was possible that a dash could be made by such forces as those cavalry leaders of the enemy could have brought. On one or two occasions when this was apprehended measures were taken by barricading the streets with wagons, &c., and blocking up the main entrances to the city. At a later date, when we had a larger garrison, there were threatenings and sufficient apprehension to keep us at least on the alert. The day before the arrival of the army from Louisville, under General Rosecrans, an attempt had been made to destroy the bridges across the Cumberland and feel our works by a considerable force. They made an attack on the city on all the roads leading south at the same time and simultaneously an attack on the other side of the river, an attack of cavalry, the object being to get to the bridges to destroy them. I do not think they could have taken the city by regular siege with such a force as we then had in the city and vicinity. In addition to the strengthening of the works by operations of engineering were those of mounting all the pieces of artillery left by the enemy, making cartridges, &c.

Question. Do you know anything of the capture of Murfreesborough and of the inconvenience that resulted from that misfortune?

No, sir; I have no specific information on that subject, because it occurred before I came here.

Question. Did any portion of the army with which Bragg crossed the Tennessee River to invade Kentucky turn upon this place and take part in the siege?

I am not informed on that subject.

Question. What was the character of the force that was acting against the city during the absence of the army in September and October and what was its strength?

It was mostly cavalry. The last instance I was speaking of, before the arrival of the army, was infantry and artillery. The force I have no means of knowing, excepting that that portion which was on the other side the river consisted of cavalry, said to be 700 or 750.

Question. Was there any infantry with it in the beginning?

I think there was no infantry. This answer does not refer to that last day spoken of, but to their operations generally.

Question. Do you know who the commander was?

It was said to be Breckinridge.

Question. Do you know whether orders were given for fortifying positions occupied by bridge guards along the roads?

Yes, sir; I knew that such orders were given to fortify these positions by stockade or other means, and I am aware that it was generally done.

Question. What force do you think would have been necessary to keep open the communications between here and Louisville against cavalry operations of the enemy?

It ought to be stated that the cavalry operations of the enemy could always count on the assistance of the inhabitants. There is good reason to believe that in each one of the outrages committed in this vicinity the citizens, acting temporarily as soldiers, were engaged in it. I do not know how less than from 15,000 to 20,000 men could have made the communications secure.

Question. Were the difficulties of less magnitude in defending the roads south of Nashville?

There were some physical features on the Louisville and Nashville road giving peculiar facilities to an enemy; otherwise the difficulties were the same in defending the roads south of this point.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What time do you say you arrived here?

On the 18th or 20th of July. I was in Louisville, and received one or two telegrams, and arrived on the 18th.

Question. What time after your arrival was communication cut off between Bowling Green and Nashville?

I think there was no communication within ten days after my arrival.

Question. Am I to understand that there was a force of no magnitude or an organized force at all threatening Nashville and its communications while General Buell's army was in Tennessee?

No more than those forces of partisan leaders, Morgan and Forrest; there was no further organized force that I was cognizant of.

Question. Do you know that Morgan or Forrest was in the neighborhood of Nashville at that time?

The most precise information of the presence of Morgan refers to the time when General Johnson met him at Gallatin. This was about the middle of August. Previously to that I had no other information than a common report that sometimes Forrest's, sometimes Starnes' or Woodward's or Morgan's forces were there, but I have no absolute knowledge of the presence of any one of them.

Question. While you were being alarmed or excited in Nashville by these reports did you not frequently hear of Morgan being in two places at the same time?

I have no doubt that rumors of his presence often were erroneous; but, strictly speaking, I cannot recall any instance in which I heard of his being in two places at the same time.

Question. Do you not know that these attacks upon railroads and lines of communication were made by the inhabitants and attributed to Morgan or Forrest as a cover for their rascality?

I have fair reasons to suppose that the citizens did sometimes commit these acts and attribute them to the forces of the enemy. I judge, however, that they generally acted in concert with some forces present or in the vicinity.

Question. Up to what time were the trains running from Louisville to Bowling Green?

I cannot answer. The fact that communication was interrupted from Bowling Green here prevents absolute knowledge of that fact.

Question. What force, in your opinion, would have been requisite to have kept the railroad open from Bowling Green to Nashville?

To have kept it open beyond peradventure I think that not less than from 10,000 to 12,000 men would have been necessary.

Question. How is it necessary to distribute 10,000 to 12,000 men along that road to keep it open?

Well, I do not know how I could definitely state where the forces should be posted, but I think they should be distributed along the road in such a manner as to be always near any point which might be subject to attack in sufficient force to repel the attack. I take into consideration the disposition of the people, their capacity to injure, and the character of the force that was thrown against it. If this force could be counted on to be expected at any one place they could be met by a similar force, but in order to make this secure for an army it should be such that at any one point sufficient force could be had to meet an attack.

Question. Can you designate the points along the road where it would be necessary to have a force stationed?

The first principle would be to have them distributed with reasonable equality; then, in regard to the selection of places, I would have a force between Goodlettsville and Gallatin, between Mitchellsville and Gallatin two forces, and between Franklin and Bowling Green. When I say these places I do not mean the towns, but at such works in the vicinity as are peculiarly important in relation to the country roads in the vicinity.

Question. What forces would you station at Goodlettsville?

I am not prepared to answer that question as to the exact disposition of these forces at the various points. If I were obliged to do the work it would be with the topography of the country before me and such information as I could collect for doing it.

Question. Why, then, do you say it would require from 10,000 to 12,000 to keep that road open?

The answer was given on the general idea of the exposure of the road and the necessity for defending all points.

Question. Is it customary in guarding a road to place a guard at any other points than to take care of the tunnels and bridges on the road?

That question depends, of course, upon the amount of force there to spare for the purpose; such a force as could be no doubt would be disposed of at the most vulnerable points.

Question. Has it not been the practice to guard railroad bridges and tunnels from the fact that to destroy the one is a serious injury to the road, the other a permanent one, while the track is easily and quickly relaid?

Yes, sir.

Question. The largest force you mentioned as numbering 700 cavalry; how many infantry at any one point would you think necessary to repel an attack of 700 cavalry?

This number of cavalry mentioned was referring to the attack that was made previous to the entrance of General Rosecrans' army; a larger force was assembled at the time of the battle with General Johnson. The question resolves itself into the character and circumstances of the attack. If a regular advance is made upon a particular point of road a regiment of infantry would repel them; but as the attack may be made unexpectedly and at unexpected points, the force necessary to repel them would be indefinite.

Question. Major, were the inhabitants along the road of such a character as that between Bowling Green and Nashville at the time you mention? Is it possible for any amount of men to keep a road open by being stationed along it to repel attacks?

It is not absolutely possible.

Question. Would not that road have been protected between Bowling Green and Nashville under those circumstances if the inhabitants had been notified that for every interruption their country would be laid waste right and left?

That question involves so many considerations that I do not know how I can answer it categorically. It is not possible to decide what effect the declaration of such a policy would have throughout the State of Kentucky.

Question. Would it preserve the road?

I think it would have a conservative effect on the road.

Question. Do you not know of railroad lines and telegraph lines being preserved through disaffected regions in that way?

I have heard of the operations of the policy in Missouri.

By General TYLER:

Question. Did you not state in your testimony that the garrison of Nashville would require 20,000 men; would you regard 17,000 or 20,000 men necessary for the protection of Nashville against the guerrilla parties?

No, sir.

Question. Was Nashville at the time this garrison was left here threatened by anything but guerrilla parties and small bodies of cavalry?

We heard on several different occasions of the concentration of troops in the vicinity south; we heard also of the possible arrival of the army defeated at Corinth; and probably on two or three occasions we received information from the inhabitants which indicated the coming of regular forces.

Question. Did these rumors prove true or false; was there ever any large concentration of forces against Nashville?

I think there was never a positive concentration until it began to gather a short time before the arrival of General Rosecrans' army. I presume the beginning of that force was there a long time since. They had a general meeting at Murfreesborough, in which there were very strong persuasions used by Governor Harris with reference to the collection of forces there to attack Nashville and without a word of difference of opinion existing in regard to that subject.

Redirect examination by General BUELL:

Question. Is there any difference in the character of the military operations in Missouri and those of the Army of the Cumberland now?

I think there is, consisting of this, that in Missouri the object seemed to be to keep the State itself in a loyal condition as nearly as practicable, to suppress treasonable acts, and bring the State back to a tranquil condition; whereas here the object is the movement of a large army for strategic purposes.

Question. Is there any more effective way that you know of certain of counteracting the objects of this large army than by operating on its communications?

I know of no better way.

Question. Suppose the country on either side the railway should be laid waste by fire and sword, do you think it would be less an object with the enemy to destroy the road and interrupt communication by it?

I do not think it would be less an object; but I think it would interfere with the means, and I think that the threat of it might suppress the disposition on the part of the inhabitants.

Question. Do you really think that the inhabitants have acted very powerfully in interrupting the communications between here and Louisville in destroying the road as a means of transportation?

I do not think that the inhabitants, announcing themselves as such, have done much harm, but that they have acted clandestinely and in concert with the organized enemy. That question, of course, is one of opinion, depending on such rumors or information as we received from time to time in regard to the probable alliance between the inhabitants and the enemy, and the opinion is to be taken with much allowance.

Question. Is not the presence of large bodies of cavalry under Forrest, Morgan, and other rebel generals, operating upon the line of communication of the army during the past summer, as much a matter of fact as the presence of Kirby Smith's army in Kentucky?

I have no doubt that these forces were regularly operating against the communications of the army. I have no doubt, not only from the facts of their actual interruption, but also from the information brought by spies and others who obtained it, that such were their plans.

Question. There is no question of the fact, I suppose, that a considerable force of our troops was captured by a large body of the enemy's cavalry at Murfreesborough in July last, and does not that establish the fact of the presence of such large bodies in the country?

I was not in Nashville at the time of the battle of Murfreesborough but immediately subsequent, and became acquainted with the fact of a large number of persons having been taken in the battle and of the successful attack of the enemy at Murfreesborough. The business of my office brought that information constantly before me.

General NEGLEY (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State, if you please, general, your name and position in the service of the United States.

James S. Negley, brigadier-general in the United States service.

Question. Give, if you please, a concise statement of your services during the past summer and up to the time of the return of the army to this place recently. State what the enemy's operations were in your vicinity and what measures were adopted to counteract them.

I was in command of the post at Columbia from the 1st of July. My command occupied the railroad from Franklin to the Tennessee River, on the Alabama and Tennessee Railroad. The enemy were quite numerous throughout the country. They were raising guerrilla parties in the vicinity of all the interior towns. Biffle was raising a regiment in the vicinity of Waynesborough, west of Columbia; Napier was raising another regiment in the vicinity of Charlotte and Centreville, nearly west of Columbia; and Major Hawkins was raising a regiment in the vicinity of Hillsborough, over toward Chapel Hill. There was a battalion raising between Columbia and Pulaski, in the neighborhood of Culleoka, a point on the railroad. There was a battalion, afterward a regiment, of guerrillas organizing on the edge of Atlanta, commanded by John T. Morgan. This force numbered in all between 2,500 and 3,000 men. Forrest at the same time was operating east of the line of railroad between Nashville and Tullahoma. He was operating between the Manchester and extending toward Carthage and Sparta. The rapidity with which these guerrillas could organize at any one given point required a great deal of vigilance and watchfulness, for the troops would move from point to point in order to cut off the line of communication to the south. Scarcely a day would pass in which they did not commit some depredations on the road, stopping trains and pulling up the rails. They were very annoying in the vicinity of Columbia, their forces generally outnumbering the forces at the post. They threw the cars off the track three times and interrupted the travel for several days at different periods. At the time of the withdrawal of the troops they succeeded on one occasion in burning the bridges on each side of one of the trains that was bringing up troops.

At the beginning of September I withdrew my forces, by the order of General Buell, from the line of railroad. They were concentrated at Nashville. I took command of the forces at Nashville on the 14th of September. General Thomas was left in command of the post, with three divisions that General Buell left—his own division, General Palmer's division of the Army of the Mississippi, and the Eighth Division, which I command. General Thomas, by order of General Buell, marched to Kentucky; took with him his own division, leaving with me two divisions. Shortly after the army had proceeded to Kentucky the unorganized party concentrated their forces in the vicinity of the city, at a place called La Vergne, under the command of Major-General Anderson. About that time General Forrest was sent from Kentucky to take command and organize the detached forces in Tennessee. He brought with him a portion of his own command to do so. He reached Murfreesborough while General Anderson, with over 3,000 men, was at La Vergne. Before he could carry his orders into execution we pursued the forces of General Anderson and captured a number, one of their pieces of artillery, and demoralized their forces entirely. This led to the disbanding of two regiments of cavalry and the withdrawal of General Anderson from that portion of the command. General Forrest then assumed command of all the forces and retained it until General Breckinridge arrived. This was between the 4th and 24th of October.

The enemy used every effort to prevent our obtaining supplies and forage. We were without supplies here for fifty days except what we procured from the country. We were obliged to go about 20 miles into the country. The enemy would drive off their cattle to some secluded point, which we had to ascertain and then follow them there. They were then concentrating their forces in the neighborhood of Gallatin and Goodlettsville for the purpose of surprising our forage trains, and before we could send out our small force we had to disperse the bands concentrated there. Some ten days previous to the arrival of re-enforcements to General Rosecrans' army General Breckinridge had organized a force in the neighborhood of 25,000 men. Of that force 6,000 were cavalry. He had twenty-eight pieces of artillery, three of which were siege guns. Their advance post was moved to La Vergne, then to the asylum, 8 miles distant, on the Murfreesborough road. From that point they would make sallies on our picket lines and forage parties. The day previous to the arrival of General McCook's command they made an attack upon the east and north side of the defenses at the same time, with the intention of destroying the bridge, I presume. The forces on the north side of the river, numbering 3,000, with two pieces of artillery, were commanded by General Morgan. They had only about 1,500 of those in action. The attack was made about 3 o'clock in the morning. It commenced on the eastern side of the Murfreesborough road, by the enemy, numbering about 3,000, with three pieces of artillery, driving in our pickets. They were speedily driven off without success on the north side. We constructed banquettes along the railroad, which they were only enabled to approach before they were driven back. On the eastern side they fired some fifteen or twenty shots from their artillery. We then opened on them two of the heavy guns at the fort, which obliged them to shift their position. They then moved over to the Franklin road and brought up Hanson's brigade, three batteries of artillery, stationing it between the Nolensville pike and the Murfreesborough pike, on a cross-road which runs diagonally from the asylum to the Franklin road. Their cavalry, about 3,000, with six pieces of artillery, moved down near the Franklin road on the intermediate, which runs parallel with the Franklin dirt road. A small force from this command approached the picket line on the Franklin road. Believing it possible that we could punish that party that came up the Franklin road, I sent a brigade on the Murfreesborough road to cover the real movements on the Franklin road, to engage them apparently on the Murfreesborough road while I took the regiments of infantry and some cavalry, with four pieces of artillery, and preceded the forces on the Franklin road. They retreated, making a stand upon every rising piece of ground, until they reached a distance of 3 miles from the city. I then endeavored to draw them upon our artillery by sending our cavalry forward, with directions to charge upon the rear of the enemy and then retreat, turning into the woods on the right, in hopes of bringing them on an ambuscade. My cavalry were so inexperienced that they followed a small portion of the enemy that remained on the Franklin road to within 5 miles of Franklin, and obliged me to move forward with my infantry force 5 miles farther to support them, taking us about 8 miles from the city. Before I could get the cavalry back the enemy had formed in considerable force on my left, with seven pieces of artillery, and we moved up toward the Franklin road to cut off their retreat. I left a regiment of infantry to protect the cavalry, and fell back opposite the position they assumed, and succeeded in placing two guns in position and opening fire simultaneously with their artillery. This enabled me to withdraw my cavalry and get in the rear in time to make preparations for a charge of cavalry which they had formed upon the Franklin road. They shifted three of their guns, and began to move up the reserve toward the Franklin road while trying to get into our rear, at the same time forming a line, which I presume was a regiment and a half, across the Franklin road, about 900 or 1,000 yards distant. I placed a regiment of infantry behind a fence close by the road to conceal them from view, and threw out two companies of cavalry as a decoy, with orders to open fire upon the enemy at a long range and then retreat. The enemy accepted the challenge, charging very handsomely over the rolling piece of ground that lay between the regiment and the line they had formed. Simultaneously with that I placed the three pieces of artillery to cover their retreat, which was extending to my rear. They charged up to within a hundred yards of the line of infantry—the fence that was on the Franklin road—when they discharged their pieces, halting temporarily to do so, and then charged forward, still not seeing our concealed regiment of infantry, and within about 40 yards they received the volley of the entire regiment, which drove them back in confusion, causing considerable loss. I took advantage of their retreat and the confusion they were in to withdraw my force to a better position in the rear, and in time to meet the movement from what I presume was their reserve, and moved toward the Franklin road about 2 miles from the city. They would perhaps have succeeded in getting into my rear but for a section of artillery which I had ordered from the city upon a rising piece of ground overlooking the ground upon which they were marching. The enemy then withdrew their force to La Vergne, where they remained till the arrival of General Rosecrans' army.

The troops that occupied the city of Nashville numbered about 10,000 effective men. There were 3,000 convalescents, organized into regiments, that remained in the city, and we were unable to send them out. During the siege we procured 3,500 loads of forage and provisions within a radius of 20-odd miles. The troops marched 540 or 550 miles in procuring supplies. We captured about 350 Confederate prisoners, had three engagements with the enemy, and about twenty skirmishes. Our whole loss was about 5 killed, 40 wounded, and about 60 persons captured. We lost no wagons or animals by the acts of the enemy, and the garrison was maintained in very good order and condition.

Question. Were your troops actually employed during the summer and did you succeed in inflicting punishment on those guerrilla bands that you have spoken of?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did General Bragg, in marching through Tennessee, leave any of his force to operate against Nashville?

He left General Breckinridge's division, which had been ordered into Kentucky, and had reached Knoxville on its way to Kentucky when General Breckinridge and his command were ordered to Murfreesborough.

Question. Your answer implies that they did not form part of the force with which Bragg left Chattanooga?

Yes, sir; he left none of his forces that he marched from Chattanooga with.

Question. Do you know anything of the road from McMinnville to the Sequatchie Valley by way of Altamont?

Yes, sir.

Question. Is it a practicable mountain road?

It is in the summer-time; the great difficulty is a deficiency of water.

Question. Is there not the same difficulty with all the mountain roads; that is, scarcity of water?

Yes, sir; there is but one stream of water between McMinnville and the Sequatchie Valley, and that is in the neighborhood of Altamont.

Question. Did you march with your troops to the Tennessee River opposite Chattanooga?

Yes, sir.

Question. State, if you please, what route you took.

I concentrated my forces at Pulaski; This was about the 30th of May; marched from Pulaski to Fayetteville, and found the enemy we were after had gone towards Sweeneen's Cove, which is on the road to Jasper. We took the Fayetteville and Winchester road to Winchester; from Winchester, by way of Cowan, across the ridge of the Cumberland Mountains, into Sweeden's Cove to the west of Battle Creek. Then we took the Jasper road. Four miles beyond Jasper I divided my forces, sending a portion of the infantry across Walden's Ridge by a path 16 miles to the ferry opposite Chattanooga. We marched the artillery and transportation 22 miles up the valley to the Anderson and Therman road, crossing the ridge by the Therman or Anderson road to the ferry opposite Chattanooga. I returned by the same road to the Anderson cross-road in the Sequatchie Valley, sending one portion to Battle Creek to sustain a small force I had left there to engage the enemy's attention, and with that force to march to Stevenson, while with the other portion, commanded personally, I took the Therman road to Altamont, with the intention of attacking Starnes' cavalry, that were encamped at Altamont when I was crossing the mountains from Chattanooga. Before I arrived there Starnes moved to Pikeville, and I received intelligence that the enemy were proposing to cross the river and attack our forces at Fayetteville. I marched from Altamont through Hubbard's Cove to Manchester; from Manchester to Wartrace and Shelbyville. I then left a portion there to sustain that line, and marched the remainder by the Shelbyville road to Columbia. The time occupied in marching from Columbia to Chattanooga and returning was fourteen days; the distance we traveled was nearly 300 miles.

Question. How long were you in crossing the mountains from the Sequatchie Valley to Altamont?

Two days.

Question. How does that road compare with the Manchester and Jasper road?

It is a better road; that is, ascending from the eastern side; it is equally as bad ascending from the western side.

Question. Is there any difficulty about it at all more than with other mountain roads in that region?

No, sir; the roads are all very rough.

Question. Is there a good wagon road down the Sequatchie Valley and on to Stevenson?

In the summer-time very good—a level, smooth road; with the exception of Sequatchie River and Battle Creek it is a very good one. One has to be forded and the other has a bridge over.

Question. Is it, beyond all comparison, better than any other road out of the Sequatchie Valley?

Yes, sir.

Question. Do you know any roads crossing the mountain out of the Sequatchie Valley east of the Therman road?

Yes, sir; it is what is called the Dunlap or Grassy Cove road. It intersects the Grassy Cove road to Chattanooga and Knoxville to Dunlap. That is a very good road in summer-time. Where it crosses Caney Fork it is well supplied with water.

Question. How far is that from McMinnville?

Between 20 and 30 miles.

Question. Do you know anything of the road from Dunlap to Sparta?

Yes, sir; the road runs on the ridge for a considerable distance.

Question. Is there a road from Harrison into the Sequatchie Valley?

Yes, sir; it passes to the right of Therman road 44 miles in turning the mountain.

Question. Do you know of a road following the main ridge of the Cumberland, crossing these different roads, by which you can turn off to the left from the Dunlap and McMinnville road and come into the Therman road near Altamont?

There is a ridge road that runs to Alexandria—strikes the Carthage and McMinnville road at Alexandria. Where the Therman road strikes the Tracy City at Altamont there are cross-roads by which you could proceed to Pikeville, Spencer, Alexandria, McMinnville, or Hubbard's Cove and Manchester, and also one that leads by Tracy City to Cowan.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. Do you say you were shut off from supplies in Nashville some fifty days ? Did your forces suffer any during that time ?

Only inconvenience ; they suffered no want.

Question. The organization of these guerrilla bands that you speak of was subsequent to the invasion of Kentucky by Bragg ?

Yes, sir.

Question. At what time was it that Breckinridge came over to take the command you speak of ?

I cannot give you the exact date, but it was between the 4th and 21st of October. The Governor had offered opportunities to the people throughout Tennessee to enlist and select their own companies and organizations, and large numbers enrolled themselves. General Bragg refused to recognize the authority of the Governor or the propriety of the order, and ordered the troops to be organized into organizations already existing, except such regiments as were full. They disbanded all the forces here except two regiments.

Question. At what time did Bragg cross from Chattanooga and Harrison with his invading army ?

In the middle of August.

Question. Where were you at the time ?

At Columbia.

Question. Bragg marched up the Sequatchie Valley through Dunlap and Pikeville to Sparta. Was it known at the time he crossed that that would be the line he would take ?

When he marched to Sparta he had not determined whether he would attack Nashville or march into Kentucky. He was contending against the programme laid out for him by Governor Harris. He approached Nashville in consequence of the pressure brought on him by Governor Harris. The governor was opposed to his marching into Kentucky, and had induced President Davis to send Bragg into Tennessee to retake Nashville. That is one reason why General Bragg threw a portion of his forces along the line of the Chattanooga and Nashville Railroad.

Question. What I asked you was whether it was known to you or to the more intelligent officers at the time of crossing the Tennessee River that Bragg would take that line up through Dunlap, Pikeville, and Sparta, and whether it was anticipated that that would be his line of march ?

It was not known to me. I was aware of his crossing the river and the force he had, and it was presumed that he would go to Pikeville, from the fact that a portion of his cavalry came so low down the Sequatchie Valley.

Question. Did not his condition as to supplies and transportation, &c., force him up the Sequatchie Valley through Pikeville and Sparta ?

That must have had an influence upon his march, but at the same time he had placed himself in a condition where there was no water—between Sparta and Alexandria. His forces were almost demoralized by the hardships of the march.

By General DANA :

Question. With what force did Bragg cross the Tennessee River ?

Sixty thousand.

Question. Do you know anything of the condition of Bragg's army as to supplies when he crossed ?

Yes, sir.

Question. What was his actual condition as to supplies ?

He had no more than three days' provisions ; he had not more than three wagons to every brigade ; that is, for supplies.

Question. With the quantity of supplies with which he crossed the Tennessee and with the train of artillery and baggage he had with his army was it or was it not at his option, with equal chances, to go down into the plains of Tennessee by the different cross-roads you have described in the vicinity of Altamont or to go to Sparta ?

No, sir ; there was not a sufficiency of forage between Altamont and McMinnville to feed his cavalry one meal.

Question. Do you consider, then, that he was compelled on account of lack of supplies to go by the road to Sparta ?

Yes, sir.

Question. And that he could not go by the Anderson or Therman road or by any other cross-road down into the plains of Tennessee ?

He could not go with the supplies he had with him. He would have had sufficient supplies to maintain him three or four days.

Question. Was it known at the time that Bragg was in the Sequatchie Valley that the lack of supplies under which he was suffering prevented him from going by any other road than the Sparta road ?

I am unable to say, sir.

Question. At the time that the Army of the Ohio occupied its position in the vicinity of Altamont and McMinnville by which road did you expect Bragg to come into the plains of Tennessee ?

By the Alexandria road to Lebanon by the way to Dunlap. That opinion I did not form until I knew he was ascending the mountain. When he was in the Sequatchie Valley I was unable to tell where he would ascend the mountain, but presumed he would go to Pikeville or Sparta.

Question. At the time you entertained the opinion that he would come out by the road to Dunlap with what portion of the Army of the Ohio were you stationed ?

I was at Columbia with 110 [?] men. There was one brigade extending along the railroad to the Tennessee River ; another portion of General Buell's command was on the line of the Chattanooga and Nashville road to Nashville. There was a portion of General McCook's command near Altamont, so I understood ; but I was not fully aware of the disposition of the forces of General Buell on that line.

Question. What was the programme Governor Harris laid down for Bragg's operations ?

It was intended that Bragg should concentrate his forces at Chattanooga and march by way of Sparta, thus turning General Buell's left, retake Nashville, compel General Buell's army to fall back and cross the Tennessee, while the forces north of the Cumberland should be compelled to fall back to Louisville, thus obtaining possession of the railroad north of Bowling Green to Huntsville. Governor Harris was so well satisfied that that plan would succeed that he had urged appropriations in the Confederate Congress to establish defenses on the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers.

Question. Was this programme of Governor Harris generally understood at that time among the officers of high rank in the Army of the Ohio ?

No, sir.

Question. At the time General McCook lay at Altamont and General Thomas at McMinnville where was it generally expected among officers of high rank in the Army of the Ohio that Bragg would debouch from the Sequatchie Valley into the plains of Tennessee and by what road ?

I am unable to say, because I had no consultation with them at the time. My communication was so cut off that I had no opportunity of exchanging opinions with them.

Question. When Bragg crossed the Tennessee River did you know at that time that he had but three days' supply?

Not till some days afterward.

Question. Do you remember about how long afterward you obtained the information?

Five or six days.

Question. Do you know anything of the letter of Governor Harris detailing the programme having been intercepted by our forces?

I never heard of such a thing.

Question. How did you arrive at the estimate of 60,000 men of Bragg's forces crossing the Tennessee River?

By a man who counted them as they passed along the Grassy Cove road, and also by a statement of the assistant ferry-man at Chattanooga.

Question. What data did your informant give you by which you made the estimate of 60,000?

He counted the regiments, gave me the number of regiments and number of brigades and divisions, and gave me the strength of several regiments of the different States.

Question. What did he state as the number of regiments and the average number of men to the regiment?

I am unable to tell you the number of regiments in detail; he did not give me a memorandum in writing, but the strength of the regiments. Those from Virginia, from Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama averaged from 300 to 350 men; some from Tennessee were as low as 200; some brigades were composed of five regiments. The regiments from Georgia would sometimes exceed 700; they ranged from 500 to 700 and 800. There were several Florida regiments that were very strong.

Question. What was the name of your informant?

Carter.

Question. At the time Bragg was in the Sequatchie Valley by which road did you consider it certain that he would debouch from the valley?

I am unable, sir, to answer that question. I presumed that he would march by way of Pikeville to Sparta, because it was a better road for his artillery and transportation.

Question. Are the Anderson and Therman road and the Grassy Cove road equally practicable for an army as the road by way of Pikeville and Sparta?

• Yes, sir.

Question. At the time that General McCook lay at Altamont and General Thomas at McMinnville, suppose the Army of the Ohio had been concentrated in the vicinity of Sparta to oppose Bragg, which road would he then have traveled? Would he have given battle to this army in position or traveled by some other road?

He would have traveled by some other road.

Question. Which road would he have taken?

That would depend upon where he wished to go. When he left Sparta he had not decided where he would go. It was not until he reached that point Governor Harris understood from him that he determined to cross into Kentucky. Till he reached Sparta or the vicinity Governor Harris was under the impression that he would go to Nashville, and he frequently asserted that it was understood that he marched on to Nashville.

Question. Had General Buell's army taken up the position before spoken of would it have held Bragg under the necessity of either giving him battle in the vicinity of Sparta or of retreating by the line by which he came?

Yes, sir.

Question. Could he not have gone by any other road?

He would have been compelled to cross so as to reach Kentucky by the way of Pikeville to obtain supplies; if he crossed the Cumberland farther east he would have been unable to sustain his army.

Question. Could General Bragg have avoided General Buell at Sparta and continued on his march?

I think not, with success.

Question. Please state to the Commission how you obtained the information that Governor Harris' plan of taking Nashville was not modified until after Bragg's army reached Sparta.

By having a person present at an interview between Governor Harris, Breckinridge, and Ex-Governor Foote, General Forrest, and Andrew Ewing.

Question. At what date did you first consider it certain that Bragg would not take Nashville?

Not until I heard he was near Rome.

Redirect examination:

Question. What is the distance from Dunlap to Sparta?

I think it is 40 miles; but I am not positive of the exact distance.

Question. How far is it from Dunlap to McMinnville?

By the nearest road I should judge it was about 40 miles.

Question. Do you know how far it is from McMinnville before you strike the mountain in going over to Dunlap?

About 10 or 12 miles.

Question. Is it a productive region about there?

No, sir; not until you come into the neighborhood of McMinnville.

Question. How far does this productive region extend toward Dunlap?

Not more than 8 or 10 miles.

Question. Is Sparta in the mountains or on the ridge of the mountains?

It is on the northern slope of the mountains.

Question. What is the character of the country between Dunlap and Sparta?

Very thinly settled; very little cultivated.

Question. Is it like the mountain region on the road from Dunlap across to McMinnville?

It is similar to it till you get near Sparta.

Question. You say Sparta is on the slope of the mountains; how close to Sparta do you get before you come to the productive region in that direction?

I understand, sir, not until you approach within 10 or 12 miles of Sparta.

Question. Would not that take you on the mountains 10 or 12 miles from Sparta?

Yes, sir; those slopes are all cultivated; they form parts of the Cove, and are all cultivated.

Question. Which is the most productive region, that about Sparta or that by McMinnville?

That south of McMinnville; the advantage is in favor of McMinnville.

Question. When you say in your testimony that those guerrilla bands were organized subsequent to the marching of the Army of the Ohio, do you mean that they had no effective organization at all or that they were not consolidated?

I mean that they were not consolidated.

Question. Were they effective as an offensive force?

Yes, sir; from the manner in which they operated in interfering with our communications.

Question. Have you been at McMinnville, Dunlap, or Sparta yourself?

No, sir; I know them only by examinations made by my couriers and by persons whom I sent to those points.

General R. W. JOHNSON (a witness for defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Give your name and position in the service, if you please, general?

Richard W. Johnson; brigadier-general of volunteers.

Question. Were you on duty with the Army of the Ohio in Tennessee in the months of July and August last?

I was; up to August 21.

Question. State, if you please, concisely, the operations of the enemy's cavalry in Middle Tennessee prior to that time and the measures adopted to counteract them, as far as you were concerned.

The enemy's cavalry were all the time during the months of July and August attempting to break up our communications by railroad, in which they succeeded in several instances, and it became necessary to transport supplies by wagons, and these were often threatened by cavalry. At one time it was reported that the enemy's cavalry in large force were marching in the direction of Pulaski, Tenn. The commanding officer of the Army of the Ohio telegraphed to me, then in Battle Creek, to report to him at once in Huntsville. On my arrival in Huntsville he showed me several maps, told me what the enemy's cavalry were doing, and asked me if with the cavalry in the department I could stop the depredations of Morgan and his cavalry. I received orders from General Buell to go to a place known as Reynolds' Station, on the Tennessee and Alabama Railroad, and there assume command of all the cavalry in that neighborhood, and to march against any enemy's cavalry found near that and Murfreesborough. I assumed command on my arrival, and within two days marched by Fayetteville and Shelbyville in the direction where the cavalry were said to be. I found that if any had been there in an organized form they had left, but I found that citizens in the absence of the Federal forces would arm themselves and take advantage of any small force left to guard the bridges on the railroad. These parties would dismount on the approach of the Federal troops, secrete their arms, and be considered as citizens and be loyal for the time.

I marched to Murfreesborough, and on my arrival I reported to General Nelson, in obedience to General Buell's orders. From this point I was sent to a town called Liberty, and from Liberty to Smithfield, Smithfield to McMinnville, and in fact throughout the entire portion of country there, but was not able to find the enemy in any considerable force. I then marched from McMinnville, with 640 men, to a place known as Cookville; here I intercepted a message from Morgan himself, and found that he had left on the 19th, marching in the direction of Gallatin, Tenn. Marched on Gallatin, and met him in that place and had an engagement with him on the 21st. I would state that all the cavalry in that portion of Tennessee was placed under my command by instructions from General Buell. When I reported to General Nelson he divided up the command, leaving me only 640 men. While at Huntsville

General Buell indicated on the map the line he wished to take up, and in order to successfully occupy that line it was necessary to drive the rebel cavalry from between two roads and beyond the line that he wished to take up. This, I suppose, was the object of my going there in advance—to render the road safe for the transportation of supplies. There was at the time I started out a break in that road of about 50 miles by the destruction of bridges, which the mechanics were then employed in repairing. On my arrival at Reynolds' Station I found the cavalry posted along the railroad for its protection at bridges and to guard the wagon trains with provisions. The gathering up of these detachments required the two days' delay referred to in the testimony.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. What number of men would it require between Bowling Green and Nashville to protect it, supposing the inhabitants to be displaced along the line of railroad ?

Fifty thousand men.

Question. An attempt, then, to guard the railroad under those circumstances is simply an absurdity ?

No, I do not think it is. I can take 50,000 and guard it perfectly, according to my opinion, though I cannot operate outside the railroad. My operations must be confined to it alone.

Question. Would the road then do more than supply the army you had to guard it ?

That would depend upon the quantity of rolling stock on that road.

Question. Were these depredations to be feared from the inhabitants alone or from the inhabitants assisted by a few guerrillas, and is there no other mode of protecting the road ?

I know of no other.

Question. What would be the effect of a notice to the inhabitants along that road that the country would be laid waste on either side if they interfered with it ?

Many of the persons who depredated upon these railroads have no interest in the property lying contiguous to it, and a threat of that kind would have no effect upon them. That plan has been pursued in Missouri and was unsuccessful there.

Question. Was the threat in Missouri carried out where it was made ?

I am not prepared to say, but I think it was, part of the time, under General Pope, in his early operations in Missouri.

Question. Do you know of that mode of protecting railroad and telegraph lines having been adopted in Virginia ?

I do not.

Question. At the time you speak of, when you were sent to take command of the cavalry, was there a force in and about that region of country you speak of ?

It was variously estimated. General Buell exhibited to me some dispatches he received, I think from General Negley, in which General Negley stated that 500 rebel cavalry were then marching on Pulaski. General Buell told me, to prevent the possibility of that detachment taking a train which was to have left that day, that he had telegraphed for the train not to start till it was ascertained whether the force was there along the road at different points. I found the officers in command of detachments variously estimated that force, and some I believe that the whole or a great portion of the rebel army was there.

Question. Five hundred, then, is the largest body you know of ?

In answer to a previous question I stated it was variously estimated; 500 were reported by General Negley, but of their actual existence I have reason to doubt. The officers and people along the line thought that that force was there.

Question. Is it possible or is it probable that any large organized force could have been in and about these railroads from Nashville at that time with General Buell's army situated as it was?

They might have been there for a short time, but could not remain there very long.

Question. Do you not know, general, and was it not supposed at the time, that these depredations upon the railroads were done by the inhabitants in a great measure?

I do not know it, but I believe the inhabitants assisted the guerrilla force when they came into the country, and when an opportunity offered they would act on their own responsibility.

Question. Now, if a general of General Buell's known determined and inflexible character had given notice to those along those roads that he would hold the inhabitants responsible, would those depredations have been committed?

I do not think General Buell's order would have had any effect upon those people or any other general's orders. There is a large idle floating population in these Southern States, and such characters as those would not be governed by any order that General Buell might issue. Just such characters General Mitchel had to deal with on the railroad running from Huntsville to Stevenson. He threatened to burn their villages if they fired upon the trains, and several villages or railroad stations were burned, and yet the trains were fired into afterward.

Question. If you had no other than an idle, irresponsible population to deal with a lesser guard would be necessary to take care of the road, would it not?

I think not; on the contrary, a still larger guard.

Question. Why so?

These men having no habitation, they are here to-day and in another place to-morrow.

Question. If the responsible settled inhabitants along the railroad knew that their property was in danger, would they not be guardians of the railroad property as of their own?

Individuals might be, yet individuals might be overpowered by this idle floating population, who would not be influenced by the opinions of some few of the owners along the railroad.

Question. If the settled owners along the railroad were friends instead of enemies, who would give you information of the approach of these guerrillas and who would assist you in putting them down, your trouble would be less, would it not?

I think so.

Question. You speak of its having been tried by General Pope in Missouri and failed; do you know this of your own knowledge or have you heard it?

I have only heard so from the common reports in the newspapers.

Colonel MILLER (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service, if you please.

My name is J. F. Miller; colonel of the Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers.

Question. Were you on duty in Nashville in the months of July and August and September last?

In the months of July and August I was on duty here, commanding the post.

Question. State, if you please, what the operations of the enemy were in your vicinity during that period, and, as well as you can, what forces he employed and with what effect.

Our troubles commenced here about the 8th of July, when the communication between here and Louisville was threatened. The enemy menaced the force at Bowling Green about that time, under John Morgan; perhaps 1,500 strong were reported near Bowling Green. I sent up fifteen companies of infantry and a section of artillery from this place, which, with the troops sent by General Boyle, drove off the enemy and saved those bridges at Bowling Green and Green River. The next trouble was at Murfreesborough. The enemy had attacked Murfreesborough July 13 by a force of 2,000 strong, under Colonel Forrest. Colonel Lester was in command at Murfreesborough up to the 12th July. He had the Third Minnesota, the Ninth Michigan, and Hewett's battery of four pieces. On the 12th General Crittenden took command there; on the 13th the attack was made and the forces taken prisoners. The first reports we got here were that the enemy were 7,000 strong, and to look out for this place and to be prepared to defend it. I had at that time at Lebanon four companies of infantry and two of cavalry. Lebanon is north of Murfreesborough. On hearing of the attack on Murfreesborough Lebanon was evacuated and the troops brought here, and I had two regiments of infantry and four companies, three companies of cavalry, and ten field pieces of artillery. It was uncertain at that time where the enemy would strike after taking that place. We had a small force at Gallatin and along the railroad between here and the Kentucky line. I think there were ten or twelve companies.

I brought down three companies from Gallatin to re-enforce the garrison here, but no attack was made and they were sent back. July 16 we had information that there were a thousand of the enemy at Lebanon, and we expected they would strike the road to Gallatin or beyond there; but on the 17th General Nelson came here with a force of five or six regiments, and he assumed command with these troops. On the 18th he marched to Murfreesborough. About the same time General Boyle asked for re-enforcements in Kentucky, reporting the enemy along the line in considerable force. As General Nelson had not increased the garrison materially no troops were sent him.

On the 19th General Nelson informed me that the enemy were in considerable force near Murfreesborough and sent here for re-enforcements. He had taken nearly all the force he brought here with him. But the enemy did not attack him there. Forrest, with about 1,800 or 2,000 men (cavalry) came in his rear and menaced this place. They drove in the pickets here, but made no attack. They went out to the railroad and attacked the force General Nelson had left to guard the bridges, taking about 80 men at the Mill Creek Bridge and burned the bridge, and then went off in the direction of Lebanon and got away. General Nelson did not get them.

Nothing occurred till about the 27th or 28th of July, when Colonel Boone, who was in command at Gallatin, and I think seven or eight companies along the rear at a place called Pilot Knob, became alarmed and desired re-enforcements. The Thirty-first Indiana was sent to re-enforce him at that place. That was about the 30th July. On the 4th or 5th of August those troops were taken away, General Nelson deeming the force under Colonel Boone amply sufficient, as he said to me. About 10th of August Colonel Boone was attacked by what from the best information I should suppose would be a force of 600 to 700. He was surprised at daylight and captured. It was as complete a surprise as that at Murfreesborough. I went up with parts of two regiments after that to Gallatin and that region, but could not get a fight. Colonel Hefren was in command of four companies of the Fiftieth Indiana, which were posted at the different bridges between here and Gallatin in the stockades which had been erected by General Buell's orders. About the 20th he had from 50 to 60 men in each stockade. About the 20th of August he took his men out of the stockades, leaving about 8 or 10 in each, and went off on an expedition to Gallatin. On his return he was attacked by Morgan with probably 600 or 700 men, and the enemy succeeded in burning three of the bridges; and, the men being along the road, quite a number of them were taken prisoners. The bridges were all burned but one, where a party of 18 got into the stockades and held it against the whole force. If he had left his men in the stockades none of these bridges would have been injured at all in my opinion. Colonel Boone neglected to build the stockades which he was ordered to build by General Buell, and at the time he was captured at Gallatin the tunnel was destroyed and one of the bridges this side of Gallatin. The force along the road was deemed sufficient, and would have been, if the stockades had been built and the men kept in them, as they ought to have been. It was not long after this that the fight at Gallatin occurred between General Johnson and Morgan, the particulars of which I suppose have been stated here before.

Question. State, if you please, the result of it.

General Johnson was captured, with probably 100 to 150 men. They nearly all got away and retreated back to this place. The force General Johnson had was 650 men. I do not know the force the enemy had, but probably more than he had. We were continually troubled here by guerrilla parties who hovered about the country and along the lines, but with no serious results, except those I have mentioned, in the vicinity. I always considered the force I had here sufficient to hold the city, and I think I never asked General Buell for re-enforcements.

Question. Did these large bodies of cavalry have artillery with them?

I think not till after they took the four pieces at Murfreesborough.

Question. Did they do any harm to the railroad after the capture of Murfreesborough?

Yes, sir; they burned those three Mill Creek bridges after General Nelson had gone out to Murfreesborough.

Question. But before his arrival there did they not destroy some bridges in the vicinity of Murfreesborough?

They destroyed a bridge and the depot at Murfreesborough at the time they had the fight there. I do not know what they did beyond Murfreesborough on the road.

Question. Were these principal depredations you have mentioned committed by organized troops in the rebel service and without reference to the inhabitants along the road?

I do not know whether they were organized troops or not; I know they were in the Confederate service; they were understood to be guerrillas. The Texas Rangers were about, too; we knew them to be forces under Morgan, Forrest, and Starnes.

Question. Are those commands not understood to be composed of troops belonging as much to the rebel army as other troops; are they not of the character of regular troops?

Yes, sir; I suppose they are. They have always been treated the same as other Confederate troops and appear to be organized into regiments and companies, and I have no doubt are in the Confederate service the same as any other troops; that is their reputation. Colonel Morgan has been promoted by the Confederate authorities the same as other officers and so has Colonel Forrest.

Question. You did not understand that they were made up of the inhabitants of the country along those railroads on which they had been depredating?

O, no; sometimes the citizens have joined them perhaps, but they acted in bodies as other invading troops, and seemed to understand their business as if acting under orders.

Question. Do you think if in consequence of these depredations you were to lay the country waste with fire and sword on either side of the railroad the depredations of these troops would be prevented?

I do not think it would have any effect one way or the other. I think they are sent out for the express purpose of destroying the lines of communication and supply lines. They are organized for that business; they go mounted, and the troops are better adapted for that kind of work than perhaps any other. As a reason for this opinion I will state that in this part of the country the depredations they have committed have been committed against the desire of the people, so far as I know, and I know the people are complaining very bitterly of this kind of conduct, for they said, "If our lines are cut and destroyed the army in the State will subsist off the people, off the country; whereas if the lines are left open they will get their supplies from the North." I have heard this argument frequently by people who were not Union people. Further, this railroad line from Louisville here was not troubled by the people. There was a time last spring, in the early part of the summer, when General Dumont was in command, when the bridges were not guarded at all and no depredations were committed.

Question. Is this a very unusual method of operating against an enemy?

I think it is very common in the history of all wars. It is one of the means of crippling an enemy, cutting off his supplies or cutting off his line of retreat, and I should think a very good plan of operation.

Question. Is it usual among civilized nations to hold the inhabitants of the country responsible for it?

Not that I know of. I think non-combatants are respected in their rights of property among civilized people.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What force did the rebels have when they captured Crittenden at Murfreesborough?

They had, from the best information I could get, five regiments, that would average perhaps 300 or 400. I suppose from 1,500 to 1,800 men made the attack there.

Question. Was there any artillery?

No, sir.

Question. What number of men had we there?

Between 800 and 900, I think.

Question. Were not the transactions upon the railroad between Bowling Green and Nashville very much of the same character?

I think that as far as Heffren's defense of these bridges is concerned it was very bad. There might be a question in regard to Colonel Boone's management.

Question. Would it have been possible for us to send 1,800 men to break up the line of communication between, say, Cleveland and Knoxville on that railroad or upon any other railroad running through the enemy's country?

Of course it would be possible, but it would be hazardous.

Question. What is the difference between a line of railroad running between this city and Louisville and any railroad running through the rebel country?

The railroad is the same thing in the enemy's country that it is in ours, perhaps as easily destroyed in one as in the other, provided there are no natural obstructions in the way; but it would be easier to get in the rear of the army where there were no defiles to pass or large streams than it would if there were no high mountains and large streams to cross; it would take a longer time and be in greater danger of being intercepted and cut off.

Question. I understand you to say, then, that the character and disposition of the inhabitants make no difference in the hazard of that undertaking?

I was presuming that the question implied that the character of the inhabitants would be the same in both cases; that they would be hostile to the attempting force in either case.

Question. Is there any difference between the character of the inhabitants along this line that has been broken up and that of any other line running through rebel territory?

I cannot answer that question; I really do not know.

Question. You say that a notice to the inhabitants along this line of railroad that they would be held responsible for its interruption and be punished if it were injured or destroyed would make no difference?

General BUELL. In order to save the Commission, the witness, and myself, I am willing to withdraw the questions and evidence as to whether threats to the inhabitants of the country bordering the railroads would or would not interfere with the operations of the army.

The WITNESS. I do not think it would make any difference. I do not think they could prevent it if they were to try.

By General TYLER:

Question. Do you think these parties of guerrillas, as you term them, had any direct assistance from the people along the line of railroad by giving information as to the condition of our troops?

General BUELL. I object to this term "guerrillas" as applied to these troops. They are as much troops as any in the rebel service. I think there is a difference between the cavalry of Morgan, Forrest, and Starnes and what we understand by "guerrillas." I know of no reason for giving them a character which does not belong to them, for they are not "guerrillas" in the proper sense of that term.

General TYLER. There is a letter from Beauregard in which he says he appointed this man (Morgan) for this very purpose, and calls them "guerrillas," and says, "You will hear from them."

The PRESIDENT. They are called "Partisan Rangers," I think, by the Southerners.

General BUELL. These troops are not of that character.

The WITNESS. I think it is possible that some persons may have given them information.

The Commission adjourned to meet on December 26, 1862, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 26, 1862.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Colonel HAZEN (a witness for the defense), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service, if you please.

My name is W. B. Hazen, colonel of the Forty-first Ohio Volunteers. I have commanded a brigade in the Army of the Cumberland since January 1, 1862.

Question. With what part of the army were you in the recent campaign in Kentucky starting from Louisville?

I was in the division commanded by General W. S. Smith, in the Second Corps; it had position in the line of battle upon the right.

Question. Was your brigade sent on a reconnaissance under your command on the 11th of October, after the battle of Perryville?

It was with the advance of a regiment of cavalry and a battery of artillery.

Question. State, if you please, where you went and what you saw.

I went upon the road toward Danville. When within 1 mile of Danville I found a line of rebel cavalry with two pieces of artillery opposed to me. The cavalry were dismounted, and they made stout resistance to our progress. I pushed forward my command, and after skirmishing for half an hour they gave way and passed through the town of Danville, skirmishing all the way. I pursued them about a mile beyond Danville on the Camp Dick Robinson road, when, having executed my commission, I returned to camp. I learned by citizens, and by the report of one of my aides who saw the troops in person, that John Morgan, with from 200 to 300 cavalry, were drawn up in line of battle $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles on the left of Danville, crossing the Harrodsburg road. I saw the principal people of Danville, the most influential people, and learned all I could of them as to their position and force. They all agreed in stating that the rebel forces were then concentrated at Camp Dick Robinson, and there would give us fight. I took great pains in being correct in regard to this information, and went back to camp thoroughly impressed with this belief, and reported the same to General Crittenden, commander of the corps. I would further say that the people of Danville were very enthusiastic in our reception and endeavored to give me as correct information as possible. The people with whom I conversed were thoroughly our friends.

Question. Did you discover any indication that the enemy designed to retreat from Camp Dick Robinson?

None at all that I could discover; no one told me anything about it.

Question. What time did you return to camp to your division?

The same day, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Question. When did you report to General Crittenden?

I reported immediately afterward, in company with General Smith, commander of the division.

Question. Do you know where the headquarters of the army were at that time?

I do not know positively. I was never at the general headquarters.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. That movement was made on the 11th, you say; what time did the army move afterward?

The entire army moved on the 13th and 14th. Our division, and I think our entire corps, moved next day.

Question. How far did you march next day and where did you encamp?

We marched to the vicinity of Dick's River and turned to the vicinity of Danville, upon the Danville and Harrodsburg pike, and encamped there, a distance of 10 or 12 miles.

Question. Do you recollect whether it was on the Nicholasville road or not from Danville?

We marched across the country.

Question. At the time you entered Danville in that reconnaissance did you learn the number of the enemy?

Not positively. I had the same means that we always had—that is, reports and rumors—giving the number of the enemy from 40,000 to 100,000.

Question. After returning from Dick's River how long did you remain in camp before you moved again?

We moved a short distance the next day; the second day the army marched all day in the direction of Crab Orchard; that was on the 14th of October.

Question. Do you know what stores or other property the rebels destroyed at Camp Dick Robinson or do you know if they destroyed anything at all?

I know nothing of it.

Question. When did you learn that the enemy did not make a stay at Camp Dick Robinson?

I think the day after was the first on which I believed they had not made a stand there, but I had no positive information about it at all.

Question. The day you marched to Dick's River did you see anything of them at all?

We saw a few pickets, who fired upon the right flank of our skirmishers; that was all.

By General TYLER:

Question. Did you know the location of Camp Dick Robinson, and what part of the camp did the bulk of Bragg's army occupy?

I never was at Camp Dick Robinson, and know nothing in regard to the position of Bragg's army.

Question. How near do you suppose you were to Camp Dick Robinson on the 11th?

Six or seven miles. Danville was the nearest place.

Question. Were you nearer Camp Dick Robinson on the 12th than you were on the 11th?

We were. I supposed at the time we were about 2 miles from there.

Question. When you supposed you were within 2 miles of Camp Dick Robinson what enemy's force did you find in your front?

I would state that between us and what we supposed was Camp Dick Robinson was Dick's River. We saw no enemy except the pickets that I have previously spoken of. We did not cross the river. There was no force of the enemy on the side of the river we were except the pickets I have mentioned.

Question. Did you at that time drive the enemy's pickets across Dick's River?

We did not attempt to; we paid no attention to their pickets.

Question. By driving in those pickets and advancing to the banks of Dick's River would you not probably have obtained valuable information as to the position of the enemy on the other side?

I do not think we could have obtained any more than we did. The banks of the river were precipitous and covered with woods.

Question. What military information as to the force and position of the enemy did you obtain that day?

I obtained none at all. My position was a subordinate one, and I knew nothing of the object of the reconnaissance nor obtained any information than that I have given.

Question. Who commanded the reconnaissance on that day?

I do not know that it was a reconnaissance nor the object of the movement. I would say that General Smith commanded the troops that I was with. There were other movements of the troops. I think the entire corps moved there.

Redirect examination by General BUELL:

Question. Do you recognize, colonel, that the movement of a fraction of a large army in the presence of an enemy does not indicate the movement of the army itself or the character of the movement or the extent of it?

I do.

Question. Is the position of an army of 60,000 men to be indicated by a point?

It is not. It usually extends over a line of from 3 to 10 or 12 miles.

Question. How much ground would an army of 60,000 men occupy in order of battle?

I would say, without making a calculation, that it would extend over from 4 to 5 miles.

Question. Do you know anything of the character of Dick's River and the ground between you and the position which the enemy were supposed to occupy opposite to you?

I never saw Dick's River, but from the character of the ravines leading into it and from the representations of the inhabitants I should believe it to be impracticable for troops to cross.

Question. Do you know under whose supervision the movements of that part of the army to which you belonged were on the 12th and 13th?

Under Major-General Crittenden's, directed by his assistant adjutant-general, Lyne Starling; he acted more as a guide than a director.

Question. Do you know whether General Thomas moved with that part of the army?

General Thomas moved with that part of the army nearly all the time. He gave his personal supervision to the movements of the troops. I do not know where General Thomas was on that particular day.

Question. Do you know whether the other corps of the army did not move on the 12th, that the whole army did not swing around upon its right, changing its front?

It was my impression that the whole army did move. I had no positive knowledge except of the corps to which I belonged.

Question. What division led your corps in the advance on the night of the 13th toward Crab Orchard?

I think the Fifth Division, commanded by General Van Cleve. I may, however, be mistaken in the date.

Question. Whatever division it may have been, do you know the hour at which it started?

I do not know what division. It may have been General Wood's, which started on the night of the 13th.

Recross-examination by General TYLER:

Question. You say it was impracticable for troops to cross Dick's River. Did not almost the entire of Bragg's army cross over Dick's River after the battle of Perryville?

It is probable they did.

Question. At what distance from Dick's River was the bulk of General Buell's army at the time they probably crossed?

Probably from 12 to 18 miles.

Question. If General Buell's army had made a vigorous forward movement could Bragg have passed his army over Dick's River under offensive operations on the part of General Buell?

I do not know; my opinion is that he could have passed the greater part of his army over.

Question. Do you entertain that opinion in the face of the expression you used that it was "impracticable" for troops to pass over Dick's River?

There is a difference in an army passing over and having nothing to impede its progress, and in an army crossing over having a powerful foe to impede its progress on the other side. I conceive very readily how an army could cross over any ravine in the world. I can conceive that the passage of such a ravine as that, with a strong army to contest its passage, might be made absolutely impossible. There is another fact in connection with this: the order of opposing troops in retreat may be very different to opposing troops in an attack in the face of an enemy; it would make it a great obstacle in one case and very slight in another.

By General BUELL:

Question. Suppose a line like that of Dick's River, absolutely impregnable against assault except at one or two points, with high commanding bluffs on the side toward which the enemy is retreating, is there anything more simple and certain than the passage of an army in retreat in the face of almost any enemy, supposing him to get a certain initiative and supposing him to have time to establish batteries and move them into position?

I would consider it a very easy military problem and have always supposed it to be an easy matter.

By General TYLER:

Question. Has not the passage of rivers and obstacles such as Dick's river presented by an inferior army in the face of a superior always been considered one of the most difficult military problems?

General BUELL. I would suggest that Dick's River is not a river, though it has the name; it is a defile merely. It is not the water that makes it difficult.

The WITNESS. It depends vastly upon the amount of bridging to be done and the amount of preparations necessary. I should consider that a retreating foe crossing a river of that kind, where there was no bridging and nothing to do but move over as soon as it arrived, if they had time to plant their guns to cover the face of their crossing with artillery of sufficient strength I should consider the crossing was certain.

Capt. O. A. MACK (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Captain, state your name and position in the service, if you please, and what position you occupied during the recent campaign in Kentucky starting from Louisville.

Capt. O. A. Mack, Thirteenth Infantry, attached to the staff of Major-General Thomas as inspector of artillery, and have served in that capacity in the campaign referred to to the present time.

Question. With what portion of the army did you move during the few days previous to the battle of Perryville and subsequently?

After the first day from Louisville I moved with Major-General Crittenden's corps.

Question. What was the position of that corps relatively in the advance upon Perryville?

After leaving Bardstown that corps was on the right; previous to that time it had been in the center.

Question. Did you visit General Buell's headquarters on the morning of the 8th of October, the day of the battle of Perryville? If so, please state at what hour you arrived there and with what object you came.

On the 8th of October I was sent by Major-General Thomas to take a message to General Buell, to inform him that two divisions of General Crittenden's corps were in position about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Perryville; that the Third Division was about 2 miles in the rear, still on the march. I left General Thomas about 12 o'clock, perhaps a little later. I did not know where General Buell's headquarters were, and I think it was about half past 1 when I reached there, although the distance was only about 10 miles. I delivered the verbal message to General Buell, and remained at his headquarters for some time.

Question. What time did you leave headquarters?

I think it was a little before 3 o'clock.

Question. Did you return with instructions to General Thomas? And, if so, please state what they were.

I took instructions to General Thomas. General Buell gave me a small map of the positions around Perryville, with the positions of the other two corps marked on this map in pencil, explaining to him their position; also indicating the general position which he wished General Crittenden's corps to occupy that night. The positions for General Crittenden's corps were: two divisions to be on the direct route to Perryville, a little to the right of the road; the Third Division, the division which I had reported on the rear, to take the right-hand road to Mitchellsville, and a brigade of cavalry to precede it. General Buell instructed me to say to General Thomas that he did not propose to attack that evening, but that if he could obtain water by advancing might proceed cautiously to the front. That is the general purport of my instructions, which I communicated to General Thomas.

Question. When you were at General Buell's headquarters did you see or hear anything of a severe battle raging on the left of the army?

While I was going to General Buell's headquarters and while I remained there I heard heavy firing, and I supposed there was an action going on until I reached the headquarters, and was there informed that it was the cavalry under command of Captain Gay and the rebels, with artillery on both sides. I also met General Gilbert and was told by him in answer to my question that that was the cause of the firing.

Question. At what time was this that the firing made this impression upon you?

I heard the artillery during most of the time that I was making the passage from General Thomas' headquarters to General Buell's, and also while at General Buell's. It was during my trip across the country that my impression was that an action was going on.

Question. Which you say was between 12 and 1 o'clock?

My impression is that I arrived at General Buell's headquarters at about half past 12.

Question. Did you hear any musketry firing while you were there?

No; I did not while I was at General Buell's headquarters.

Question. Or anywhere in that vicinity?

Previously to my starting for General Buell's headquarters I thought I distinguished a volley-fire of musketry on several occasions when the wind was blowing strong, but I do not know; I could not say positively that I did; that was my impression.

Question. At what hour was that?

I should say that was between 11 and 12 o'clock.

Question. When did you first hear that there had been severe fighting on the left?

I think the first intimation I received was about half past six o'clock in the evening; I should say it was after sundown. Lieutenant Fitzhugh came over with a verbal message to General Thomas. I recollect that we were on the way back to the place where we expected to encamp that night; it must have been fully as late as half past 6. I would also state that I did not understand that there had been any general engagement. It was still later, after I had gone to bed, that I heard of the death of General Jackson, and that there had been a general engagement by General McCook's troops.

Question. Have you a pretty clear understanding, from observation or otherwise, of the character of Dick's River for a distance of 12, 14 or 15 miles from its mouth?

I have no personal knowledge of it.

Question. Supposing it to be a stream almost dry, so as to not require bridging at all, with high cliffy banks, passable only at one or two points, and supposing yourself in command of an army desiring to retreat over such an obstacle, and that you have high bluffs on the side toward which you wish to retreat commanding the country on the opposite side, and that you have a certain time to get your artillery into position on the opposite side, would you think it a very delicate matter to effect your passage in the face of almost any force?

No; I should not think that the case supposed would be a very difficult operation, the artillery being placed in position to cover the passage of the troops.

Question. Would not the river, in fact, be a security to the retreating forces, instead of an embarrassment?

After the artillery was over I should think it would.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Was the firing that you heard during the day of the 8th of such a character as to indicate a cavalry reconnaissance and would you suppose it to be such if you had not been told so?

No, I should not; it was much heavier than was necessary, in my opinion, for a cavalry reconnaissance.

By General DANA:

Question. When you met General Gilbert on your way to the headquarters of General Buell where was he and how was he occupied?

He was just riding out of the headquarters of General Buell.

Question. Did he state where he got his information of the firing of which he gave an account?

No, he did not; he simply told me that it was Captain Gay operating upon the rebels.

Question. Do you know whether he carried that information to General Buell's headquarters himself?

I do not.

By General TYLER:

Question. Who told you at General Buell's headquarters that it was the cavalry under Captain Gay, with artillery, that was engaged with the rebels?

Colonel Fry, I think. The conversation was in General Buell's tent.

Question. What opinion did you entertain when you arrived at headquarters of the nature of the action going on?

Before I arrived at headquarters I had no knowledge of the remaining disposition of the corps. My impression was that it was a sharp action going on on the left.

Question. Supposing a river with high bluffs and little water, with only one or two practicable routes to pass it, had to be passed by a retreating army of, say, 40,000 men, with artillery, baggage, &c., with a superior army of, say, 50,000 men in their front, what would be the fate of the rear of the retreating army if it should be vigorously attacked?

I cannot tell.

Question. What chance do you think it would have of passing over passages such as those described and under the circumstances stated in the previous question?

There are so many circumstances entering into an operation of that kind one can hardly give an opinion on the supposed case; but I should say that, supposing the troops to be equal on both sides and the commanders equally able, the retreating force labored under a disadvantage; but if he effected the crossing of the stream at which he would be able to cover his rear by the batteries established on the opposite side.

Question. How long a line would a retreating army of 40,000 men occupy, supposing it was operating or retreating on two roads?

A great deal would depend on the character of the roads and the country. I should suppose that on ordinary turnpikes a column of 15,000 men, properly closed up, would not occupy more than 5 or 6 miles, with their trains; they ought not to.

Question. At what distance would these batteries established on the opposite side of the river cover these troops?

With the field batteries in general use now, from three-quarters to one mile; with rifled guns, still farther than that.

By General ORD :

Question. Do you remember whether there was much wind at the battle of Perryville when you rode over to General Buell's headquarters

Yes, sir; the wind blew heavily, but not steadily; it blew in gusts.

Question. Was the wind blowing from such a quarter that you could hear the sound of the cannonading you spoke of better or worse when you arrived at General Buell's headquarters than when you started off while you were on the way?

While going to General Buell's headquarters I passed over considerable high land and on those elevated positions I was sensible of the difference the wind made in the sound of the artillery. When I reached headquarters I do not recollect noticing anything about the wind there; the cannonading was more distinct than at General Thomas', being considerably nearer.

Question. Were your opportunities of judging of the nature of the cannonading while on the road better than they would have been at General Buell's headquarters?

I do not think they were. There was no firing in front of General Crittenden's corps, but all the firing I heard appeared considerably to the left.

Question. Did you mention your impression of the nature of this firing to Colonel Fry?

I do not recollect whether I did or not. I think I said to General Gilbert that thought there was a battle going on.

By General SCHOEPF :

Question. Was not the signal corps in full operation on the day of the battle?

Not on General Crittenden's front. The communication was opened with General Gilbert's corps in the evening. I recollect that during the day some of the officers reported that a signal was discovered on a house far off to the left, and the impression was that it was one of the signal corps, but it was subsequently ascertained that it was not; and no communications were received until after we had gone back to camp. During the night of the 8th and 9th, after the communications were opened, they continued to operate.

Question. Did you see General McCook at General Buell's headquarters before you left?

I did not. I was told that General McCook had been there and had gone back to his corps.

By General BUELL :

Question. According to the history of that day, as it is now known, at what time did the battle begin on the left, and what was in fact the character of the engagement up to the time when you arrived at my headquarters?

My recollection of General McCook's report is that the heavy attack on his front did not commence until about 1 o'clock; but that the firing that I heard previous to my arrival at General Buell's headquarters was principally from the skirmishing and the artillery that was with the cavalry.

Capt. JOHN G. CHANDLER (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By General BUELL :

Question. State your name and position in the service, if you please, and the position you occupied in the Army of the Ohio last summer.

John G. Chandler, captain, quartermaster's department. I was on duty as chief quartermaster in the field of the Army of the Ohio from about July 26 till about 30th October. I was connected with the army before that in the early part of the season, but was detached about three months. I reported at Louisville about the 15th of February, was with the army about a month, and was then detached from it and served on the Tennessee River.

Question. State, in a general way, if you please, the position of the army in the months of July and August last and the means by which it was supplied.

The army was located from Tusculumbia, Ala., along the railroad running from that point to Chattanooga—from Battle Creek near Chattanooga; then from Decatur to Nashville, on the Decatur and Nashville road; and from Battle Creek in the direction of the Nashville and Chattanooga road and along that road. From the time the army crossed the Tennessee River the supplies were drawn from Nashville; both roads were used in the transportation of supplies from Nashville.

Question. State, if you please, what means were used to supply the troops in the positions which they occupied and to get supplies forward to the point from which they would start to advance against Chattanooga, that being the object.

After the troops crossed the Tennessee River to march toward Chattanooga they were supplied from Louisville as the principal depot and Nashville as an intermediate depot, and from Nashville by two railroads, one the Nashville and Decatur and the other the Nashville and Chattanooga road. This was for about a month, for the Nashville and Decatur road was soon abandoned, as the troops concentrated toward Chattanooga, and then there was but one line of communication from Louisville to the depot nearest to the position of the troops, which was Stevenson. The line was about 350 miles. About fifteen days' supplies were kept on hand at Nashville, and about 100,000 half rations, barely two days' supplies, at Stevenson; and this by using every means of transportation that the railroads could furnish, and to do this cars were purchased by Government and put upon the roads. In this state of affairs the army was on nearly half rations from the middle of July till the army arrived in Louisville. The supplies were carried to the camps at Battle Creek by means of wagons, of which there was a very limited supply, as the bulk of the transportation of the army was employed in carrying supplies to points where the railroads had been previously cut; in other words, the wagons were on the railroad far above the army while it was in the vicinity of Battle Creek.

Question. Were these means used to the fullest extent to push forward supplies to the depot at Stevenson?

Yes, sir.

Question. Do you know what efforts were made by orders and dispatches to have supplies thrown into Nashville rapidly?

Generally I do. I know that I was kept pushed all the time to be more energetic, to see that others were more energetic, and to push everybody that I could in my position to hurry forward supplies; that was the cry, as it were. The military superintendent of the road was also at work day and night endeavoring to conduct the road so that the greatest amount of work could be got from it with the limited amount of rolling stock and its poor condition generally.

Question. Were the Cumberland and Green Rivers made use of as long as they were available to throw supplies into Nashville?

The Cumberland was, I am enabled to state. Green River was not used while I was attached to the army?

Question. In what condition did you find the country in regard to supplies; to what extent did you avail yourself of its resources?

Forage was procured in the country. There was none brought by the railroad. There was but a limited supply of forage up to the 20th of August, when the new crop of corn came in, when there was plenty of forage. As far as I was able to learn there was but very little forage in our advance toward Chattanooga after leaving Stevenson. There were no other supplies for the quartermaster's department in the country. There was a small supply of forage brought through from Nashville about the 1st of August, but no accumulated supply.

Question. What was the force at Huntsville during the time you were there?

I should say about 3,000 men at Huntsville and within a mile or two.

Question. Is the country about Huntsville productive?

Yes, sir.

Question. To what distance did you usually have to send for forage for the small force that was there?

From 1 to 18 miles, about.

Question. Do you know what the character of the country is on the other side of the river from Bridgeport to Chattanooga?

I never visited that country, but it has always been represented to me as a sterile mountainous, unproductive country, with bad roads and creeks, and sparsely settled.

Question. Could an army have found anything to subsist on in that region?

I should think not.

Question. With the railroads broken, as you have stated, and the limited supplies, is it your opinion that it would have been possible for the army to advance to Chattanooga prior to the movement of the rebel army toward Nashville?

The difficulties of supplying an army were so great when they were 40 or 50 miles away from that point that I think it would have been almost impossible to move successfully against Chattanooga and supply the troops.

Question. Do you know whether the Memphis and Charleston Railroad from Decatur to Corinth was made use of to any extent; and, if not, why it was not?

It was not made use of to any extent in transporting supplies. There were but few supplies to be drawn from that quarter. That is one reason why it was not more used. There might have been other reasons that I am not aware of.

Question. Do you know anything about the amount of rolling stock and motive-power on that point of the road?

There was but very little of either that was available for our army.

Question. Were you at my headquarters on the 8th of October last, near Perryville?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did you hear the firing of musketry during that day?

No, sir.

Question. Was it the supposition of any person about the headquarters that a severe battle was raging on the left?

No, sir.

Question. When did you first learn that there had been a severe fight there; at about what hour of the day?

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

Question. And how did you learn it then?

I learned it by the arrival at the camp of the headquarters of three or four of General McCook's staff officers, very much disconcerted, who reported that they were hunting their general; that a severe fight had occurred, and that they had not seen their general for some time.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. At the time you mention that the army was on half rations did it suffer?

No, sir; I should think not; they complained, however.

Question. Do they not complain at all times?

Very apt to complain of their rations; new troops particularly.

Question. There was sufficient in the country, with a little exertion, to take the place of what was lacking, was there not?

There was sufficient green corn and a few vegetables, with which they got along; of other supplies for the men there was little or none.

Question. What did you suppose that firing indicated at Perryville on the 8th, when you heard it at headquarters?

I supposed that our cavalry or some part of our army had become engaged with the enemy.

Question. Was that the supposition at headquarters?

It must have been the impression, I should think.

Question. Do you recollect whether it was talked about at headquarters? If so, state what was said and what the speculations of the officers were.

It was talked about. For three or four days previous to this Perryville fight on the 8th our cavalry, in command of Captain Gay, had been engaged with the enemy, and on every occasion and different times of the day firing had been heard on our front, and when this firing on the 8th first commenced it was supposed and talked of as being Gay's cavalry having met some of the cavalry of the enemy up to about the middle of the day, when it was reported about the camp of the headquarters that the troops on our left had been ordered to move forward to some creek, and it was supposed by members of the staff at headquarters that in moving down there they had met some force of the enemy; that is, when this rapid firing occurred. I myself knew nothing of the orders given from headquarters. It was merely camp talk.

Question. On any day previous after leaving Bardstown, when you came up to the enemy's rear, had you heard from Captain Gay a continuous firing extending over seven or eight hours in one spot?

No, sir.

By General ORD:

Question. Did the heavy firing on the left last seven or eight hours in one spot?

No, sir; I think not.

Question. Do you remember whether there was a strong wind blowing on that day or not?

I don't remember.

By General TYLER:

Question. What were the means of transportation that you found with the quartermaster on taking charge at Huntsville?

When I joined the army the infantry regiments were supplied with 12 wagons each; cavalry regiments, about 25; artillery, 5 wagons to a company; division trains, an average of about 75 serviceable wagons. These division trains were concentrated on the Nashville and Decatur road, to transport provisions around the break in the road at Athens.

Question. Suppose that you had had to draw all your supplies from one base of operations, how far, over fair roads, would the transportation have enabled the army to remove from its base?

An army five days' march from its depot of supplies could be supplied with this amount of transportation.

Question. Were you to collect the supplies from the country about where the army was operating, would you not consider this transportation abundantly able to supply the army?

No, sir; that is, with the army moving.

Question. Do you think that Middle Tennessee was competent in the month of October to supply from the country the army we had operating there?

I think it could have supplied an army of our strength, particularly a friendly army, or an army not in a hostile country, where everything is concealed and information cannot be obtained as to where the supply is.

By General DANA:

Question. What time of day did General McCook come to General Buell's headquarters on the 8th of October?

I cannot say, sir; I think it was between 12 and 1 o'clock.

Question. About how long did he remain there?

I do not know, sir.

Question. Do you know whether firing was going on in the direction of his corps at the time he was there?

I think not, sir.

Question. Do you know whether he made any report when he arrived at headquarters that day?

I do not, sir.

Question. About what time did General McCook's aides come to General Buell's headquarters looking after him?

I think it was after 4 o'clock.

Question. Do you know whether they found him?

I do not know, sir; they did not know whether he was alive. They seemed to express great fears that he was not alive or that he had been taken prisoner. They were in a very great state of excitement themselves, and acted as though they were lost, and he and everybody else.

Question. Did General Gilbert come to headquarters on that day; and, if so, at what time?

I cannot say positively; I think he did in the afternoon.

By General SCHOEPP:

Question. You stated that you had fifteen days' rations at Nashville; were they full or half rations?

Full rations. We had a million rations at Nashville.

Question. Was that about the time the army concentrated at Nashville?

Previous to that. We were able to get that start of rations by means of the river; we could not have done it with the railroad; but when the troops were put on half rations this supply sufficed.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. At the time you say you had these rations at Nashville had you any at any other place?

Stevenson was the sub-depot for the troops. The army drew from Stevenson. The depot at Stevenson was furnished from Nashville and that from Louisville.

Question. That was the only place besides Nashville at which you had any store on hand?

We had some at Huntsville, but only for a few days. We drew partly from Stevenson. We brought down some on the Nashville and Decatur road, but Stevenson was for a good part of the time considered an immediate depot.

Question. When you fell back did you bring those supplies with you? There were some supplies destroyed at Huntsville or left there, but I do not know for a certainty. I was not there at the time.

Question. You do not know what amount was brought back?

No, sir.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. Have you any knowledge of the fact that General Gilbert had a perfect line of communication from his headquarters to the front by means of his signal corps on the day of the battle of Perryville?

I do not know. The signal corps were operating from our headquarters to some station in front, but I do not know whose station it was. I saw our own flag and that flag communicate; that is all I know of the circumstance.

The Commission adjourned to meet on December 27, 1862, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 27, 1862.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Capt. GEORGE S. ROPER (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and position in the United States service.

George S. Roper, captain, subsistence department.

Question. State, if you please, what took place in General Gilbert's command from 3 to 5 o'clock on the 8th of October, the day of the battle of Perryville.

General Gilbert's command, consisting of General Sheridan's, General Mitchell's, and General Schoepf's divisions, were in line of battle, the two first in the advance, General Schoepf in the rear, General Sheridan and General Mitchell being about 2 miles from the town of Perryville. That was the position they occupied from early in the morning of the battle. My impression was that the battle was on the 6th. It was after 4 o'clock before any of those troops were engaged. General Sheridan was attacked first, and was supported by two brigades of General Mitchell's command on his right. General Gilbert was in the rear of these two divisions in plain sight. At the time that the enemy attacked General Sheridan's command we were in plain view of the battle so far as our own troops were concerned. The enemy could not be seen from our position. After some twenty or thirty minutes of firing General Gilbert noticed through his glass a movement of the troops on the opposite hill which he did not appear to understand. Turning to me (I was the only staff officer present) he said, "What does that mean; what are they doing over there; can you see?" I answered that they appeared to be changing front. He said he did not understand the movement, and looking around him said, "Who can I send?" I volunteered to go, no orderly being at hand. He ordered me to go. I went to General Sheridan, and, with the respects of General Gilbert, asked the state of the case and the meaning of the present movement. General Sheridan's answer was that he had driven the enemy from before him, and "whipped them like hell!" was added; that General Mitchell had flanked them on the left and was then pursuing them toward Perryville; and that he was changing front to assist General McCook, and was going to open on that battery, pointing to a battery of the enemy which was firing upon General McCook's troops, and that he would silence it in five minutes. He fired the first gun at the battery while I was talking to him.

I returned immediately to General Gilbert with the report of General Sheridan, and he appeared very much gratified at the time, and used the expression, "Now we've got them; now we've got them; now is the time to push everything." Major Wright, of General Buell's staff, arrived then at the position where General Gilbert was stationed almost at the same time, and General Gilbert repeated the message that he had received from General Sheridan and directed him to report to General Buell, with the injunction to push everything. He also sent by a citizen who was employed in the commissary department of General Crittenden's command, Captain Kniffin's clerk, whose name I think is Harry Olds—he sent by him the same report to General Crittenden, with the request that he would hurry up his command.

Question. What did Major Wright say in reply to that, and do you know if he carried that message?

I cannot recall any reply, and I do not know if he carried the message.

Question. Were you at General Buell's headquarters that morning? If so, state what occurred.

I think we were there twice during the morning of the day of the battle.

Question. What do you mean by "we"?

General Gilbert and his staff.

Question. What occurred while you were there?

I do not remember anything occurring in the morning, except Captain Michler and Captain Gilman returning from the front, and the report they made of having run on to a body of the enemy and having drawn their fire.

Question. Was that at your first visit?

Yes, sir.

Question. What occurred the second time when you were there?

The second time that we went back to General Buell's headquarters I think it must have been very nearly 12 o'clock. We remained there a considerable time. I should think we were there nearly two hours. It was while we were there at that time that we heard a heavy and furious cannonading commenced in front. General Buell and General Gilbert, when that heavy cannonading commenced, came from the tents, and General Buell remarked to General Gilbert that there was a great waste of powder there, and directed him to send an order to the front to stop that useless waste of powder. "Stop that firing," that was his expression. General Gilbert called his adjutant-general, Captain Stacy, who wrote a pencil order, which was sent to the front, I supposed in accordance with General Buell's orders to him. It was sent to the front by an orderly while we were there. I think at that time General Gilbert expressed a wish to go forward and General Buell asked him to remain to dinner, which was nearly ready. He did remain and dined with General Buell, but left almost immediately afterward for his command.

Question. State what you know of the signal corps being at work that day.

I noticed a flag station on the hill opposite General Buell's headquarters; there was another on the hill to the right, where General Gilbert was stationed, which was on the right of the pike that runs from Perryville. I saw another station away to the left of our position and in the rear of where Captain Gay had been figuring all the morning with his command, just on the edge of the wood, on the right of General McCook's position.

Question. How often were you at General Buell's headquarters that day?

My impression now is that we were there four times.

Question. State, if you can, at what other times during the day you were there besides those you have mentioned.

We were there later in the evening twice after those I have referred to; probably it might have been 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening; it was some time after dark.

Question. What officers besides General Gilbert did you see there?

I did not see any general officer there that I remember.

Question. Do you recollect seeing General McCook that day?

No, sir; I did not.

Question. What was the command at headquarters about that firing while you were there?

I do not remember anything further than that I have already stated.

Question. Where were the headquarters situated?

Facing the battle-field. They were on the left hand of the pike, I should think from $3\frac{1}{4}$ to 4 miles from Perryville.

Question. Can you state whether General Buell was there all day?

No, sir; General Buell was at his quarters every time we were there.

Question. Were you in the service in Tennessee?

Yes, sir.

Question. State what you know of the supplies, character and quantity, obtained by the army from the country.

During the time that we were making the retrograde movement from Stevenson I was left at Decherd a few days by General Thomas (I was then with General Thomas). General Thomas went from there to McMinnville. I was not immediately connected with them, and did not handle any supplies during that time. I joined General Thomas again at this place.

By General DANA:

Question. What time of the day was it that General Gilbert sent a message by Major Wright to General Buell?

I think it must have been as late as 5 or half past 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. At what date did the army leave Louisville?

I believe it was the 1st day of October.

Question. Are you not certain with regard to the date on which the battle was fought at Perryville?

No, sir; I am not. It has always been my impression that it was fought on the 6th.

By General DANA:

Question. What time of the day was it that General Gilbert sent you with a message to General Sheridan?

It was as late as half past 4 o'clock.

General BUELL. I have no questions to ask the witness, but I desire to express my gratification at his evidence. It is manly and direct, and goes to show, to some extent, that General Gilbert, who in my opinion has been very much scandalized before this Commission, was not altogether negligent and out of place at the battle of Perryville. I have no particular interest in General Gilbert at all. I assigned him to a command because I thought his rank entitled him to it, because I believed he was at the time a major-general, and when the contrary became certainly known I removed him from that command. It was not done immediately, because the movement of the troops made it very inconvenient for the service, if not absolutely impracticable.

The Commission adjourned to meet December 28, 1862, at 10 a. m.

NASHVILLE, December 28, 1862.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Lieut. CHARLES ALLEN (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Please to state your name and position in the United States service.

Charles Allen; first lieutenant, Third Ohio Vols., acting commissary subsistence.

Question. Examine this abstract of provision returns and state whether they are correct or not.

The one signed by myself is correct, and the recapitulation, including the one signed by Captain Little, is correct.

Question. State to the Commission whether that exhibits all the stores then in Nashville.

It shows on hand 31st August 51 barrels 185 pounds 12 ounces pork, 23,605 pounds 12 ounces bacon, 1,086 pounds 8 ounces of ham.

Question. You can state whether this includes the provisions collected from about the country here at that time.

My own statement includes what was actually in my hands at the dates mentioned, and Captain Little's statement purports to do the same with regard to what was in his hands, and the recapitulation includes both.

Question. What I want to know is whether that includes any part of the provisions gathered up about the country?

No provisions gathered up about the country came into my hands directly. Those foraging parties returned nothing into my hands directly.

General BUELL. Make a calculation from these returns, if you please, and state how many rations of meat and bread were on hand on the 31st of August.

(Lieutenant Allen is directed by the Commission to prepare these calculations from the provision returns and furnish them to the Commission).

By General BUELL:

Question. At what time did General Buell's army come to Nashville from Murfreesborough?

I do not recollect, sir.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. When that army arrived do you remember whether rations were issued to it or not?

I issued rations to a portion of it myself.

Question. Have you anything to show how much you issued?

Yes, sir; I have an abstract of issues to the troops. It mentions the dates for which they drew rations and shows the regiments they were issued to.

Question. The several divisions of General Buell's army there had supply trains, had they not?

They usually had them, but I cannot answer positively with regard to that.

Question. I want to know whether rations were delivered to be taken with the army besides those that were actually issued to the several commands?

I issued provisions to General Thomas' division for the purpose of moving.

Question. Have you the papers to show the issues?

I issued on one Sunday to, I think, twelve regiments or more.

Question. I would like you to bring up the papers to show what you issued to the several commands in General Buell's army.

I only issued on provision returns, not in bulk.

Question. Who issued in bulk?

Capt. S. J. Little. Capt. R. Macfeely is the chief of the subsistence department, and he is the proper person to furnish the returns the Commission requires.

The Commission adjourned to meet at Louisville, January 3, 1863, or as soon thereafter as practicable.

LOUISVILLE, January 10, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Examination of Lieut. CHARLES ALLEN continued.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. When you were being examined before, in Nashville, the returns showing the stores in Nashville at a certain time were given you to make out the quantity of rations; have you done so?

Here are the papers given me, and a statement of the number of rations.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I move that these returns be accepted by the Commission.

(Lieutenant Allen's estimate of rations was delivered to the Commission.)

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Explain, if you please, how it happened that you and Captain Little had separate store-houses in Nashville.

I was assigned to duty for the purpose of issuing on provision returns in the city, and had a store-house for that purpose. Captain Little received all stores at the depot, as depot commissary, for which purpose he had several store-houses.

Question. Did all provisions that came into the city pass first through the hands of Captain Little as depot commissary?

Yes, sir; I believe all did.

Question. Your statement shows some accumulation of certain articles of provisions during the month of September. Are you able to explain this accumulation and show what quantities were procured in the country or city?

With one exception all the stores received by me during the month of September came through the hands of Captain Little. I cannot explain how he received additions or what they were during that time.

Question. Do you know the number of rations required in Nashville per day to supply the army at the date, say, of the 30th of August, or prior to that date?

No, sir; I do not.

Question. Are you able to state whether supplies were collected from the country?

During September, October, and the early part of November large foraging parties went out from Nashville for the purpose of collecting provisions; they usually brought in as much as they could carry. They were not regular subsistence stores, except bacon, flour, and wheat.

Redirect examination by General TYLER:

Question. Do you know how many days' rations were taken by General Buell's army when they marched to Bowling Green?

I do not of my own knowledge; only from hearsay.

Question. Who issued the commissary stores at that time?

They were issued in bulk by Captain Little.

By General DANA:

Question. There are issues on returns to citizens; what citizens were they made to?

The issues on the provision returns referred to are to citizens employed by the quartermaster's department and the subsistence department, or any department in the army which employs citizens and draws rations for either.

Question. Do you know whether any issues were made to citizens by Captain Little?

I do not, positively. It is not a part of his duty to make issues to citizens at Nashville.

Question. Do you know of any expenditure of subsistence stores for the aid or benefit of any citizens who were not employed by the United States, or contrabands who were under the protection of the United States?

Yes, sir. Issues were made to contrabands employed in the department and at work on the fortifications at Nashville.

Question. Were any sales of provisions made by any officers of the Government to any persons except to officers, to your knowledge?

No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Question. During the time that the Cumberland River was navigable was it possible to have amassed more subsistence on hand at Nashville than was actually amassed at that time?

In my opinion it would have been possible to have amassed more stores.

Question. Do you know of any instance of wastage of provisions by carelessness or exposure or from any other reason?

I do not.

Recross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. In expressing the opinion that it was possible to accumulate more stores at Nashville, does your mind recur to any case of neglect to make the best use of that means of accumulating supplies?

No, sir; it does not.

Question. Do you know whether orders were given for using all possible means, both by railroad and rivers (Cumberland and Green Rivers), to accumulate stores rapidly in Nashville?

I understand that such orders were given.

Question. Please read from your statement the number of rations on hand at the dates for which they were made.

F. A. SMITH (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and residence.

My name is F. A. Smith; residence, Munfordville, Ky.

Question. State if you were there at the time of the surrender by Colonel Wilder. If so, what was the number of General Bragg's army?

I was in the vicinity. The surrender, I believe, was at night. I was in town next morning about 9 or 10 o'clock. The number of men I do not know only from some officers on General Bragg's staff; they told me they had sixty regiments. I traveled over the encampment a great deal, and from the best estimate I could make in seeing the regiments, having counted many before, I estimated them as averaging from 200 to 700. My estimate was about 400 on the average for each regiment. I came in on the turnpike road; traveled with one regiment of cavalry and met another, which was said to be under command of General Forrest and some other general whose name I do not know. I did not estimate them at more than 800 each. In all the interviews I had with General Bragg I never heard him say what his force was. This statement of their having sixty regiments of men was made to me by Colonel Shultz, of New Orleans.

Question. You can state how your own estimate tallied with the statements of officers on General Bragg's staff.

No one told me how many men they had. I learned that they had sixty regiments. I heard Bragg say himself that they had seventy-two pieces of artillery.

Question. State what you know of Breckinridge's force at that time and where it was.

I know nothing of it whatever only from what General Bragg stated. He stated that Breckinridge was in the rear of General Buell with about 40,000, in his pursuit.

Question. Give the conversation, as you recollect it, between General Bragg and yourself.

I asked General Bragg if he was not placing himself in rather a precarious situation, between two great armies, or was it not a very ugly position to be in. He said it was, and that was just the condition of General Buell, being between his own army and General Breckinridge's, and the only way that General Buell would ever get to Louisville would be to turn off to the left and cross the river and come up on the Indiana side. He also stated that General Buell was a very smart man and knew it himself, and never would attempt to get to Louisville in any other way.

Question. Did you have any communications with General Buell on this subject; if so, what passed between you?

I did, sir. I called to see General Buell at Woodsonville, at night—the same night of the skirmishing of Bragg's rear guard and the approach of General Buell's army at Green River. I told him my purpose in calling to see him was to give him all the information I could in regard to Bragg's movements, for which General Buell thanked me very kindly. I told General Buell everything I knew that would result with interest to the Federal army. I gave General Buell my views in regard to the course, route, and destination of General Bragg's army. My views were made up on that subject from being called on frequently by Bragg's engineers to give them information as to routes and watering places. I told General Buell I thought there would be no doubt that the destination of General Bragg would be Bardstown and that his route would be by way of Hodgenville. I gave him the number of General Bragg's forces about as I have here.

Question. State what comment General Buell made when you informed him of the number of General Bragg's army.

General Buell, in all my information to him, seemed to be very quiet and calm; he listened very attentively and with interest to all I had to say; made little comment on anything. General Buell asked me many questions in regard to the route, water-courses, &c., and showed me his maps. We both looked over them. His maps were good—brought many roads to my mind which I had forgotten. General Buell at that time seemed to be anxious to get couriers to go to Louisville.

Question. Were you present at Munfordville at the time Colonel Wilder repulsed the rebels? If so, state what the nature of that contest was, and, if you know, the loss of the rebels.

I was in hearing of the guns, perhaps a mile and a half off; was in the fortifications in the evening. The fight was commenced at 5 and ceased at 8 in the morning. The loss was variously estimated. A great many who were on the field directly after the fight told me there were a great many dead upon the field. The rebels estimated their loss to be in killed about 150. The citizens estimated the killed to be 400 to 500. Colonel Wilder estimated the killed to be about 350, making the killed and wounded about 700. The estimate made of the force by the rebels themselves was three regiments of infantry, while they had about two regiments of cavalry. I met one regiment of cavalry myself, but did not take time to count them. The fight was certainly very severe; seemed to be an incessant roar of musketry and cannon during the entire three hours. The citizens who saw the fight witnessed it from the cupola, from which they had a fair view of the whole ground. They say the rebels made three charges, and charged at one time within 30 feet of the breastworks. The rebels, it was said, retreated under a flag of truce. The officers in the fort said they acted very manly with the exception of that. I was with Colonel Wilder frequently before the fight. I never saw a man who was more diligent and worked harder to prepare for the contemplated attack. It is my opinion the fort was very well defended.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. What was the strength of the force that attacked Munfordville estimated to be?

I do not know.

Question. What was it estimated to be by the citizens who witnessed it or had knowledge of it?

All the citizens that I heard speak of it lived on this side of the river, and what they saw was at a distance; and if they told me I do not remember what the number of regiments was estimated to be.

Question. Was the attack characterized by great determination and gallantry on the part of the rebel troops?

From all I learned I thought it was. General Bragg, however, condemned it; he said, in effect, the attack was not authorized.

Question. Did his disapprobation extend to the conduct of his troops or to the judgment of the commander?

The remark of General Bragg was that he thought the attack was very unwise on the part of the general who commanded; he remarked that the attack was unauthorized.

Question. How soon after the surrender did General Bragg commence to move his army across the river and put it in march for its destination, whatever that might be?

The surrender was made, as I learned, at night, and the army commenced to cross next day. General Bragg moved his headquarters over in the evening.

Question. When did the army actually march from Munfordville?

They commenced leaving in the morning, the day before the approach of General Buell's army, and were all gone by 3 o'clock. I walked to the depot myself and was upon the field when they were moving and saw a large number of the troops going off. I staid for an hour or two looking at them and talked with many of them, and when the army seemed to be entirely gone I noticed about 20 officers going off in the rear; they were all said to be generals. Among them I saw General Bragg and his staff and General Buckner, whom I knew. Many troops moved a day or two before. Every day there were troops going out, but my information was that they returned until that day, when they all moved off. General Bragg and his staff reported that they were going the day before they did go. Their headquarters were at my house and they packed up their things to go the day before, but something turned up which prevented their going until their final departure. It was frequently reported that in all probability they would have a fight there, as General Buell's army was very close—rapidly approaching them. To screen my family from danger I asked General Bragg to let me know if there would be a general fight. On one or two occasions he said there would not, that General Buell was not coming that way.

Question. Did General Bragg appear anxious to avoid a fight at that place?

I thought that his movements indicated some trouble upon his mind; he was quite restless.

Question. Your estimate of the strength of the regiments was based upon your own observation, was it not?

Yes, sir. I did not count any of the regiments, but having counted many of our own regiments enabled me to form an estimate of what theirs was. I could not pretend to say that I saw all of them coming into town, but I saw a great many; I also saw some of them drilling. I made the remark to one of the most prominent southern-rights brethren in the place that I estimated his force to be about 24,000. He told me that I had overestimated it; that it was about 22,000.

Question. Was this estimate of yours based upon the information you have stated in the course of your testimony?

My estimate was based upon what I saw and upon what I heard.

Question. Do you know anything of the organization of General Bragg's army?

I heard a great deal, but know nothing positively. The discipline of the army seemed to be very fine—great diligence; there seemed to be no idle officers at all; they all seemed to be very busily engaged. They all demeaned themselves very well and the order seemed to be very strict.

Question. Did they have many wagons?

I do not think they had for the number of men; nothing to compare to the number we used in our regiments. Their wagons were of a character that would not attract attention like ours, all being small, light two-horse wagons, though frequently drawn by four or six mules. Some were with covers; others with none, or mere sheets thrown over them.

Question. Was this Colonel Shultz an officer of General Bragg's staff?

He was represented as such. He came to me with some major to procure headquarters for General Bragg, saying he was on General Bragg's staff, and he was there with him all the while and seemed to superintend everything. I think his name was Shultz, but I may be mistaken. He told me he was from New Orleans and had been a cotton-broker. He must have lived there or he could not have answered many questions I put to him.

Question. Were the circumstances of your communication with each other such as to impose upon Colonel Shultz the obligation to state to you accurately the force under General Bragg, or to give you the right to expect he had stated it accurately?

I would suppose that none in the army would hold themselves under any obligation to tell me anything correctly, they all knowing I was a Union man and against them. Those who did not ask me my politics I told, lest they might be mistaken. I asked Colonel Shultz directly what was the strength of General Bragg's army. He told me sixty regiments. I did not press the question further. General Bragg told me that he would not consider it more than a breakfast spell to take General Buell's army, if he would attack him, and that his army could eat Buell's up alive.

Question. Is there a good turnpike road leading from Glasgow to Bardstown, crossing Green River east of Munfordville?

There is a turnpike road running from Glasgow to Bardstown, and thence on to Louisville, crossing Green River 10 miles above Munfordville.

Question. Is, then, the position at Munfordville any obstacle to the advance of an army from Glasgow in the direction of Louisville?

I regard the position at Munfordville as being a natural fortification and a very strong position, yet it is very much out of the way to go to Bardstown from Glasgow.

Redirect examination by General TYLER:

Question. How much nearer can you get from Glasgow to Bardstown by a good, practicable road, suitable for artillery, than by the way of Munfordville?

The turnpike road I would suppose to be nearer. It is about 20 miles from Glasgow to Munfordville, and from Munfordville to Bardstown about 50 miles by the way of Hodgenville. It is 108 miles from Louisville to Glasgow by the turnpike road.

Question. What distance is Munfordville from where the road from Glasgow to New Haven crosses Green River?

It is about 10 miles below it.

Question. Was General Bragg's army well supplied with provisions when at Munfordville?

Mr. Wintersmith, an old school-mate of mine, who was the general commissary, came to me to know if I had some bacon to sell. I told him I had some, but I thought his money would not suit me; and besides I desired to keep it for my neighbors, and if he possibly could I hoped he would excuse me. He said he would do so; that he had provisions there plenty to last him till he got to Hardin County; there he had 150,000 pounds of bacon already engaged. They made many inquiries of me for flour, and seemed to be in want of breadstuffs, and sent wagons out. Their men complained very much of hunger. Many of them told me they had not eaten a mouthful for three days.

Question. On what principle was Bragg's army supplied with provisions at that point?

I do not know, sir, only from what they asked me as to where they could get flour. I had bought some flour from William Carter, 10 miles above, and Bragg's army sent up and got it.

Question. Did or did not Bragg's army rely upon the country through which they passed for their provisions?

I think they did, sir; I do not know positively of my own knowledge.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose General Bragg did not start with a certain supply of provisions from Chattanooga sufficient to carry him into the productive regions of Tennessee and Kentucky?

I do not know, nor do I know anything of the country, never having been over that portion of Tennessee.

Capt. P. P. OLDERSHAW (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Captain, state your name and position in the service, if you please; if you were present at the battle of Perryville, and the position you occupied there.

My name is Percival P. Oldershaw. My position is assistant adjutant-general. I was present at the battle of Perryville as assistant adjutant-general to Brig. Gen. James S. Jackson, commander of the Tenth Division of the First Corps of the Army of the Ohio, commanded by Maj. Gen. A. McDowell McCook.

Question. What was the position of General Jackson in the army at that time?

He was commanding the Tenth Division of the Army of the Ohio.

Question. From what point did you march on the morning of the 8th of October last, and at what hour did you march?

We started early in the morning, at a point distant about 2 miles from Mackville (it is about 2 miles farther from Perryville than Mackville), and arrived at Mackville about 7 a. m. Here we were detained by the delay of one of General Rousseau's brigades, which was receiving commissary stores, and did not leave there till 8 that morning or a little after, General Rousseau having the advance.

Question. State, if you please, the order in which your corps marched on that day and the hour at which your division arrived at the battle ground.

The division, I think the Third, under General Rousseau, had the advance; our division, the Tenth, followed. There were but two divisions in General McCook's command that day. I suppose that it was about midday or later when a body of our division arrived at Chaplin Hills.

Question. Did the whole of General Rousseau's division march in the advance?

No, sir. Colonel Starkweather's brigade having been delayed, as I understood, drawing supplies, General Jackson waited for him till 8 in the morning or later; finding him not coming up, General Jackson moved his division up, and as we approached the battle-field Colonel Starkweather, commanding the brigade, was in our rear.

Question. Did you hear the firing of artillery as you approached the battle-field?

I did, sir; at intervals.

Question. At what hour did the battle begin that day? I mean by that the severe engagement between General McCook's command and the enemy.

I think it was about 1 or a little later—probably half past 1—when we saw the rebel infantry line. I myself was in the front, near to General Jackson, and when we first saw them they were not more than 90 yards from us, in the woods. Previous to seeing them we were firing at long range from two batteries without seeing any enemy, and it was a great surprise to General Jackson and myself, as expressed by General Jackson, that the enemy was near to us. We had time to turn the cannons around a little and fire a few rounds of grape at this short range of not more than 90 yards. Almost in returning the first round of grape General Jackson fell by a bullet.

Question. Was the corps formed in line of battle at this time and prepared for the attack?

A portion of our division was not. I cannot answer for General Rousseau's.

Question. What precautions had been taken to guard against this surprise as you approached the enemy?

I know of none, sir, except from what I heard from Captain Wickliffe, of a Kentucky cavalry regiment, who told me he had a short skirmish in the woods, the same woods we first saw the enemy coming through when our division caught up with the rear of General Rousseau's, which was about half past 11, I presume. Most of General Rousseau's infantry were in the road, with their arms stacked, preventing our farther progress. General Jackson and myself then rode up to what appeared to be headquarters. It was a devastated house, destroyed by the rebels previously. Here we were all discussing matters, not touching upon a general engagement that day, and looking on at the artillery duel going on between General Rousseau and the enemy at long range, the enemy not being in sight.

Question. Was there anything indicating that a general battle was imminent at that time?

Nothing that I saw. General Jackson certainly was not looking for a general engagement. The only thing in the day's proceedings that indicated a probable fight was a stopping of the wagons at Mackville and sending them to Springfield, instead of following the army.

Question. How long after your arrival was it before the corps was formed in order of battle?

It was about an hour and a half. We staid some time at this temporary headquarters. Afterward, I went down the road to bring up the last brigade, which occupied considerable time, and this last brigade was never in any perfect line of battle during that fight.

Cross-examination by General DANA:

Question. Who formed your line of battle that day; who marked it out?

General McCook's adjutant, Captain Campbell, met General Jackson and myself while on the road, and said he was ordered by General McCook to show us our position. He showed us our position for two brigades—the one was on one side of the road and the other on the other—not putting us in any line of battle, but ordering us to rest. After getting to this point, and during my absence to bring up the last brigade, the brigade that had been put at rest on the right of the road was moved forward to the left of the road and its battery opened. Who formed that line I do not know. The line of the other brigade was not perfect. The ground was very rolling, and General Jackson was killed before it all got up.

Question. Did you see General McCook on that morning?

I did, sir.

Question. About what time?

I saw him on the hill on which Parsons' battery was established. He was then looking on and admiring some artillery practice to our left by Starkweather's battery, up a large open ravine, that was firing on some cavalry. It was there I first saw General McCook that day. He ordered Parsons' battery to be placed on this hill, which was done; but I am not aware of his giving other orders concerning the position of the infantry.

Question. Were you present at an interview between General McCook, General Jackson, and General Terrill on that morning?

I was, sir.

Question. Did you hear any instructions given to those two generals by General McCook?

The instructions given were not in any special interview between these generals, but in the presence of some 15 or 20 officers. I remember distinctly the orders being given for the battery to be brought up, and I also remember General Jackson sending Captain Starling and one of his aides to bring up the infantry, but I remember no order from General McCook.

Question. Did General McCook point out or indicate the line of battle to these generals?

Not to my knowledge, sir. During my absence down the road Harris' battery was placed on the right of our line, and between that battery and Parsons' the line was formed, consisting of two brigades, but by whose orders I do not know.

Question. Did General Jackson or General Terrill, or either of them, state to General McCook that they understood the positions they were to occupy and the direction of the line of battle?

I cannot say, sir.

Question. Did General McCook leave the ground only that time that you know of?

He left almost immediately after I heard him give the instructions for the placing of his battery, with his staff.

Question. Did you hear him make any remarks that would indicate where he was going and for what purpose?

None that I remember now.

Question. Do you know whether General McCook sent any message to headquarters, during the time the engagement was going on, notifying General Buell of the condition of things on the left?

I do not, sir.

Question. Do you know of any reason why General McCook should not have sent any message with that information?

I do not, sir.

Question. Did you at the time or have you since acquired any information going to show that General McCook had any special purpose in fighting this action on his own account?

I have not, sir.

By General TYLER:

Question. Was Jackson's division ever in line of battle on that day?

Not in perfect order, sir. The ground was very broken, as stated before, and there was one regiment that had not got up when the rebel infantry advanced.

Question. What was the loss of that division?

I made a report of the loss. I think our total was 5,600, and our loss was over 20 per cent., making about 1,200 men in killed and missing.

Question. What influence did General Jackson's death have on the division; did it break immediately after or keep on fighting?

I do not think his death had any influence on the troops. The troops were all new to him at the time. He was killed early in the engagement, almost the first shot, and was not in a position to be seen by his troops, standing as he was at the moment on the left of the battery. The troops near him were lying on their bellies.

Question. Did this division participate in the change of position that General McCook made in the night by his whole corps d'armée?

I cannot say, sir. At night, when the battle was over, I went to the rear, some three-quarters of a mile or more, to find Brigadier-General Terrill, who was reported to be dangerously wounded. I found him so, scarcely able to breathe, and near his quarters I laid down that night and slept. The next day, not finding our army where it was when I left it at night, and not finding any rebel army on the ground we were fighting over, I proceeded with some orderlies to secure the body of General Jackson, and I did not rejoin General McCook or see him until I had been to Louisville and returned to the army.

By General DANA:

Question. Was there any neglect of the ordinary precautions of sending forward skirmishers or of trying to feel for the position of the enemy?

I cannot answer, as on the day of the fight and the day previous General Rousseau's division was in the advance.

The Commission adjourned to meet January 12, 1863, at 10 a. m.

LOUISVILLE, January 12, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Col. HENRY DENT (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State, if you please, your name and the position you hold in the service of the United States.

Henry Dent; colonel of the Thirty-fourth Kentucky Volunteers. I am provost-marshal of the State of Kentucky.

Question. Colonel, state, if you please, what the feeling was in Louisville and Kentucky generally, as far as you know it, about the time of the invasion of Kentucky by General Bragg last summer and fall, in regard to the danger that this city was in from that invasion, and the feeling that was entertained among officers and soldiers in reference to the arrival of the Army of the Ohio, under my command.

The feeling in this city was very intense, both with officers and citizens; much anxiety was felt for the city. At one time we lost sight of the Army of the Ohio; for about two or three days we could not hear of it. We could hear of General Bragg's approach, but could not hear of the position occupied by the Army of the Ohio. Our forces here were supposed to be green, and that we could not defend the city. I recollect General Nelson sent for me and said he must get a message through to General Buell—he must know where he was and must communicate with him; and he apprehended great danger unless the communication could get through. I found a suitable person; he got through the lines and communicated to General Buell and returned. General Nelson expressed himself as being then safe. Nobody here expected to save Louisville unless General Buell could arrive in time to check General Bragg's army. Our people had many of them left the State; they were warned to do so for the safety of their families. I never in my life saw a people apparently so grateful as they were when they ascertained that General Buell was within reach and that he was their only safety.

Question. Was Louisville at any time conceived to be in danger from the presence of Kirby Smith's force here in Kentucky?

I never heard any expressions from officers or citizens of danger from Kirby Smith's forces.

Cross-examination by General DANA:

Question. Was the communication sent by General Nelson to General Buell prior to the surrender of Munfordville or afterward?

It was subsequent to the surrender of Munfordville.

By General BUELL:

Question. Will the colonel state where that communication found General Buell?

I was informed, sir, by the messenger on his return that he found General Buell at Elizabethtown.

JOHN B. ANDERSON (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name, if you please, and the position you have in the service of the United States.

My name is John B. Anderson; I am holding the position of superintendent of railroads for the Department of the Cumberland.

Question. Did you occupy the same position with reference to the Army of the Ohio during the past summer and autumn?

I did.

Question. State what work you performed on the different railroads in Middle Tennessee last summer to render them fit for the transportation of supplies.

I arrived in Nashville about the close of February or the first week in March; I am unable to fix the precise date. Made an examination of the Memphis Branch of the Louisville and Clarksville Railroad, between the State line and Clarksville, and then returned to Nashville. About the time the army moved from Nashville southward I organized a repairing force, who were engaged first in repairing bridges on the Tennessee and Alabama road as far as Franklin, Tenn. This work done, in connection with General Smith, then in charge of affairs, they afterward commenced on the Nashville and Chattanooga road, rebuilt three bridges over Mill Creek, repaired track and trestles between Antioch and La Vergne, and completed the repairs of Stone River Bridge north of Murfreesborough. The repairing force was then taken to the Tennessee and Alabama road; repaired Duck River Bridge, 600 feet long and 65 feet high; the spans were of 100, 200, 200, and 100 feet in length. The force then proceeded down the Tennessee and Alabama road, repairing the track and culvert at Hurricane, 5 miles below Columbia; the high trestle at Culleoka, 1,100 feet long, averaging 30 feet high, 10 miles below Columbia; then proceeded and rebuilt the bridges over Richland Creek and Robertson's Fork as far as Reynolds' Station, 68 miles south of Nashville, I believe. The force then returned to the Nashville and Chattanooga road and proceeded to erect a bridge at Garrison's Fork, 57 miles southeast from Nashville; commenced a restle work at Normandy; I do not know the amount of repairs made there without reference to the record; then to Duck River and Elk River. When this work was finished the road was opened to Stevenson. The work at Elk River was finished on the 12th July. The force was then ordered to the McMinnville road, but before much repairs were done were recalled to rebuild bridges in the neighborhood of Murfreesborough, which were burned on the 13th and 14th of July by a force said to be under Forrest. I should have stated that no train was gotten through on the Chattanooga road previous to the burning of these bridges at Murfreesborough. The train advanced as far as Murfreesborough and was stopped by an engagement.

During the following week the bridges over Mill Creek were damaged, not entirely destroyed; they were rebuilt and the road opened July 24. From that date up to the 13th of August the Nashville and Chattanooga road was opened to Stevenson. There were further repairs made on the Nashville and Decatur road in order to bring away trains that were stopped between two destroyed bridges. This work was done about the close of August. That is about all the work we did in Middle Tennessee. Between the completion of the line through to Stevenson and the reconstruction of the bridges on the Decatur road, the McMinnville road was completed and put in operation.

Question. Was this work done under the authority of the commander of the Army of the Ohio?

It was.

Question. After the roads were opened were supplies pushed forward to Stevenson and other towns as rapidly as possible, for the use of the army?

They were.

Question. Was the work performed with industry and energy?

It was.

Question. Was there any delay that was avoidable?

None at all, I think.

Question. Was the work performed under your direction separate from that which was performed under the direction or the supervision of military officers, by engineer and other troops?

The work performed under my supervision was entirely distinct from that done by the military. I sent to the bridge at Harpeth River, near Franklin, the first party of carpenters who arrived, who worked on that bridge under the direction of General Smith; then they returned to me. All other work done by my party was independent of military officers and engineers.

Question. At what date were the repairs on the McMinnville road completed?

I think the first train reached McMinnville on the 23d of August.

Question. Did you perform any work on the Louisville and Nashville road?

I did.

Question. Explain what it was, and, as far as you know them, the circumstances which made it necessary.

On or about the 12th of August the bridge over Station Camp Creek, south of Gallatin, was destroyed by the enemy. I sent a portion of my force, who commenced the reconstruction of that bridge, but were driven away. Within the next few days the long bridge at Saundersville the bridge at Pilot Knob, and the bridge at Mansco Creek were destroyed. My force rebuilt the bridge at Saundersville with the exception of the track, and prepared the material of Station Camp Bridge. Either before or after the work at Saundersville they repaired the bridge partially burned over Red River, on the Edgefield and Kentucky road, connecting the Louisville and Nashville road (main stem) with the Memphis Branch of that road at the State line. That, I think, was all the work done previous to the army leaving Nashville northward.

Question. Do you know whether energetic efforts were used to get forward supplies from Louisville while these roads were in operation, and by the rivers also while they were navigable?

I think there were. I was in Tennessee, and could not know personally all that was done at Louisville, though I visited Louisville at different times during the summer. The Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company assured me they were doing all they possibly could to forward Government supplies, and that to the exclusion of other business. So far as I know, supplies were also forwarded by the Cumberland River while it remained navigable.

Question. Do you know whether efforts were made by the commander of the Army of the Ohio, by repeated instructions and injunctions, to further this object; that is, the accumulation of supplies at Nashville?

I know that the commander of the Army of the Ohio did, by repeated instructions, urge forward supplies to the entire capacity of all lines of transportation in use, and that I received from him almost daily dispatches urging the forwarding of supplies over the Government roads southward from Nashville.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Were you with the Army of the Ohio when it fell back from Middle Tennessee to Nashville?

I was not strictly with the army; I was either at Nashville, Murfreesborough, or Decherd, or some other point on the railroad, during the time the army fell back from Middle Tennessee to Nashville. I was engaged in managing trains used in removing baggage and sick and convalescent soldiers.

Question. Do you know what became of the various improvements and repairs that you made on these lines of railroads in Tennessee after the army fell back?

I do not know certainly. The bridges over Mill Creek, on the Nashville and Chattanooga road, were destroyed, but I do not know at what period. I have no definite information from the Nashville and Decatur Railroad.

Question. By whom or by whose orders were these bridges destroyed?

I am not aware that they were destroyed by the order of any one. The Mill Creek bridges, I presume, were destroyed by the enemy.

Question. At what time did you receive those urgent solicitations from General Buell to forward supplies from Nashville into Tennessee?

I cannot fix the date precisely at which these dispatches came, but it was from the time the road was opened through to Columbia; and during all the period that supplies were sent while the army occupied the country south of Columbia it was supplied over those routes to the full capacity of rolling-stock we had. The supplies were carried to Reynolds' Station, thence by wagons to Elk River, and by rail from that to Athens, Decatur, and Huntsville.

Question. At what point and in what quantities did you accumulate stores at that time?

I would be impossible to state the amount without reference to the manifest books.

General TYLER. It would be advisable to have those books which give the amount of Government freight during the whole time the road was opened.

(The witness was directed to bring them before the Commission for examination.)

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What became of those stores when the army fell back from Nashville?

I presume there was no considerable portion which had not been issued. The commissary stores were brought back, to some extent, from Huntsville, Bridgeport, and Stevenson.

Question. At what period did the Cumberland cease to be navigable at that season?

I do not know.

Question. Can you state the quantity of stores taken up the Cumberland previous to its closing that season?

I cannot. I know that a number of boats were in the trade, but what business they did I do not know.

Question. What force had you engaged in repairing the road from Bowling Green to Nashville?

I do not know without reference to the pay roll. I presume about 30 or 40 workmen.

Question. Was that your entire force?

My force at the time we left Nashville was, I think, about 90 men, carpenters and laborers. The main portion of the force came on to the Louisville and Nashville road, some on the Nashville and Decatur road, and some on the Northwest road. At this period I was at Decherd most of the time, or at some other point on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, and I am not positive as to the dates or the numbers employed on these various works.

Question. What time would it have taken your entire force to repair the roads between Bowling Green and Nashville?

On the road between Bowling Green and Nashville, 12 miles south of the State line, a tunnel through the Cumberland Ridge had been destroyed, on which work could not be done at that period, for it did not become sufficiently cool for parties to pass through it for several weeks, at least so I was informed by parties residing there. It required ultimately a night and day force some fifteen or sixteen days to clear the tunnel. The bridges were all repaired between Bowling Green and Nashville in about twenty days.

Question. Leaving out the tunnel, do I understand you to say that it took twenty days with a force of 90 men to repair these bridges?

Leaving out the tunnel, the entire amount of damage done on that road could not have been repaired by 90 men in twenty days.

Question. What was the measure in linear feet of all the bridges destroyed previous to General Buell's falling back from Nashville, and were they replaced by trestle work or by bridges?

I do not know that all these bridges were destroyed previous to General Buell's army falling back, but the whole amount of repairs was equal to nearly 1,500 linear feet, varying in height from 10 to 40 feet, and were all trestles.

Question. State as nearly as you can what bridges were destroyed previous to General Buell's falling back from Nashville.

The bridge over Manscoe Creek destroyed, and rebuilt by the Michigan Engineers and Mechanics; Saundersville trestle rebuilt by my force; the bridge over Station Camp Creek at Pilot Knob rebuilt by the Michigan Engineers and Mechanics; the bridge over Station Camp Creek No. 2, south of Gallatin, rebuilt in part by my force; and the bridge over Station Camp Creek, north of Gallatin (not rebuilt until after the army returned). There was a trestle on the grade south of the tunnel and five bridges over North Drake's Creek, but I do not know whether they were destroyed before or after the army fell back.

Question. What number of these bridges were destroyed between Richland and Gallatin?

Five bridges over North Drake's Creek, and the first crossing of the Station Camp Creek, and the trestle on the grade between the tunnel and Gallatin.

Question. Do you know anything of the turnpike road from Richland to Gallatin?

I do not know, sir. There is, I think, no turnpike road from Richland. The railroad and turnpike roads separate north of Mitchellsville, between Mitchellsville and Franklin.

By General TYLER :

Question. At whose nomination do you hold your appointment?

I was appointed by General Sherman on the 2d November, 1861. The order was reannounced by General Buell after he took command. I have been appointed, by order bearing date November 2, 1862, by General Rosecrans and am now acting under his orders.

Question. Are the expenses of these repairs borne by the General Government or are they borne in part by the roads?

From the organization of my party last spring all expenses of repairs, labor, and material were defrayed from moneys earned on the roads and for freight not carried for the Government and for passengers, except the last pay roll before leaving Nashville. Since that time the expenses have been paid by the quartermaster's department, and I was ordered to charge to the Louisville and Nashville Company the amount of money expended on their road and branches, to be accounted for by them in the settlement of the transportation account with the Government. That order was from General Buell.

Question. Do you make regular statements of the earnings and expenses of the quartermaster's department the same as you would do to a regular company?

I have not made any reports of earnings or expenses to the quartermaster's department, but have submitted vouchers and pay rolls for expenses. Since September 1 I have kept regular railroad books of all earnings and expenditures.

Question. Why have you not made a report of regular earnings as you have expenses?

I have not made any earnings since my expenses have been reported to the quartermaster's department.

Question. What is the gauge on these Southern roads?

Five feet.

Questions. Are all the roads concentrating in Chattanooga of a uniform gauge of 5 feet?

They are.

Question. What became of the rolling stock belonging to the roads meeting at Chattanooga before our army advanced into Tennessee?

I do not know. I presume it was all taken South. We found at Nashville no engine in working order. Only one engine in good condition was found on the Nashville and Northern road, but I do not know at what point. All the engines found at Nashville were so damaged as to render it impossible to take them away.

Question. After the roads concentrating at Chattanooga as far as Stevenson were repaired at the cost of the Government had they sufficient rolling stock to operate those roads to any possible advantage?

There was a sufficient amount of stock to work the roads until the connection was made through to Decatur and Stevenson. By using the stock of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, together with the Government stock, we were able to operate the roads successfully, but were not able to perform as much labor as could have been done with a larger stock.

Question. Had the Nashville and Louisville road as much rolling stock at this time as they have now?

I think not. They have been building cars and have purchased some additional engines. Their stock was inadequate at that time to carry the whole supplies of the army.

Question. Taking a month before Morgan's last raid, what would be the amount of tonnage the Nashville and Louisville road could have been able to transport daily over their road for the Government with this increased rolling stock?

I think not more than forty cars per day through to Nashville, in addition to the supplies for troops on the line.

Question. Is it or is it not your opinion that the public service would have been benefited by the permanent destruction (instead of repairing) of every yard of railroad from Corinth to Nashville that our armies passed over?

I think not. I do not know how the army could have been supplied by wagon trains from Nashville or from any other point on the Tennessee River without those railroads.

Question. Is it not a military fact that from the moment the enemy repossessed themselves of these railroads they had the rolling stock ready to operate them successfully?

So far as I am informed, no. When the Federal army fell back, all the rolling stock was brought northward to Nashville, with the exception perhaps of three or four wrecked cars and one engine, so badly disabled that it could not be repaired. The rolling stock to work these railroads for the enemy would necessarily have to be ferried across the Tennessee River at Bridgeport, and, so far as I have heard—mere rumor—they never did get across that river more than a few engines and cars.

Question. Was Bragg's army supplied at Murfreesborough by railroad or wagon?

I cannot answer the question. My impression has been that his supplies were obtained mainly from the surrounding country, but I have no positive information on the subject.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the country about Murfreesborough?

Not aside from the railroads, sir.

Question. From what you know do you suppose it capable of sustaining an army of 40,000 or 50,000 men?

I think so, but I cannot tell for how long a time. It is a good agricultural region, so far as I have been informed.

Redirect examination by General BUELL:

Question. You have stated, I believe, that while you were engaged repairing the Louisville and Nashville road with your hired party the engineer and other troops were also engaged on some other work, have you not?

They were; having, as I stated, built a bridge over Manscoe Creek and over Station Camp Creek at Pilot Knob, while my force was engaged on other bridges.

Question. State, if you please, what work you did on the different railroads leading from Louisville after the return of the Army of the Ohio from Kentucky in anticipation of its return to Tennessee again.

My force was ordered by General Buell to repair first the track of the Lebanon branch of the Louisville and Nashville road, and then proceed as rapidly as possible to reconstruct the bridges on the main stem toward Nashville. The work on the Lebanon branch was completed and the force moved at once to the bridges south of Bowling Green, and continued that work until the line was opened to Nashville.

Capt. STEPHEN E. JONES (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Captain, state your name, if you please, your position in the service, and the duty on which you are now engaged.

My name is Stephen E. Jones, captain and additional aide-de-camp. I am acting upon the staff of Brigadier-General Boyle; stationed at Louisville.

Question. Have you official knowledge of the numbers and description of the prisoners of war that have passed through this place since October 1?

I have, sir, since my appointment upon the staff of Brigadier-General Boyle, from the second day after the death of General Nelson.

Question. Examine this paper, if you please, and state to the Commission what it purports to be and whether it is correct.

I recognize in this paper a report made to General Boyle of the prisoners received into the military prison from the 1st of October, 1862, to the 14th of December of the same year. It is correct as far as I know.

Question. Do you understand those prisoners to have been from the armies under the command of General Bragg and Kirby Smith, which occupied Kentucky until their recent retreat from the State?

I was going to state, if it was intended to embrace a letter which accompanied this report to General Boyle, that they were the prisoners of the army of Kirby Smith and General Bragg, of the Confederate forces, exclusive of the command of General Marshall in the State of Kentucky at the time; that it is not exclusively of any command, as far as I know, but perhaps inclusive of a few individuals in the command of Marshall, exclusive of any regiment, unless possibly a company known as Jesse's company, which I believed and have since ascertained did belong to the command of Humphrey Marshall. I make this explanation before answering the question, because of a remark which accompanied the report to General Boyle that it was exclusive of Humphrey Marshall's command. I call it exclusive of it, with the exception of that company, for this reason: that the prisoners of that command that reached the military prison of this State were unable to give their descriptive rolls, but simply stated that they were from Marshall's command, most of them being new recruits, and not knowing in many instances the companies to which they belonged.

Question. Do I understand you, then, that that report represents regiments from Bragg's army proper and from the force of Kirby Smith proper and not the regiments under the command of Marshall?

Yes, sir. It also includes regiments under the command of Morgan; whether they were attached to Kirby Smith's command or not I do not know; they were with him, but whether directly under his command or not I do not know.

Question. Please read from this, for the information of the Commission, the total number of prisoners of different grades, the number of regiments, battalions, squadrons, and batteries of the different arms of the service.

There were received in the military prison, and forwarded to Vicksburg to be exchanged, during the period mentioned, 4 colonels, 4 lieutenant-colonels, 5 majors, 42 captains, 120 lieutenants, 415 non-commissioned officers, 2,914 privates, making a total of 3,504. These represented 168 infantry regiments and 19 infantry battalions, 38 cavalry regiments and 20 cavalry battalions, 32 batteries, 2 regiments known by the name of legions (cavalry), I believe, 13 detached companies, or companies that were unattached, these being principally companies raised in full or in part in Kentucky during the present year; there not being time to form them into regiments was the explanation given by the prisoners.

Question. Have any prisoners of war been received since the date of that report?

Yes, sir.

Question. Can you state the number now?

I cannot without reference to my book in which I keep a record of it.

Question. Will you please get that, captain? Had you any information of prisoners of war scattered through the country that never presented themselves or were never delivered at this post?

I have heard of such prisoners through the country from various parties, but no definite or positive information, except through a friend of mine, who during the advance from Bowling Green to this place a portion of the time led the advance and had charge of the paroling of the prisoners.

The Commission adjourned to meet January 13, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

LOUISVILLE, January 13, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Capt. STEPHEN E. JONES re-examined.

By General BUELL:

Question. Have you now the report of the prisoners received since the former report which you have presented?

I have not, sir; that is, not made out in the form of a report, but so that I can give it verbally. Between the 14th and the 29th of December there were received 67 prisoners, of whom 64 were sent to Vicksburg, 3 not being well enough, and there are now in the military prison from the hospitals in the central portion of the State and captured in the month of October and paroled 136 prisoners; making in all, since the report of the 14th of December, 203, of whom 4 were captains, 6 lieutenants, and 21 non-commissioned officers. This is exclusive of quite a number of other prisoners now in the military prison that were captured principally, if not exclusively, from Morgan's command during his recent raid in the State. The number of these I did not attempt to ascertain.

Question. What, then, would be the total number of prisoners received here from first to last?

Three thousand seven hundred and seven.

Question. Are you able to form an estimate of the number of prisoners that have been informally paroled and that never came to this place?

I have no sufficient data for forming any approximate estimate of that. From the report of the party to whom I alluded in answer to a previous question, of the prisoners paroled between Bowling Green and Louisville, I suppose that, taking his statement exclusively, there were about 1,000. He told me he was a party to paroling about 300.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Captain, at what time was this report made out?

As it states there upon the back of the report, the 14th of December. The last prisoners embraced in it were sent to Vicksburg upon the 13th of December.

Question. At what time did you commence a statement of this sort and at what time did you terminate it?

I commenced no statement until the time mentioned there. I commenced the record of them from the day that I was first assigned to take charge of them by General Boyle, which was the 1st of October, they having previously been under the charge of Colonel Dent, the provost-marshal of the State.

Question. What was the object you had in view in making out this statement?

The object in making the record was to have an authentic record of the number of prisoners received, for the purpose of securing the exchange of our own men. The object in making that report was first to gratify my own curiosity, and secondly to furnish information through the papers to the curious at large.

Question. What information did you purpose furnishing by a report of this sort?

The information contained in the report itself of the number of regiments, battalions, detached companies that were represented by the prisoners in the military prison as having been in the Army of Occupation, I believe they called it, of the Confederate forces in Kentucky.

Question. You have given here the different regiments, but have not given the separate commands under which they served. Why is that?

From the fact that the descriptive roll of prisoners, as used when I was first assigned to the duty of receiving and forwarding the military prisoners from the place, does not embrace that. That form was furnished by Col. William Hoffman, Commissary-General of Prisoners, as I understood. I can show that to you by exhibiting a form of descriptive roll used and sent to Vicksburg with the prisoners, to be receipted and forwarded, one copy to the Adjutant-General's Office, one copy to General Rosecrans, and one to be left with the prisoners. I have one of these rolls with me.

Question. You got the information detailed in this from the descriptive rolls, and not from direct information from the prisoners?

On the reception of the prisoners in the military prison each one is called up, and his descriptive roll, his name, and as full a description as the form allowed is taken; of that three copies are made; and it is also recorded in a book I keep for the purpose, namely, a book of record.

(The Commission directs that all the rolls from which the abstracts presented are made be brought before them.)

The WITNESS. If the call is for rolls similar to this, that is impossible to get short of Washington City or General Rosecrans. Of the three rolls made out in a form like this, one is sent to Washington, one to General Rosecrans, and one to Vicksburg, and a copy I have in my book. The book I can produce. I have these rolls on hand from the fact that the prisoners there named are in the military prison; but when they go the rolls go with them. I have only the book, and from it the report is made.

By General TYLER:

Question. Can you not from your books and papers trace these prisoners to Kirby Smith's or Bragg's army or Breckinridge's army corps?

I could not answer that question positively without the book before me. My impression is that I only trace them to Bragg's and Kirby Smith's, and, as I stated yesterday, to the command of Morgan, which from the best information I could receive is not exactly attached to either.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. How many of these prisoners were captured in the battle of Perryville?

This roll shows, as the court will see upon examination of it, when and where each prisoner was captured. It does not show that any prisoner was captured in any fight; it only shows the place, when, and where.

Question. It appears from your reply that all those prisoners that were captured were stragglers?

I would suppose from the form of the roll that it could not show anything in regard to that, whether they were captured in one way or another. The form furnished me was to show when and where; how captured, is not shown in any of the rolls.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. Does it show by whom captured?

No, sir.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You will furnish for the benefit of the Commission a copy similar to this. I observe some things upon your report which I do not understand; probably you can explain. For example, the Tennessee regiments, as reported here, run up to One hundred and fifty-four; can you give any explanation of that fact?

I can give the explanation given by a number of prisoners to me in answer to a similar interrogatory put to them. It is this: Upon the formation of the regiments in Tennessee there arose a dispute as to which should be called First. One regiment claiming to be the First was assigned to some lower number, but refused to accept it, and perhaps petitioned for the privilege of being called by the number of its militia organization in the State. In that way a regiment appears upon all the records as One hundred and fifty-fourth, and, for a reason I can scarcely [understand] myself, a number of prisoners have asserted that there were two, and some three, of those regiments known as One hundred and fifty-fourth; a number giving on the rolls One hundred and fifty-fourth Senior and One hundred and fifty-fourth Junior; but they stated that the regiments did not run from one up to that number.

By General DANA :

Question. Are we to understand that One hundred and fifty-four, wherever it occurs upon your roll, is not necessarily the same regiment after all, but may, on the contrary, represent two or three regiments ?

It is indicated upon the report two regiments; indicated by the number, one junior and one senior, as given me by the prisoners.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. Did you not learn from the same source, captain, that the militia regiments of Tennessee and Kentucky after being consolidated by General Bragg or Kirby Smith would still retain their original militia numbers ?

My impression is that this was an exceptional case.

Question. Do you claim that there is nothing in this report that would indicate the force under Bragg and Kirby Smith ?

No, sir; I do not claim that it contains any further information than that which it bears upon the face of it; that is, the different regiments, &c., from which one or more numbers have been in the military prison here in the city.

Redirect examination by General BUELL :

Question. Have you any reason to doubt, captain, that the regiments represented on that report actually formed part of the rebel force that was in Kentucky in the months of September and October last ?

I have not. I have supposed from their appearing in the military prison and from conversations among the prisoners at different times when I have been among them that they were all from regiments that were actually represented in the State.

Question. Is it not quite possible, if not probable, that there may have been regiments in that force not represented in that report ?

I would suppose, from the fact that there was but a single engagement in the State in which, as I understood from various sources, both from reports on the other side as well as our own, the entire force of the Confederates was not represented in that action, it would be likely that there would be regiments from whom no prisoners came into our possession. Of that, of course, I know nothing; it is mere supposition.

Question. Are any of the peculiarities of the information embraced in the rolls which you have presented to the Commission—its completeness or incompleteness—due to the forms which have been furnished for your special observance in furnishing this information ?

The variety is largely owing to the forms of the rolls, somewhat to the fact that no idea was ever entertained of the rolls being called for or required for any purpose but identifying any party that was once paroled taking up arms without having been duly discharged.

Question. I speak of the form of the information generally, such as the company and regiment of the prisoner and the time and place where he was captured. I do not refer to exceptional cases where even this information is not given.

If I understand General Buell's question aright, that is, why the information is not more complete, why it does not embrace the brigade, division, and corps of the prisoner, then it is entirely owing to the fact that this was never embraced in any form for making out descriptive rolls of prisoners.

Question. Was a copy of that report furnished to General Rosecrans?

That I cannot answer. I furnished them to General Boyle, and I know only of the disposition made of three of them. There were perhaps six or seven made out, but what disposition he made of the others I cannot tell.

Question. Can you get that information; and, if so, be enabled to inform the Commission with what view that report was furnished to General Rosecrans?

I presume General Boyle can give the information, and also the object he had in view in forwarding them to the different parties.

Recross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Captain, in a march of two months after an army short of provisions and distressed by fatiguing marches was it not likely that our army would pick up as stragglers or sick or take as prisoners representatives of nearly every regiment in the army?

In reply to that I would state that, from information received both from Confederate officers and privates and from citizens of the country through which General Bragg's army passed, such a thing as a straggler was not known. That is the concurrent testimony as far as I have received it from those three sources; that men were mercilessly shot that did not keep within the ranks, and sometimes, as their surgeons have reported to me, it was cruelly and mercilessly done when they were not able to keep up with the column. This was with respect to Bragg's army. In regard to General Smith's, I can only say I know nothing in regard to it beyond the statement of all the citizens of the country through which they passed that the discipline of the army was exceedingly exact, and that the men were kept in all that pertained to discipline very rigidly together. These things were made matters of complaint among officers and soldiers, and particularly among the surgeons of Bragg's army.

Question. Did you gather from that that General Bragg had no sick or wounded; of if he had that he shot them?

My answer had no reference to sick, but to stragglers on the march. Of the sick, I know not what disposition was made of them, whether they were transported or left in hospitals. As to the army itself, there was no straggling. As regards what would be picked up in the march of the two armies, of those who were sick and unable to keep up, I could not form a definite opinion unless I had some definite information as to the lines of march of the two armies; whether one followed immediately after or preceded or passed parallel at some distance from the other. The army following in the same line of march would of course pick up all the stragglers, if there were any and all the sick that were left behind; if they marched parallel and at some distance apart, few, if any, would fall into the possession of the other army. The first prisoners that we received came from a Georgia regiment; they were captured at New Haven. No prisoners that I know of were received or came afterward to this place that were captured below or south of New Haven; and in regard to those that were left in the hospitals or picked up in the march through Central Kentucky, I suppose there would be a large number; but whether they would represent all the regiments I could not perhaps form so good an idea as the court itself.

By General SCHOEPPF:

Question. Captain, what was your position during the invasion of General Bragg?

At the time of Kirby Smith's invasion of Kentucky, which preceded somewhat that of Bragg, I was in the vicinity of Lexington upon sick furlough. Immediately upon hearing of the approaching invasion I reported to General Wallace, and was by him ordered upon the staff of Maj. Gen. C. [M.] Clay. I went with him to Richmond. When General Nelson relieved General Wallace and came to Richmond he relieved me of duty upon the staff of General Clay and ordered me to report to himself. I was upon his staff until the time of his death; after the battle of Richmond, and after his being wounded, acting under General Gilbert up to the time of General Nelson's return from Cincinnati, where he went after being wounded, when I reported to him and was upon his staff to the time of his death.

Question. What was the strength of Kirby Smith's force at that time?

I could give no definite information. It was variously estimated at from 12,000 to 20,000; perhaps as high as 30,000.

Question. What estimate did General Nelson place upon it?

I am not sure that I can give that. My impression is that it was in the neighborhood of 20,000 to 25,000. I think, perhaps, that some of the official papers of General Nelson's would show what estimate he placed upon it. I think there are official papers published in reference to the battle that give his estimate.

Question. What orders did General Nelson give in regard to the removal of the women and children from Louisville during the invasion by Bragg?

General Nelson gave orders for the women and children to be removed from Louisville within the space of twenty-four or forty-eight hours. If they were not removed within that time they were not to be allowed to go.

Question. Did the women and children comply with that order?

Large numbers of them did; but what proportion of the women and children in the city complied I could not tell. Large numbers went and large numbers remained.

Question. Was there any panic or scare among the military men here for the safety of Louisville during the invasion of Bragg?

I do not think there was a panic among the military men, but there was serious apprehension. There was a very great panic among the citizens, and of course some officers and some soldiers participated in the panic, but not, I think, generally. A deep-settled apprehension rested upon them, but not in the form of a panic.

Commission adjourned to meet January 14, at 10 o'clock a. m.

LOUISVILLE, January 24, [?] 1863.

Captain JONES' examination continued, as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Captain, have you been able to comply with the order of the Commission with reference to the amending of your report?

I have not been able to comply with it fully, as that is impossible. I have made a sort of supplementary report, that will show, as nearly as the records will furnish, the data for what I supposed to be the object of the order. I have made a report of the place and date of capture as far as I could from the data I have had before me in my books of record, and when it was not possible to give the date of capture, the date of the shipment of prisoners from this point, beginning with those shipped previous to the 12th of November and then those between the 12th and 18th of November, and so on up to the 14th of January, including some forty-one counties.

Question. State, if you please, what number of prisoners out of those you report were captured subsequent to the battle of Perryville.

I could not do that with certainty. This report shows those that were sent from this point subsequent to the battle of Perryville, but I could not state from the records the exact number; I could only give my own impressions as to the proportion of those who were captured subsequent to the battle of Perryville. By an examination of the first book of record that I attempted to keep on taking charge of the prisoners, the mode in which it was kept and the objects which I had in view, the reasons will appear why I have not been able to comply with the order. To the 12th of November the record simply shows the company and regiment and the time of shipment. I received the attestation—to make it somewhat official and binding upon the Confederate authorities—of the Confederate officers of the regiments, where it was possible to obtain it, to which the prisoners belonged; and where they had no officer of the regiment, then a commissioned officer of the State in which the prisoners volunteered; in some few instances the signature of the party himself. For instance, beginning with the first, as I stated to the court, the Third Georgia Regiment, captured at New Haven. I have the attestation of the parole of Colonel Crawford, who commanded the regiment. That was previous to the battle of Perryville. Some 270 or 280, an entire regiment, was captured at New Haven.

Question. The places are always given where those prisoners were captured, are they not?

Those captured previous to the 12th of November are not given; but I suppose I have all the evidence that was requisite to secure an exchange and to secure detection of any one attempting to re-enter the service without having been formally exchanged. The rolls made were forwarded, one to Washington and one to Vicksburg, and no copy kept. Subsequent to the 12th of November the place and date of capture are exhibited.

Question. State as nearly as you can, from such data as you possess, what proportion of those prisoners reported to us were taken previous to the Perryville fight.

My impression is that there were not over 400 taken previous to the Perryville fight.

Question. Do you know, officially or otherwise, the number of prisoners taken in this late fight at Murfreesborough and the regiments they represented?

Only through what I have seen in the newspapers.

By General TYLER:

Question. Does the report which you furnish to the Commission show the prisoners taken by General Buell's army proper, by General Morgan at Cumberland Gap or those at Clarksville, General Granger near Lexington, and General Rosecrans' army in Tennessee; does it embrace all these commands?

My impression is, though I cannot state positively, that there are none embraced in the report that were captured by General Morgan at Cumberland Gap, from the fact that there were no means of forwarding such prisoners to this place. There might possibly have been some few captured by him on his retreat from the Gap to the Ohio River, when followed by John Morgan, in command of the Confederate forces, but I am not positive whether there were any or not. Those on the east and north of Lexington were probably captured by General Granger's forces, or by the colonel in command of the Eastern District of Kentucky, or in some cases by Home Guards, and in some cases the prisoners gave themselves up, and a large number of these were released on parole. Most of these are not probably recorded here, from the fact that by General Boyle's orders Colonel Dent was ordered to administer the oath to them and release them. My impression is that those captured north and east of Lexington were captured by forces not connected with General Buell's army. Those captured in the counties of Woodford, Franklin, Jessamine, Madison, Garrard, Lincoln, and the counties between that and the Cumberland Gap, as far, perhaps, as London on one road and Goose Creek Works road on the other, were captured by forces acting under General Buell's orders. Whether those captured in the county of Scott were captured by General Buell's forces or by those of General Granger I could not state, because I do not know whether any of General Buell's forces went beyond Lexington in that direction. My belief, from the best of my information is that all those captured in Lexington and in Fayette County were captured by the cavalry of General Buell's forces, that I understood visited Lexington at some time before the arrival of General Granger's forces there. There were also prisoners received, after the Army of the Ohio marched back into Tennessee, from Colonel Bruce and from perhaps one or two other officers; some perhaps from Colonel Foster. With the knowledge that the court must have of the line of march pursued by General Buell's forces in Kentucky they can, by an examination of this report, seeing the places from which the prisoners came and by whom taken, draw as correct an inference as I can give them. The prisoners I referred to were captured at Corinth, Fort Donelson, Mill Springs, and other places. Some four or five of them, that I think of, were forwarded from this place subsequent to the time that General Buell's army left Louisville and most of them very recently. Those were prisoners captured previous to the agreement for exchange between the United States and the Confederate authorities. At the time of that movement they were unable, from disease or from the effects of their wounds, to be sent back, and have therefore remained in our lines up to the present time. One that I remember that was captured at Mill Springs was not able to be moved from that place until some three or four weeks since.

By General SCHOEPP:

Question. The report here furnished to the Commission shows a certain number of prisoners, as stated in your previous testimony, but here are six pages, embracing about 400 prisoners, without any marks showing from what regiments they are. Where do you get your report from?

If you will look at the bottom of those blank pages and see by whom the parole of those prisoners is attested that will show where I got it. When it is not indicated in the regiment column what regiment they belonged to they are the prisoners of the Third Georgia Cavalry, and at the bottom is the attestation of Martin J. Crawford colonel Third Georgia Cavalry, that upon a certain day they were paroled:

"—— ——— is paroled by me this 15th Oct., 1862.

"STEPHEN E. JONES,
"Captain, Louisville, Ky.

"Attestation:

"MARTIN J. CRAWFORD,
"Colonel Third Georgia Cavalry."

By General BUELL:

Question. How many of the prisoners included in your report were captured at Fort Donelson and Corinth, and do those prisoners belong to regiments which are not otherwise represented as part of the force which invaded Kentucky last summer?

There appear here to be 3 prisoners forwarded from this place that were captured at Corinth, and 1 I remember, as I stated, was captured at Mill Springs, and 1 at Fort Donelson. The 1 captured at Mill Springs belonged, I think, to the First Tennessee Regiment, represented by quite a number of prisoners. Of the 3 captured at Corinth I cannot now state what regiments they belong to or whether these regiments are represented at all. I can ascertain by looking over the parole-book whether those regiments to which they belong are otherwise represented here. Although it is not strictly in answer to the question of General Buell, it is a statement which I ought to make in explanation of the present report, namely, that it embraces more than the report previously made, that is, in point of numbers; it embraces several hundred prisoners that had been shipped from this place subsequent to the time the last report was made out and have been recorded since. Of those I have not attempted to find out the regiments represented by them, but I know from having counted them hurriedly this morning that some 35 of the privates and from 6 to 8 of the officers have come down from the hospitals at Perryville, counting Harrodsburg, Danville, and Perryville—places lying 10 miles distant from each other, and the hospitals being in common. There are 45 from those three places that did not appear in the other report, and altogether there is an increase of several hundred. I do not know the exact number between this last report and the former for the reasons I have explained. The discrepancy would appear singular to the court without explanation, and I make it in justice to myself and the accuracy of the report.

Question. Do you mean to say that there were 5 prisoners, 3 from Corinth, 1 from Fort Donelson, and 1 from Mill Springs included in your original report as presented to the Commission?

Yes, sir; these 5 went into the number of the former report.

Question. Can you ascertain now whether those 5 prisoners belonged to the regiments which are not represented as belonging to the force which invaded Kentucky last summer?

I do not know what State the 3 from Corinth are from; the 1 from Mill Springs and the 1 from Fort Donelson were from Tennessee regiments. I remember that fact from having known one of them previously and the other remained in the city some time before he was sent off. It would take me some time to ascertain and answer correctly. I find (examining the report) that one of the regiments represented as not invading Kentucky is represented by other prisoners.

General BUELL. I wish you to get that information for the Commission, captain.

Question. Are the prisoners that you say came from Clarksville, from Colonel Foster's command, and perhaps from other parts of General Rosecrans' force included in your original report?

Some of them are and some of them are not. My impression is that there are not a great number of them. In addition to this report which I now offer to the court by their direction I made out a list of the regiments represented at some four or five of the principal points—that is, where the largest number of prisoners were taken—which I left in my book here in this room when I came up some two days since expecting to be examined. That I do not find, and I have with me only a list of those regiments represented by the 952 prisoners who appear in this report under the head of “Place and date of capture not recorded.”

Question. Can you ascertain how many of them and whether they belonged to regiments which are otherwise represented as a part of the force which invaded Kentucky last summer?

The nearest answer to that question would be to make out a report of the regiments represented at each of the various places mentioned in this report. It would require considerable time to do that; more than it has required to make out this other report, but it can be done.

Question. What is necessary to obtain an answer is to ascertain the number of those prisoners by referring to your reports, to observe the regiment to which they belong, then to refer to your previous report of prisoners captured in Kentucky belonging to regiments which formed part of the invading force, and thus ascertain whether there are regiments in the one class which are not represented in the other. Will that take long?

I could not tell how long; I will attempt to do it if the court wishes it.

If you please, get that information, captain.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. You may present it in a written statement.

General BUELL. State, if you please, what you understand the order of the Commission to have been with reference to the information you had to furnish on this occasion, captain, and state in what particulars the information you have furnished falls short of that which was required.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I object to that question.

General BUELL. On what ground?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I beg to state, Mr. President, that we have worked our recorder till he is fatigued and I suggest an adjournment.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, February[?] 14, 1863.

Capt. S. E. JONES' examination continued.

General DANA. If I remember aright, when Captain Jones was last examined the court was adjourned on an objection. I move that the record be referred to and read.

(The portion of the record referred to was read.)

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I withdraw my objection to that question if General Buell wishes to put it.

General DANA. I move that the last question be read to Captain Jones.

(The question was read.)

General SCHOEPF. I object to General Buell's reading a private letter while the whole Commission is waiting for the transaction of business. The question was read, and I want to have it answered, now that the witness is waiting.

General BUELL. Out of deference to the Commission as a body I will state in answer to the objection that I am reading a paper connected with the investigation and the testimony of the witness now before the Commission.

General SCHOEPF. The question was read to the witness, who has nothing else to do but to answer it, and if General Buell is not prepared to listen to the answer let him state so before the Commission.

General BUELL. I shall be prepared in a very few minutes. (After a pause.) You may proceed.

Captain JONES. I suppose the object of the question—

General TYLER. I wish the court may be cleared.

(The court was cleared.)

Captain JONES. I understood the object of the question to be to ascertain as far as possible the number of prisoners captured by the army under the command of General Buell from the time General Bragg crossed the Tennessee River at Chattanooga and from General Smith's army from the time it crossed the Cumberland Mountains till it went out of Kentucky and to separate the prisoners belonging to one corps from those belonging to another. The report falls short of that in not being able to distinguish the respective commands to which the different prisoners belong, I being not guided in my inference in that respect by the time and position of the prisoners when captured, and, as I stated in my examination, I was compelled to leave the court to draw their own inferences from the same sources.

General BUELL. Has the witness correctly explained what was required of him?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir.

General BUELL. A part of the witness' answer to a previous question by the judge-advocate, which made my question appropriate and necessary, has not been recorded. The witness commenced with saying that if he remembered the instructions given, and he believed he did, though he had no copy of the instructions—and it will be remembered also that none could be found for him to refer to—then he could answer so and so. It was that which made it necessary that it should be explained wherein his evidence fell short of what might have been required of him. I now present to the Commission in evidence the statement which was furnished by Captain Jones subsequent to his last examination with reference to the number of regiments that are represented by the prisoners of war that have been brought into Louisville and sent off for exchange.

The PRESIDENT. (To the witness.) Is that paper introduced by you in accordance with the direction of the court?

Captain JONES. It is a paper forwarded by me to the president of the court as a portion of the papers intended to form the report that I was ordered to make when I was last before the Commission.

(Report referred to marked A of Captain Jones' papers.)

General BUELL. In this report (marked B) you have designated certain regiments as not being represented by prisoners captured in Kentucky. Please to examine that statement, captain, and see whether one at least of these regiments is not actually represented on the same report by prisoners captured.

Captain JONES. I find here the Forty-ninth Tennessee, which I have reported as not represented as among the regiments captured in Kentucky, represented by the prisoners from regiments captured in Nelson County; but whether that is a mistake in having it represented as among those not captured in Kentucky or whether it is a mistake in having it represented as among those captured in Nelson County I cannot tell, not having that evidence before me. In looking over it as hurriedly as I am compelled to do before the court that is the only instance of the kind I notice.

By General BUELL:

Question. State when those prisoners were captured which belonged, to regiments supposed not to be represented by prisoners captured in Kentucky and how many at each place.

There were 3 captured in Mississippi; Fort Donelson, 1 or 2 (I speak only from recollection); Mill Springs, Ky., 1. The balance of those not captured in Kentucky were captured in Tennessee, principally at Gallatin and in the vicinity, I think, of Nashville. The whole number reported here captured out of the State is 215; of these 57, possibly more, were brought in subsequent to the report that was first made of prisoners captured and subsequent to my first examination by the court.

Question. When were the others brought in ?

Nineteen were brought in previous to the 12th November and subsequent to the 1st of October, the time at which my report of prisoners begins; 18 between the 12th of November and the 18th of November; 36 between the 18th and 29th of November; 14 between the 29th of November and the 5th of December; 53 between the 5th of December and the 13th of the same month; 15 between the 13th December and the 29th of the same month; and 57 between the 29th of December and the 14th of January; making, I think, 72 subsequent to my first examination by the court. That is exclusive of 3 that were captured in Mississippi, which came in previous to the 12th of November and subsequent to the 1st of October, and 1 between the 5th December and the 13th of the same month.

Question. Now, can you identify more precisely the place, with the date of capture, of these several batches; I mean those represented as not having been captured in Kentucky ?

I could with the aid of my parole-book. I did not suppose it was necessary in making out the report, as there is a large number of names of insignificant places which I could not find on the map but only know they were in Tennessee; and the majority of the prisoners being in the vicinity of the two places I did mention I did not copy in the report any of the names of places at which the prisoners were captured in Tennessee.

Question. Mention, if you please, in the vicinity of what places the majority of the prisoners were taken—as many as you remember ?

The majority of the prisoners, according to my recollection, were taken in the vicinity of Nashville and Gallatin. There were also prisoners from Franklin, from Murfreesborough, perhaps from Shelbyville. Those, I believe, were all the places whose names I now remember.

Question. Were they generally cavalry or infantry regiments ?

That I could not answer. My attention was not called to it and my memory is not therefore charged with it.

Question. Is there anything that would indicate to your mind that they belonged to cavalry regiments and which operated upon the borders of Kentucky at the time of the invasion of the State by Bragg ?

I do not think I could answer your question, sir.

Question. How does this last report of yours affect the statement made in the first as to the number of regiments, battalions, squadrons, batteries, and companies that belonged to the force which invaded Kentucky last summer and fall ?

Excluding the Forty-ninth Tennessee, about which I am uncertain, it appearing both among those captured out of and among those captured in the State, there are five less infantry regiments represented in the State than those embraced in the first report; one cavalry battalion less and one cavalry regiment more; batteries the same; one infantry battalion more.

Question. What reasons have you heard given by persons connected with the rebel army for the limited number of sick persons belonging to that army that were left on the line of march from Chattanooga ?

I conversed with a number of rebel officers and soldiers, and particularly with surgeons, in regard to that fact, it being a matter of curiosity to me, and was told by them that it was owing to the fact that when Bragg started from Chattanooga he had twenty days' rations, and that as fast as his wagons which carried the rations were emptied they were turned over to the hospital department. These wagons were used to relieve those who were wearied or sick upon the road, and by continual changing them, allowing them to ride a portion of the way and then give place to others, the health of the army was much kept up. Besides that their army was more healthy during the whole march, and the discipline did not allow any man to imagine himself sick who was not really so. They established hospitals at Tompkinsville and Glasgow, to which those who were not able to be transported were sent back, and from that place there were no hospitals till they reached Bardstown, and the sick were transported from north of those two places to Bardstown.

Question. How many wagons would be required to carry twenty days' rations for, say, 40,000 men, estimating only the essential parts of the rations, bread and meat?

Never having had anything to do with the quartermaster or commissary department, I have not the remotest idea. I know that they varied, according to circumstances, in our army from two to thirteen to a regiment, besides brigade and division headquarters transportation; but I have no knowledge of the necessary transportation for the subsistence of an army.

Question. It is a matter of calculation—the number of days, the number of men, the weight of rations, and the average weight that can be carried, by the wagons.

I should have to obtain the use of a copy of the Regulations and should need some little time to figure it out. I suppose with that I could answer.

Question. It is not worth while now, captain. Do you know anything about the release of prisoners of war at Louisville, in consequence of their acknowledging their allegiance to the Government, who were not included in any of the reports which you have submitted to the Commission?

According to the order of General Buell I had charge and supervision only of prisoners of war; deserters were under the control of Colonel Dent, Provost-Marshal-General of the State. Only by a special order which once or twice I received had I anything to do with them, unless their names got upon the rolls of the prisoners of war, strictly speaking, by mistake. I was informed by Colonel Dent that he had released between 800 and 1,000.

Question. Did these deserters come under the control of the provost-marshal within the period embraced in your report of prisoners of war, and did they belong to the represented force that was in Kentucky in August, September, and October last?

That was my understanding of Colonel Dent's statement.

Question. Have you any official or personal knowledge of the capture of property or stores belonging to the rebel army about the time of its retreat in any part of Kentucky?

I have no official knowledge. I heard the statement made by officers of the army and saw it published in the newspapers, but had no official information of stores captured at Camp Dick Robinson and Nicholasville.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. You are dismissed, captain.

General BUELL. I would like for Captain Jones to be retained by the judge-advocate.

General TYLER. Is the examination of General Smith concluded?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I detained General Smith at the request of General Buell, who said he might probably wish to recall him, and I told him to remain.

The PRESIDENT. I would like the judge-advocate to be ready to state at the next session what has been the mode of examination that has been pursued with reference to these witnesses.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. We adjourned before Captain Jones' examination was concluded, and he was ordered to appear here to complete his testimony.

LOUISVILLE, January 14, [?] 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General BUELL. After the adjournment of the Commission yesterday I received this letter from the judge-advocate. He informs me that the Commission was kept in waiting half an hour for me, and he then goes on to admonish me that in future the Commission expects from me a more prompt attendance. I am as anxious as the Commission that this investigation should be closed as promptly as possible, and for the sake of personal as well as official courtesy I should be sorry to keep the Commission in waiting; but I desire to say that I am here by the permission of the Secretary of War and not by his requirement. It might be presumed that I could, if necessary, give an explanation that would satisfy any gentleman for failing to be present at the hour appointed. I request that the letter may be recorded.

A. G. CRADDOCK (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and residence.

My name is A. G. Craddock; I reside near Munfordville, Hart County, Ky.

Question. Can you state whether you were near Muntordville when it was attacked by General Bragg's army or previous to that attack, and whether you carried a message from Colonel Wilder to General Buell's army?

When Munfordville was attacked I was at Bowling Green, 40 miles from there. I carried a message from Colonel Wilder to General Rousseau on the Saturday night before it was attacked on Sunday morning, and delivered it to General Rousseau about sunup Sunday morning, the 14th of September.

Question. Did you know the nature of that message and whether it reached General Buell?

The nature of it was for re-enforcements. In about half an hour after I got to the hotel General Buell came to General Rousseau's headquarters and sent for me. He asked me then the situation in and about Munfordville, and said that Colonel Wilder had better evacuate that post. That, as well as I recollect, was about the purport of his remarks to me. I started back on Sunday after that and never reached Munfordville till Tuesday morning, and when I got there Bragg's forces were at Munfordville.

W. B. CRADDOCK (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and residence, and whether you were at Munfordville at the time Bragg's army arrived there and attacked that place.

My residence is Munfordville, Ky.

Question. Were you there at the time the place was attacked by Bragg?

I was not there at the time the fortress was surrendered; I was about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the place.

Question. State whether you saw any or all of Bragg's army and whether you counted any of his regiments.

I cannot state if I saw them all. I saw a number of them. I counted as well as I could two regiments of them.

Question. What did you make their number to be?

If my recollection serves me aright, one numbered 360, the other 250.

Question. Did you see any other regiments besides those two you counted?

Yes, sir; I saw a number.

Question. How did they compare with the two you counted?

The reason why I counted the two regiments was I saw on their colors the word "Shiloh." They were marching near where I was boarding, and I supposed they had been in the battle there, and I counted them to see how they numbered. I know that the two regiments I counted were from Arkansas, but I cannot say I noticed how many the other regiments numbered.

Question. Did you notice the other regiments close enough to say as to how they compared in size?

I could not say, sir.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. You counted the number of men in these two regiments while they were on the march, did you, Mr. Craddock?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did you suppose, from the fact of their having been in battle, that they had sustained heavy losses, and that therefore you would expect to find the ranks very greatly reduced?

I did.

Question. Did the strength of these regiments as you found them realize the expectations you had formed with reference to their diminished strength?

Their colors seemed to be very much shattered and torn with bullets, and I just supposed from that that they had lost severely.

The Commission adjourned to meet January 15, 1863, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

LOUISVILLE, January 15, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

W. B. CRADDOCK'S testimony continued, as follows:

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. After the close of yesterday's session I discovered a fact within the knowledge of Mr. Craddock, the second witness examined, that seemed of importance to the investigation, and as he is sheriff of the county in which he resides and was anxious to return, I wrote down the question and his answer last night, and if there is no objection I propose to add them to his previous testimony:

Question. State, if you please, whether Breckinridge and his forces were at Munfordsville while Bragg was there.

I heard Bragg say on Thursday night, after he came in on Wednesday, that he had received a dispatch from Breckinridge, in which Breckinridge said he hoped there was no misunderstanding. General Bragg added that Breckinridge was entering West Tennessee when he should have been at Glasgow.

(Admission of the testimony objected to by General Ord.)

General BUELL. The evidence is palpably false in its peculiar features. We know that Breckinridge did not enter West Tennessee. That is a matter of certainty. I have no objection to the evidence appearing on the record. I admit the fact that General Breckinridge was not at Munfordville.

The court was cleared.

After discussion a vote was taken and the question and answer decided to be admissible.

General BUELL. I desire to say that I am not satisfied with that method of obtaining information, that is, by private consultation of the judge-advocate with the witness, as a general rule. I care nothing about this particular instance. I am not satisfied that the judge-advocate should himself be willing to pursue that course.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It was only because this man was sheriff of the county and anxious to return and because I wished to avoid putting the Government to the expense of recalling him that the question was put to him last night.

General BUELL. The matter and points of this investigation have only come to my knowledge as they were presented in the testimony, and I have responded to them at the moment without time or opportunity for much reflection. It has frequently happened that questions have occurred to me which would have been pertinent, but I have let them pass, desiring not to delay the proceedings of the Commission or cause the inconvenience which would result from recalling the witness.

GEORGE R. TAYLOR (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and residence.

My name is George R. Taylor; I reside at Munfordville, Ky.

Question. Were you in Munfordville at the time of its surrender and can you state anything as to the size of General Bragg's army?

General BUELL. I request that the testimony upon this point may be determined somewhere now, because it will extend our investigations indefinitely if it is to continue. The process of calling up witnesses merely for the purpose of multiplying evidence will prolong your investigations to an indefinite extent.

The PRESIDENT. Do I understand you to object to the testimony?

General BUELL. No, sir; but I desire to present this view of the matter to the Commission. There must be some time when the prosecution will cease; it ought to have ceased before the defense commenced. This indefinite calling of witnesses to give evidence on a question upon which there can be no end of testimony is useless. The first evidence introduced before the Commission was to establish the strength of General Bragg's army, and it has been continued up to this moment, and as I introduce witnesses other witnesses are introduced on the other side. It is an interminable way of conducting the business before the Commission, and I notify the Commission now that it will be necessary for me to summon other witnesses who were then on the line of march of the enemy to establish a truthful view of this question. The attempt to represent Bragg's army as a handful of men is not only unfair, it is absurd. I have no disposition to magnify it, but I am sorry to see a disposition manifested to bring it below what is really the truth.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The view taken by General Buell is true, but it was an irregularity that was unavoidable from the nature of the investigation and the trouble we had to obtain witnesses at the time we wanted them. So far as establishing the fact is concerned, I seek simply to bring out the fact; it is an important one, and so long as I can find a witness and the court is open I shall certainly introduce him to show what the size of General Bragg's army was. I have no wish to place it down below what it really was. I wish to bring out the fact of what was the size of General Bragg's army.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. Were you in Munfordville at the time of its surrender and can you state anything as to the size of General Bragg's army?

Yes, sir; I was there at the time of Colonel Wilder's surrender. In regard to General Bragg's army, the information I have I got mostly from the officers. General Bragg came in there in such a manner that I could not get a good opinion of the number of men he had, from the fact that he came in from below, across the railroad bridge, and from above, fording the river. I was informed by a number of the officers that the number of their regiments was sixty, and the regiments, I judge, would not average over 500. I think I made the statement to General Buell that there were not over 30,000 men.

Question. At what time did you make that statement to General Buell and what comment did he make upon it?

I made this statement to General Buell at the time his army was passing through there—the night he stopped at Woodsonville. I do not remember his making any comment upon it.

Cross-examination by General BUELL :

Question. Did you see all of the regiments?

No, sir; I do not think I did.

Question. You have stated, I believe, that your opinion of the number of regiments was formed from statements made to you by officers?

Yes, sir.

Question. Are you positive that the number you have stated was intended to embrace the whole army?

I understood it so.

Question. What officers made this representation to you as to the number of regiments?

I could not give you the names; I talked to several colonels and some other officers.

Question. At what particular time was the statement made to you—what day of the week or month or with reference to some known event?

It was at various times while General Bragg's army was there.

Question. Do you know any reason why these officers should have exposed to you the strength of Bragg's army?

No, sir. In giving the number of regiments that they had they did not give me the number of men. The idea they wished to convey was that they had more men than would be supposed from the number of their regiments; they wished to give the idea that there were more men in each regiment than they actually had.

Question. Did you think that sixty was a very large number of regiments?

No, sir; I should think they would have more men from the number of generals they had.

Question. Do you know how many men were engaged in the attack on Munfordville on the 14th of September, that is, the first attack made?

I heard Colonel Wilder give the number of regiments and brigades, but I could not state precisely. I should judge from the number he gave that there were at least two and a half men to one in the fort.

Question. How many generals were engaged in that attack, did you hear?

The commander was General Chalmers; that is the only general I know of that was engaged.

Question. Did you witness the attack?

I was in Munfordville at the time the attack commenced, but left the town and was not there during the fight.

Question. What was the loss of the enemy in killed and wounded?

Colonel Wilder told me 714.

Question. Do you think it was necessary that those officers should tell you truly in regard to their strength if there could be any possible advantage in concealing it?

No, sir; I do not.

Question. Have you heard their strength estimated to be more than that by persons who had a good opportunity of judging?

Yes, sir.

Question. Have you ever heard of their representing their strength at more than that?

No, sir; I never have. In speaking of the number of men being estimated at more than that, I speak of the number of men, not of the regiments.

Question. Have you ever heard of their claiming to have a greater number of regiments than sixty?

No, sir; I do not think I have.

Question. Did you ever see a single brigade of Bragg's army on the march or in camp?

Yes, sir; I have seen them on the march.

Question. Did you count the number of regiments in it?

No, sir; I did not.

Question. Did it have as many as four, do you think?

I could not say whether there were as many as four regiments in any I saw or not. I did not count them. I saw them as they passed.

Question. Did you ever hear how many regiments they had in their brigades generally?

No, sir.

Question. Did you ever hear how many divisions they had in the army?

Yes, sir; there were either six or seven.

Question. Do you know how many brigades they had in a division?

No, sir.

Question. Did you understand that sixty covered the whole number of regiments, cavalry and infantry?

Yes, sir; that was my understanding, although I did not make particular inquiry in regard to cavalry.

Question. Are you able to fix the length of time that was required for the army to pass any given point on the road in hours?

No, sir.

M. A. RAPIER (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Will you state your name and residence, if you please?

M. A. Rapier, of La Rue County, Kentucky.

Question. Are you a member of the Legislature of Kentucky?

I am, sir.

Question. Had you an opportunity of observing the army of General Bragg on its passage into Kentucky last fall; and, if so, under what circumstances, and state what you know of the strength of that army, the number of regiments, &c.?

I had an opportunity of observing the army of General Bragg. The circumstances were these: I live directly upon what is known to be the Green River and Nashville turnpike road, near the foot of Muldraugh's Hill. The turnpike leads around the hill $1\frac{1}{4}$ miles and is about 25 feet wide. It was impossible for any army to pass except upon that road of 25 feet. I became somewhat alarmed and did not remain at my house, but got upon the hill, where I could see the army pass. I endeavored to estimate the army by regiments. I numbered 142 or 143 regiments, the regiments running from 200 to 600. I numbered the wagons as they passed, about 2,000, with from 6 to 8 men to a wagon. As well as I recollect there were 180 pieces of artillery. I think that includes the caissons, or wagons for hauling the ammunition. I counted until dark and they were still passing; but how many passed or whether any more passed after I left my position I cannot say, but I left them passing.

Question. Your estimate of the artillery includes not only the cannon, but the caissons, battery wagons, and all the carriages belonging to a battery, does it?

Yes, sir.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. By what means did you count these regiments; how did you separate them into regiments?

I counted and separated them in this way, sir: There seemed to be a rear guard behind each regiment. They were in very great hurry; seemed to be on the double-quick; and between the spaces and that which seemed to me to be a guard I numbered as regiments.

Question. At what time did you take your position on the hill that day?

About an hour after sunup in the morning.

Question. You say they were moving on the double-quick. Do you mean by that that they were walking rapidly or running or what was their pace?

Some of them were walking very fast and some running.

Question. Was that pace continued during the day?

Yes, sir; it was.

Question. How many of these regiments did you count as to the number of men in each regiment?

One hundred and forty-two or one hundred and forty-three, sir. I counted various times during the day, and they invariably ran from 200 to 600; some 300; some 250; none higher than 600. I do not remember the number of times I counted the number of men in each regiment, but I counted various times during the day and found them running from 200 to 600.

Question. Do you recollect what you made the average number of the regiments?

My recollection now is that I then averaged them at 400.

Question. What was passing at the time you left ? •

Infantry.

Question. How long before you left had the wagons ceased passing ?

The main body of the wagons had ceased passing about 12 o'clock, though occasionally wagons were passing during the whole time I was there.

Question. Have you ever seen any other army pass besides this of General Bragg ?

I have seen divisions of armies.

Question. Did you ever before make an estimate as to the number that passed ?

I did not, sir.

By General DANA :

Question. In which direction was this army moving ?

Northeast direction, sir.

Question. Did you see any cavalry in the army ?

I did, sir.

Question. What part of the column did it occupy ?

The greatest portion of the cavalry occupied the rear and front.

Question. Was this cavalry included in the one hundred and forty-three regiments that you counted ?

It was not.

Question. How many regiments of cavalry did you see ?

I did not count the regiments of cavalry.

Question. What was your estimate of the quantity of cavalry they had with them ?

My impression now is that there were 1,000 or 1,500 in advance and about 1,000 in the rear.

Question. Do you know whether Breckinridge's division was in that column ?

I do not, sir.

Question. Have you heard since where Breckinridge's division was about that time ?

I have heard only by rumors and have no correct information on the subject.

Question. From all you have heard, state your opinion as to where Breckinridge was at that time.

From my information I think he was in Tennessee, sir.

Question. Can you state about the day of the week or month and the number of miles to the north of Munfordville that you made this count ?

It was on Monday, sir. I do not recollect the day of the month, but I have it registered at home, but it was in September. It was about 35 miles northeast of Munfordville.

Question. Can you state about how many days after the surrender of Munfordville ?

I think the surrender was on Wednesday or Tuesday, and it was the Monday following.

Question. What appeared to be the contents of the two thousand wagons that you saw?

A portion of them seemed to be hauling ammunition, a portion provisions, and a portion of them seemed to be entirely empty.

Question. Was the quantity of provisions large or small?

I thought small.

Question. At what time in the day did the rear guard of cavalry pass that you speak of?

A portion of the cavalry was stationed and planted cannons upon the top of Muldraugh's Hill for some three or four days; the larger portion of them, with their cannons, then went to New Haven, and there were some 300 or 400 of them captured. The capture was on Monday morning.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Please look at the map and point out the place where you made your observations.

It was 5 miles from New Haven, on the road from Glasgow to Bardstown.

Question. Please state how far you were from the road when you counted the troops.

About 50 yards.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. Please state the length of time that it occupied the whole rebel army to pass through.

The main portion were passing from Sunday, 10 o'clock in the morning, and passed until Monday night, when I quit counting; but were passing more or less until the Monday morning following.

Question. Did you stand there all the time during the march?

I did not, sir; I was not there of nights at all.

Question. Were you there during the whole time of Sunday and Monday?

I was there from 10 o'clock Sunday morning until dark Sunday night. I was there from after sunup in the morning on Monday till dark, and the greater portion of the days up to Monday morning following.

Question. What object had you in counting the troops? Did your memory serve you in counting them or did you keep a written account of the different troops?

Fearing that I would be captured by the army, and by some threats made to my family as to my whereabouts, I was induced to secrete myself for safety; to leave my home and get upon the hill, where I had a view of 4 miles of the road, and in full view of my house and family, feeling as all men feel banished from home and possession of my house and premises taken by the army. I sat there secreted, and notched upon an old stake—cut a notch for every regiment, or that which I supposed to be a regiment; the notches are there still. I had no view in counting the regiments except as I was banished from home and had some anxiety to know the strength of the army.

By General TYLER:

Question. Were you in sight, where you could be seen by the enemy as they passed?

I was seen once, sir. On seeing me they observed there was "a damned Yankee," and to "come down from there." I made a move as if to leave, and they replied that if I attempted to run they would shoot me.

Question. Did you come down in answer to their demand?

I did not, sir; I remained still till that regiment passed and then got more out of sight.

Question. Whose regiment was that?

I do not know, sir; I do not know any regiment.

Question. What number of men were there in this regiment?

I did not count that regiment, sir.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Upon which day did you make that count of the one hundred and forty-three regiments, Sunday or Monday?

I made the count of the one hundred and forty-two or one hundred and forty-three regiments on Monday. The advance cavalry and a portion of the wagons were passing on Sunday; but no infantry passed on Sunday.

Question. What time on Sunday did the wagons and cavalry pass?

They were passing from 10 o'clock Sunday morning until dark, when I left.

Question. Where did you remain Sunday night?

The greater portion of the night in the woods; the balance I was in a neighbor's house, 4 miles from the road.

Question. When you resumed your position on Monday morning on the hill were infantry or cavalry or any portion of the forces passing?

The infantry were passing.

Question. Had they been passing before you arrived there?

I do not know, sir; they were passing when I got back to my position, but I do not know when they commenced passing.

Question. Could you see down the road any distance?

I could see some 3 or 4 miles in the direction of New Haven; that is, the direction in which they were marching.

Question. At the time you observed them passing how much of this 3 or 4 miles you could see was occupied by the troops?

It seemed to me that the entire distance of 3 or 4 miles was entirely occupied.

Question. Am I correct, then, in saying that you began counting at that time, when you resumed your position there, and counted one hundred and forty-three regiments?

General BUELL. Permit the witness to explain.

The WITNESS. It was about 10 o'clock when I thought the road was entirely filled with troops. I do not know how much of the road was occupied when I began counting.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Did you look down that road and count the regiments that had passed at the time you resumed your position?

I did not. The regiments I counted as they passed me and notched them.

Question. You have no idea, then, how many regiments had passed before you resumed your position there to count?

I have not, sir.

Question. Could you see New Haven from your position on the hill?

I could see the steeple of the church very distinctly.

Question. Do you know where Bragg's forces came from on Sunday?

I do not, sir; only by rumor.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. How long was the whole wagon train?

The wagon train commenced passing between 10 and 11 o'clock Sunday morning, and passed as thick as they could get along till Sunday night, dark, when I left. On Monday there were also a great many wagons passed.

Question. Were they closed up or were there intervals between the wagons?

On Sunday they were closed up pretty much; on Monday they were at intervals.

Redirect examination by General BUELL:

Question. From what point on Green River did you understand this army came?

I understood from a soldier of their ranks, against whom I accidentally ran about midnight, that he was starved, and had marched from Red Mills that day, 17 miles.

Question. I did not refer to the length of march, but at what point was it rumored that the army crossed Green River?

Near Munfordville.

Question. When you were hailed in this position and ordered to come down, was it by an individual soldier in the regiment which happened to be passing?

It was, sir.

Question. When you speak of the rear guard of cavalry do you speak of what you saw that Monday or what you know from observation about the rear guard of the army?

I did not see them upon Monday. I speak of the cavalry left upon the hill and at New Haven after the main body had left some two days.

Question. You will observe, Mr. Rapier, that the tendency of certain questions that have been asked you is to make you appear to have said that the road for 4 miles was absolutely crowded with troops, when you subsequently counted one hundred and forty-two regiments. Please to state whether you observed the column that had passed when you took your position on the hill on Monday morning; whether you made any computation or not; whether you carefully observed the column that had passed; if it was large or small when you took your position on Monday morning.

I made no observation on the road on the morning when I took my position and commenced notching the regiments. Some time in the evening I did make observations of the road, and it seemed to me that the wagons and horses and men that were along the road seemed to occupy a great portion of it. I made no observation and no count of the troops down the road, but had taken count of the regiments as they passed opposite of me.

Recross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You began this counting when the sun was about an hour up; at what time did the army leave its camp and commence moving that morning?

I do not know, sir.

Question. You say that at the time you saw them and other times during the day they were moving on the double-quick; is that correct?

I mean to say that they seemed to be in a hurry; some were walking fast and some at times would run.

Question. What did you make the number of that army to be?

From my observation and calculations I made it something near 70,000, by putting the regiments at 400 and 8 men to a wagon.

Question. Does this include cavalry and artillery?

That includes all.

By General BUELL:

Question. Do you know where this army encamped Sunday night, and from where it marched Monday morning?

I do not know, sir; only by rumor.

Question. How far from the position you occupied was it said to have encamped that night?

The advance guard of infantry was said to have been encamped about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from my position.

Question. Where did the main body encamp, according to report?

Near Hodgenville.

Question. How far from that were you?

From my position about $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles.

By General SCHOEPPF:

Question. Please state to the Commission if you are an unconditional Union man.

General BUELL. I object. My objection is this: That while I have the assurance and belief that Mr. Rapier is an unconditional Union man, I do not know. We all know there are a great many opinions in Kentucky, at this time particularly, and I do not think it necessary or proper that Mr. Rapier should be examined upon that question, inasmuch as it has no bearing upon the subject of investigation or the reliability of his testimony. My supposition is that Mr. Rapier would answer it affirmatively, but I do not know, as I never before saw him in my life.

The question being objected to by General Ord also, the court was cleared, when, after discussion, General Schoepf withdrew his question.

Commission adjourned to meet Friday, January 16, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 16, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Col. E. M. McCook (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States, if you please.

E. M. McCook; colonel Second Indiana Cavalry, commanding First Cavalry Brigade.

Question. Were you with your regiment on duty with the Army of the Ohio last summer during its march from Corinth to North Alabama and Middle Tennessee?

I was.

Question. Give a concise statement, if you please, of the services upon which you were engaged from the time you left Florence until you left Reynolds' Station.

I was ordered from Florence with a supply train of, I think, some four hundred and fifty wagons or probably more—I do not recollect exactly—to establish a depot at Reynolds' Station, the terminus of the railroad there. I do not recollect the dates, but it was when our army crossed the river at Florence. I was engaged while at Reynolds' Station in forwarding supplies to the Army of the Ohio at Athens.

Question. Did you leave Florence in advance of the army?

I think, sir, I did. None of the army had passed over the road that I did.

Question. By what means were supplies forwarded from Reynolds' Station to Athens?

By wagons.

Question. What is the distance by wagon road?

I think 45 miles.

Question. Do you know whether all possible energy and industry were used in the transmission of supplies by this means?

Very frequently wagons had to wait there for the want of supplies coming on the railroad. Supplies did not arrive fast enough at one time to furnish loads for the wagons; at other times two hundred and forty or two hundred and fifty wagons a day were sent off with supplies when they were there to load into the wagons.

Question. Do you know anything of the cause of this delay and how long it lasted?

My impression is that this delay took place on several occasions. The cause was some difficulty on the railroad; what the origin of that difficulty was I do not remember. On one occasion I remember that the trestle work was burned.

Question. What was it that made it necessary to use wagon transportation between Reynolds' Station and Athens?

Several large bridges and pieces of trestle work were destroyed on the railroad.

Question. Were the troops and bridge parties engaged in repairing these injuries?

They were.

Question. Were they constantly and, as far as you know, industriously engaged in this way?

They were.

Question. What was the condition of the country about Reynolds' Station in regard to supplies, both of forage and provisions for men?

There was no forage there at all, and I think no provisions; but I know nothing positively about that.

Question. How did you get your forage for your animals?

From Louisville or from Nashville; it came on the railroad; sacks of corn and bales of hay.

Question. Were the supplies about there so scarce as to make it absolutely necessary that this means should be resorted to to forage your animals?

Yes, sir.

Question. Is Reynolds' Station considered to be within the limits of the most productive region of Tennessee?

Giles County, the county it is in, is said by the citizens there to be one of the richest counties in the State.

Question. What troops did you employ in escorting these wagon trains between the points you have mentioned?

The Second Indiana Cavalry and part of the time the Third Kentucky Cavalry.

Question. Did the movements of the enemy's cavalry make it necessary that you should employ these troops in protecting the supplies?

I thought it necessary and prudent that all the trains should have a strong escort?

Question. Were you at McMinnville during the summer ?

I was.

Question. What was the condition of the country there in regard to supplies, both of forage and provisions ?

Forage was very scarce this side of McMinnville. When I sent out some of my men to find provisions I got 20 pounds of bacon ; that was all I could get ; the people there said that was all they could give me.

Question. How far did you have to send to get forage for your animals usually ?

From 7 to 13 miles.

Question. What force was there at this time ?

General Nelson's division, Second Indiana, Fifth Kentucky, and Second Kentucky Cavalry.

Question. Did this command draw all the supplies it could from the country about there ?

My own command depended entirely upon the country for forage and I think the rest of the command did. Our rations we drew from Murfreesborough.

Question. What do you know generally about the operations of the enemy's cavalry during last summer in Middle Tennessee and of the embarrassment which was caused to the service by them ?

The enemy's cavalry were very active, and I always believed that all the citizens in that section of the country were engaged in annoying our trains. I know that some of them burned our railroad bridges. We never had a sufficient cavalry force down there to guard all that line ; the force was smaller then than it is now.

Question. Was our cavalry force actively employed at that time ?

It was employed to such an extent that both men and horses were worn-out.

Question. What was the service upon which it was employed and was that service necessary and judicious ?

After the battle of Shiloh—I only speak for my own regiment then—the picket duty was so severe my men were on duty twenty-four hours and twenty-four hours off. Our troops were generally employed in picket duty and escorting trains. I believe that this service was rendered necessary from the fact that all the two or three other cavalry regiments there were entirely new and had done no military duty.

Question. What particular time do you refer to ?

Immediately after the battle of Shiloh, between that time and the taking of Corinth ; after that also while we were in the vicinity of Corinth. I believe, sir, it was usefully employed.

Question. The question refers more particularly to the time last summer while you were in Middle Tennessee.

There were two regiments of cavalry under my immediate supervision ; they were both of them actively employed and certainly usefully employed ; they were escorting supplies for the army.

Question. At what time did you discontinue the transmission of supplies from Reynolds' Station to Athens ?

I think, sir, the date was the 29th of July.

Question. And for what reason ?

General Jackson took command of the cavalry and started after Morgan.

Question. Were supplies still forwarded from Reynolds' Station by wagon when you left there ?

I do not know ; before I left they were. The first bridge was not completed when I left there ; no cars had run any farther than Reynolds' Station at the time I left.

Question. While you were there did you send a train of wagons with escort to Florence for sick, do you remember?

I did; seventy-five wagons.

Question. Where were they taken to?

Brought to Reynolds' Station.

Question. And from there?

I do not know.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Colonel, what was the cause of the scarcity in Giles County that you speak of?

The old crop was exhausted; the new one not ripe.

Question. Cannot you recollect what time that was; somewhat near the date?

It was in the month of July.

Question. What was the force that you supplied by wagon train from Reynolds' Station to Athens.

I do not know sir; I suppose it was General Buell's army and General Mitchel's.

By General TYLER:

Question. What time is the wheat crop ripe in Giles County?

Indeed, I do not know. I have never done anything but soldiering in that part of the country.

Question. Is not the wheat crop ripe in the month of July and harvested?

I do not know. To the best of my recollection I never saw a blade of wheat growing in the county. I never observed it. I was only interested in what my horses ate.

Question. Did you see any wheat growing in the adjacent counties?

Yes, sir; I did.

Question. What counties?

I cannot say.

Question. At what time would that wheat that you saw be ready for harvesting?

I am almost ashamed to confess my ignorance, but I do not think I ever saw a crop of wheat gathered in my life. I know nothing about it.

Question. What was the condition of the corn crop last July in that part of Tennessee where you were?

Well, sir, the corn was small. I know when we marched out of Tennessee in September I tried to burn the fields, but I could not do so, it was so green; when we marched north we had no roasting-ears; in July it was very small.

Question. How early was the corn fit to be used as roasting-ears in Tennessee?

I think some time in August was the first I got.

Question. At what place was it that you attempted to burn the corn fields and at what time was it?

It was after we left Murfreesborough, at that place where one of the soldiers had been shot in a field. He had unbuttoned his pantaloons and sat down to relieve himself, when he was shot out of a house. I found his body lying there. I tried to burn the fields. Every person ran away from there; there were none but women left, no men.

I cannot fix the place, general; it was where we had to leave the pike. The bridge had been burned down, so we had to go off the road, and I found the man; he had not been shot more than five minutes. It was in September.

Question. And was this man shot when you were encamped?

We were on the march; he was one of the soldiers who were in advance and had left the column.

Question. You say in one of your answers you have no doubt the citizens burned the railroad bridges and assisted in annoying the trains. Were there any attempts at punishing them for these offenses; and, if so, what were they?

I was ordered by General Buell to hang one of them. I placed him in charge of a guard of the Seventeenth Kentucky Infantry and he escaped from them.

Question. Do you know whether any punishments were made for those offenses? If so, state what they were.

If I recollect the language of the telegraphic order I received from headquarters correctly, the instructions were that when men were caught in the act of burning railroad bridges, or tearing up the track, or committing offenses of that character, punishment should be prompt and inflicted immediately. I did not witness any punishment of that kind; but I think from reports received from my officers that punishment of that kind was inflicted on persons whom they caught there; I think they killed several men there. I am satisfied from unofficial sources they did, although I did not see it done and they made no official report to me.

Question. At what point were you stationed when it was necessary to forage from 7 to 13 miles?

At McMinnville.

Question. How far from McMinnville was it that this man was shot in the corn field?

To the best of my recollection it must be 45 or 50 miles. It was after we marched from Murfreesborough that this man was shot. At McMinnville it was a matter of nightly occurrence to have pickets shot at within two or three miles of the town.

Question. Do you wish the Commission to infer that after organizing a party for the collection of forage, provisions, &c., sent out under proper officers, that such a party could obtain only 20 pounds of bacon as the result of the expedition?

I ordered the acting quartermaster of the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry to take with him some of the men of the Third Kentucky, and some of his own men that had no rations except coffee, to go through the country within a safe distance and see if he could procure some rations, something to eat—flour, bacon, anything he could find. He came back and reported to me that he had procured 20 pounds of bacon—I think that was the amount—and a little corn meal, and that was all he could get. This was when we were marching either from McMinnville to Smithville or from Smithville to McMinnville. I do not remember which. It was, however, in that vicinity.

Question. What kind of an agricultural country was that?

Very poor, sir, to the best of my recollection.

Question. What were its productions?

I cannot say, sir. I do not think they raised any cotton there or very little. I have only considered an agricultural country a good one that raised something good for horses to eat. I have not noticed the other products of the country. I have been looking out for forage and felt a good deal of anxiety about it.

Question. You say you were on the march when this acting quartermaster was ordered to bring in this 20 pounds of bacon?

I was.

Question. How long was he absent in collecting this amount of supplies?

We were not in a permanent camp; we halted in the evening about dusk. I do not know how long he was absent; probably two hours.

By General SCHOEPPF:

Question. Had you not while at McMinnville sufficient corn blades and corn for your animals?

With the exception of one day we had rations; how full they were I do not know. One day the teams came back without anything. There was a skirmish on the road on which they started.

Question. Could you not have subsisted your animals on green corn at that time?

As to the quantity I cannot say, but I do not think the corn was sufficiently ripe to have fed the horses entirely on it. It might have done to have mixed it with the old corn or the old corn blades.

Question. Were you with the army on the march from Nashville to Louisville?

As far as Elizabethtown.

Question. Did you not during that march capture part of the enemy's train and at what place?

Yes, sir; at Horse Well or Horse Cave. I sent Colonel Wolford over there to attack the train. He brought back three wagons loaded with flour, and said he had cut the mules out of three more and disabled them.

Question. Why was not the enemy pressed more at that time?

He sent back for re-enforcements—about getting dark—which I sent. When the attack was first made they made a very spirited resistance; some 113 infantry prisoners were taken of the escort to the train and a good many killed. It became dark before the re-enforcements arrived. Colonel Wolford reported to me that he discontinued the attack because it was dark, partly, and partly because he was afraid he would be attacked by a superior force, which he heard was still farther in the rear of the train.

Question. Did you join General Buell's command at Louisville?

No, sir. I never went any farther than Elizabethtown, and rejoined his command at Springfield, Ky.

Question. Who commanded the whole cavalry?

Colonel Kennett.

Question. Where was he; on the march from Perryville with you?

He never went to Louisville; he was at Elizabethtown. He marched from Elizabethtown to Bardstown with part of his command and remained at Bardstown till after the Perryville fight.

Question. Did you not capture some officers of Bragg's staff at Prewitt's Knob?

One battalion belonging to my brigade did.

Question. Do you know their names and where they were sent to?

I have heard their names, but forget them. Major Wynkoop informed me they were paroled. I captured one who belonged to General Polk's or General Bragg's staff, I do not recollect which. He was paroled. I took him to General Crittenden, who paroled him.

Question. Can you state the time that elapsed between the capture and release of these officers?

I cannot. The officer I spoke of was released on the third day after his capture.

By General DANA:

Question. While at McMinnville how far on the road in the direction of Dunlap did you forage?

I cannot say. Foraging was done, as a general thing, off the main roads.

Question. Can you state how far in the direction of Chattanooga from McMinnville you foraged ?

I cannot say. I very seldom accompanied the foraging parties. I went out once and came back by some by-road onto the road to Chattanooga, about 8 miles from McMinnville.

Question. From what you know of the country and from reports you have received how much of a belt of country in the direction of Chattanooga from McMinnville do you suppose would be capable of supporting a considerable body of cavalry with forage ?

I have never been more than 15 miles, probably, south of that. My lieutenant-colonel went, as he reported, within 20 miles of Chattanooga with cavalry, came back, and said it was the most God-forsaken country he ever saw ; there was no forage nor anything else.

Question. Have you ever been in the vicinity of Sparta ?

I have been within a few miles, 7 or 8, of it.

Question. How does the country from Sparta in the direction of the Sequatchie Valley compare with the country from McMinnville in the direction of the Sequatchie Valley for forage ?

I know nothing about it, and therefore make no comparison.

By General SCHOEPF :

Question. On what occasion was it that your lieutenant-colonel went toward Chattanooga ; was it not while General Thomas went in that direction in person ?

No, sir ; he went there alone. He was ordered there by General Nelson to make a reconnaissance before General Thomas came there.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. At the time the Army of the Ohio fell back to Nashville from Tennessee were you in the advance or in the rear ?

I think, sir, that until we arrived at Nashville we were in the rear.

Question. State, if you know, what became of the bridges and other improvements that were put on those railroads to have them in running order when you fell back.

I cannot say. I see the judge-advocate probably misunderstands where I started from. I came from McMinnville to Murfreesborough, and when the army commenced to fall back I started from Murfreesborough. I never was on the line farther south than Reynolds' Station, except as I went with my trains.

Question. Was not that officer that you captured Colonel Forsyth ?

No, sir ; he was captured by a major of one of my battalions.

Question. Who took the parole of those officers ?

I do not know, sir ; I never saw them.

Question. What was the name of the officer that captured Colonel Forsyth ?

Major Wynkoop, Pennsylvania cavalry, so he informed me.

Question. Do you say that General Crittenden paroled the officer that you took ?

Yes, sir.

Question. What command had Captain Gay in that march toward Perryville ?

I can only reply from hearsay that he had several regiments.

Redirect examination by General BUELL:

Question. Do you know the name of any officer or officers who have knowledge of the capture and paroling of any officers of General Bragg's army while the Army of the Ohio was on the march from Bowling Green to Munfordville? If so, please give the names of those officers.

I have no knowledge of the capture and paroling. The prisoners were paroled while the army was laying at Cave City—one a Lieutenant Lay; the other a major, whose name I do not know; and then there were some 15 or 20 wounded officers whom I paroled myself.

Question. Can you name other officers who have such knowledge?

Maj. Samuel Hill, Second Indiana Cavalry, took the prisoners back. Major Starling paroled them, I believe, or General Crittenden. I had no knowledge of it.

Question. State, if you please, all the particulars of the capturing and paroling of those prisoners that you have any knowledge of yourself.

Lieutenant Lay was captured at the tunnel below Mr. Proctor's, Bell's Tavern—he and, I think, 5 men, as they were riding south. This major was captured with two or three others when that party went out to attack the train captured and brought in by Colonel Wolford. My impression is that he was reported to me first, but I turned him over to General Crittenden; but I am not positive.

Question. Was there anything peculiar in the circumstances of the capture or paroling of these prisoners?

No, sir; nothing that I am aware of, either in the capture or parole.

General BUELL. I do not understand what the purpose of the investigation on this point is, but I desire to give the Commission and the judge-advocate every possible opportunity to get any information they may wish, and I shall be very glad if the examination will be continued on that point in reference to anything that may not be understood.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. A Major or Colonel Forsyth, I understand, was taken prisoner at some point near Munfordville and paroled, and that he immediately returned to the army and resumed his duty there as officer. I have seen his correspondence, and I gather from that that he paid no attention to his parole.

General BUELL. How do you know he paid no attention to his parole?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I gather so from his own correspondence. He writes as though he had taken part with the army in its subsequent campaign. A case of that kind occurred in the Harper's Ferry affair, and when it was complained of to General Hill he knew nothing about it and treated it with perfect contempt. If every officer paroles his captured prisoners we shall lose prisoners by not getting them properly exchanged. That is my reason for asking the question.

The WITNESS. I paroled none of those prisoners at all.

General SCHOEPF. I understood the cartel was in full operation before we marched from Nashville. If, therefore, every officer paroled prisoners according to his pleasure it would not be right. They ought to be reported to headquarters and a list taken of all the prisoners captured, because we lose if every officer captures and paroles "on his own hook."

General BUELL. Is there anything in the evidence to show that officers paroled men at their pleasure?

By General TYLER:

Question. What prisoners were they that you captured?

The prisoners I paroled on that march were sick and wounded. Those able to move I sent to the rear. I also forwarded a list of all that I paroled to headquarters. The arm of the service to which I belong compels an officer to parole prisoners when he cannot communicate with his superior officers.

By the PRESIDENT :

Question. Have you no authority on that subject derived from general orders particularly applicable to you when on such expeditions ?

I have never seen any such orders.

By General BUELL :

Question. Is it not frequently necessary either to parole prisoners captured in that way or to let them go ?

I have seen instances where it would be impossible to carry them with you.

Question. In stating that on one occasion you endeavored to burn the corn field, do you or do you not wish it understood that you intended that as a punishment for the murder which you supposed had been committed upon the soldier by the owners of the property or do you mean that you were in the habit of doing it ?

I never burnt a blade of corn in my life that I am aware of. I attempted to burn this corn field because I was sure the man had been shot at out of that house, and had it not been for the women and children I should have burned the house. I should have done it as a just punishment, for the negroes about the house told me that their master had shot the man.

Capt. ROBERT MACFEELY (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. State your name and position in the United States service, if you please.

My name is Robert Macfeely; captain, commissary of subsistence of the United States Army.

Question. State what service you were engaged in during the months of July, August, and September of last summer, and what efforts, that you know of, were made to supply the Army of the Ohio with subsistence ?

I was senior commissary of subsistence in the District of the Ohio, and on General Buell's staff, stationed in the city of Nashville, in charge of the depot at Nashville and the affairs of the subsistence department generally in the District of the Ohio. Efforts were made by me to obtain subsistence through Captain Symonds, depot commissary in Louisville, and by purchases by myself, as far as I could obtain them advantageously to the Government, in Nashville; also in the latter part of August I received directions through Colonel Fry, chief of staff to General Buell, to seize all subsistence stores in Nashville and the vicinity.

Question. At what points in Tennessee during its occupation by the Army of the Ohio were you instructed to furnish subsistence ?

To all points on the railroads in Tennessee occupied by our troops, namely, Franklin, Tenn.; Columbia, Huntsville, Athens, Ala.; Decatur, Stevenson, Decherd Station, Murfreesborough; occasionally at Gallatin and at Clarksville so long as it was occupied by our troops, and probably other points occupied temporarily.

Question. How far were you successful in getting subsistence at these points ?

I believe we were successful until the road was cut in the first place, I think some time in July, when there was no river communication to Nashville, at which time General Buell deemed it advisable, in consequence of the limited supplies on hand, to reduce the troops to half rations. On the resumption of communication by rail, stores came through regularly, and I believe, at least so it was said by the agents of the railroad company, as fast as they could carry them, until it was cut again in August.

Question. What time that summer did the Cumberland cease to be navigable?

My impression is that it was about the middle of July. I received stores by, I think, three or four steamers, which were left at Clarksville by the boats that brought them from Louisville, they being unable to get to Nashville in consequence of the insufficiency of water on the shoals. Most of these stores were brought up by light-draught boats from Clarksville; some of them were taken possession of when Clarksville fell.

Question. What became of the subsistence at these various points you have enumerated when the Army of the Ohio fell back to Nashville?

They were brought to Nashville on the cars and turned over to Captain Little, in charge of the depot store-house.

Question. Are you certain that none of them were destroyed?

No, sir; I am not. I know that some of them were brought away and turned over to Captain Little, and I was informed officially by Captain Darr, commissary of subsistence, attached to General Buell's headquarters in the field, that he brought all the stores from Stevenson, Decherd, and other points.

Question. Can you state to the Commission the amount of stores brought back in that way to Nashville?

I cannot state from memory. Captain Darr or Captain Little's provision returns for the months of August and September would show the amount received from the commissaries in those places.

Question. How far were you successful in purchasing or seizing stores about Nashville for the benefit of the army?

I purchased in open market in all 8,000 or 10,000 barrels of flour, which was all I purchased. Captain Little, under my directions, seized all the salt meat, flour, and other subsistence stores in the hands of the wholesale merchants in Nashville and in the country as far as we could obtain them. His reports will show the amounts.

Question. How many days' rations did the army take when it marched from Nashville to Bowling Green?

My impression is that they were ordered to take five days' rations, sufficient for subsistence to Bowling Green.

Question. How many rations had you at Bowling Green at that time?

I do not know, sir. I was not in communication with Bowling Green; but I heard unofficially that there was a considerable amount of stores there, I think a million of rations, which were intended for Nashville, but were stopped after the railroad was cut.

Question. Can you give the Commission any information as to the condition of the country about Nashville in August as to subsistence of this sort?

I made frequent inquiries, as it was my duty to do, as to the resources of the country in the vicinity of Nashville for supplying the army with subsistence. From citizens of Nashville and in the country around I was informed that nearly all the hogs and beef cattle in that part of Tennessee had been killed the winter previous by the rebels and salted in Nashville, and that most of the flour was also used by the Confederate army previous to our arrival there.

Question. What do you know of your own personal knowledge of these facts?

I have no means of knowing except through inquiry. I have not been over the country, never 5 miles from Nashville, from the time I was stationed there. From the quality of cattle which was seized by the army that remained in Nashville after the departure of General Buell I think that the statement as far as regards the cattle is correct. As the cattle seized and killed by us were generally yearlings, milch cows, and bulls; not one out of 20 cattle killed was such as would have been received from regular army contractors, and not fit for beef. The average weight was about 300 to 350 pounds of the cattle seized.

Question. Did the army suffer any while they were on half rations and while they were depending principally on the seizures in the neighborhood?

I will state that for a few days after the departure of General Buell, there being but a limited supply of small rations on hand—sugar, coffee, rice, &c., and having a large amount of hard bread and flour—I reported to General Thomas and requested that he would order the issue of full rations of flour and beef, as I thought there was sufficient to last his army until General Buell would return or for a month or six weeks. I submitted a statement of the amount on hand to General Thomas, and he authorized me to issue full rations of flour and meat. I saw no suffering of the men while they were on half rations and I heard no complaints.

Question. Were you with the army while stationed at these various points you have enumerated in Tennessee?

No, sir; I speak in my answer of what I saw and heard. I was not out of Nashville.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Could the effect of half rations upon troops that were stationary in garrisons like those at Nashville be any criterion for judging of the sufficiency of such an allowance for troops that were engaged in active service in the field?

It would not. Troops on active duty and marching require more sustenance than those who are leading an inactive life.

Question. Is there not also a much greater wastage of provisions in the hands of troops when they are engaged in active service than when they are stationary?

There is probably twice as much wasted.

Question. Do you know, by the reports of officers of your department or otherwise, that instead of destroying its supplies when it was moving upon Nashville the army collected all the supplies it could from the country and brought them along with it?

Captain Darr, commissary of General Buell's staff, informs me that he had directed the commissaries at all the stations on the Chattanooga Railroad to seize all the cattle and other stores that they could and requested me to give the same directions to the commissary at Columbia and Franklin. I know that these orders were complied with, as beef cattle and flour were brought into Nashville with the army and turned over to the depot. At the time General Buell's army left Nashville, after taking the beef required by them, there were some 600 or 800 head of cattle remaining in Nashville in the hands of the officers of the subsistence department. These cattle were mostly seized by the different commissaries; a few were contract cattle.

Question. Do you know whether the supplies brought in in this way were taken up on the returns of the depot commissaries and issued regularly like other supplies?

I believe all the stores and cattle seized by the different commissaries previous to General Buell's departure from Nashville were turned into the depot and taken up on the returns of Captain Little, and issued regularly as other supplies were issued. After General Buell's departure there were very few supplies, with the exception of beef cattle, turned into the depot. If any were taken by the different foraging parties sent out at various times they were not turned into the depot there, but were issued irregularly, if issued at all.

Question. What is your observation of the system of supplying troops by foraging parties, both as regards the discipline of the troops and the economical use of the supplies?

From my observation of foraging, as carried on at Nashville, I consider it very ruinous to the discipline of the army. I saw numerous foraging parties at various times on their return to Nashville—men straggling, coming in without any order, every man for himself; some carrying chickens and other fowls, others pigs, bacon, candle-molds, chairs, brooms, and almost every article of household furniture.

These articles were not turned in, as required by General Halleck's order in reference to foraging parties, to the depot commissary, but were consumed by the individuals who took them or were disposed of in the stores in the city. There was only one exception that I saw, and that was a regiment commanded by Colonel Roberts, who brought his regiment in in fine condition, and it was a general remark among the officers as to the contrast between them and others.

Question. Is there any known process by which an officer at the head of the subsistence department of any army, like yourself, can gain information of the statistics and resources of the county about him except by the reports of others?

I believe not. I know of no other way except from his own personal observation in traveling over the country himself and examining it; I mean in regard to a country occupied by troops of both armies and the supplies consumed in the country ordinarily in times of peace. He may gain information from census reports and other reports made by State and county officers, but this would be no guide to the supplies in a country during a time of war.

Question. Would it be possible for an officer in that position to gain that information by personal observation and attend to his other duties at the same time? In other words, is there but one known way by which such information can be obtained, and that from the report of others?

General SCHOEPPF. I object to this question. We are not here to examine officers in regard to their capacity or ability as to what they could have done, but we are here to establish facts as to what has been done.

The court was cleared, when, after discussion, it was decided that the question be put.

The WITNESS. It would not be possible for an officer to attend to his other duties and obtain this information by personal observation; he must depend entirely upon the reports of others who are familiar with the resources of the country.

Commission adjourned to meet Saturday, January 17, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 17, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Captain MACFEELY'S testimony continued, as follows:

Redirect examination by General SCHOEPPF:

Question. You stated yesterday the different stations at which you had provisions; had you any at McMinnville and Winchester?

I stated yesterday some of the stations—all that I could recollect at the time—but said that there were probably other stations which were occupied temporarily by the troops. McMinnville and Winchester were supplied from Murfreesborough and from Tullahoma; but Murfreesborough and Tullahoma received their supplies direct from the depot at Nashville.

By General TYLER:

Question. Under whose order was this foraging carried on in the vicinity of Nashville?

I believe it was under the orders of General Negley, the commanding officer of the post.

Question. Were you there at the time this foraging was made?

I was, sir.

Question. You stated in your testimony that Colonel Roberts brought in his regiment in fine condition; what amount of forage and provisions did he bring in?

He brought in no subsistence stores, at least none that were turned over to me at the depot. He had a number of wagon loads of hay and corn. I do not know whether this forage was turned into the depot or not. I meant that Colonel Roberts came in in good condition, and my reference to him was as to the manner in which the men marched—in close order and in a soldier-like manner, and as contrasting with the straggling parties that I had seen before, and that the men did not carry anything on their persons but their arms and accouterments.

Question. You stated in your testimony that “the men came straggling in, without any order, every man for himself, some carrying chickens and other fowls, others pigs, bacon, candle-molds, chairs, brooms, and almost every article of household furniture. These articles were not turned in, as required by General Halleck’s order with reference to foraging parties, to the depot commissary, but were consumed by the individuals who took them or disposed of in the stores of the city;” and that Colonel Roberts’ regiment was the only exception that you saw. Did you report these facts to your commanding general?

I did not.

Question. Why, as an officer of the staff, did you not report these facts to your commanding general?

These facts were so common as to have been the public talk in the town among officers, and the immediate officers of the staff of General Negley must have been cognizant of them and it was their duty to report them.

Question. Knowing these facts, as a staff officer of General Buell would you not consider it your duty to report to him?

I would had I been in communication with General Buell’s headquarters.

Question. Were you not in communication with General Buell’s headquarters; did you not receive requisitions from there?

I was not in communication with General Buell’s headquarters. General Buell’s headquarters at the time were in Kentucky. All communication was cut off between the army of Kentucky and Nashville. I received no requisitions from his headquarters for supplies at that time and they drew their supplies from other sources.

Question. Please fix the dates, as nearly as you can, between which these irregularities in collecting forage and subsistence occurred.

From about the middle of September until the end of October; it may have been a few days more or less.

Question. Between those dates were your communications cut off from General Buell’s headquarters?

Yes, sir; all regular communications. I knew of no couriers or express or mail leaving for General Buell’s headquarters during that period that I can recollect.

By General DANA:

Question. To whom is the neglect attributable for these irregularities that you have enumerated?

I do not know. I merely state the irregularities I saw without fixing the responsibility upon any person, as by doing so it would be a mere matter of opinion.

Question. Who was commanding officer at Nashville during that time?

General Negley.

Question. Who was inspector-general at Nashville at that time and had he any assistants; and, if so, who were they?

I know no person who occupied the position of inspector-general.

Question. Name the provost-marshal and his assistant at that time.

Colonel Gillem, Tenth Tennessee, was provost-marshal. I do not know that he had any assistant.

Question. What officer of General Negley's staff was performing the duty generally incumbent on the inspector?

I do not know of any officer performing that duty.

Question. Who was chief of General Negley's staff at that time?

I do not think he had any chief of staff; at that time Captain Lowrie was his assistant adjutant-general on his staff.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. This pillage under the name of foraging broke out about that time, did it not; it was not known to the army before?

I do not know whether it was known to the army before. It first came to my knowledge in Nashville about that time.

Question. Had not General Buell been very strict in that respect, prohibiting such acts upon the part of his soldiers and protecting property generally?

I believe he had been very strict in prohibiting it. I have no personal knowledge except of what occurred at General Buell's headquarters when he was in the vicinity of Nashville and of the army that was left there.

Question. Did you not know that it was a matter of complaint among the officers, when they were sent out on these foraging expeditions, that they were embarrassed by safeguards distributed over the country?

I do not. I would also say that about the time that I received orders from General Buell to seize the subsistence stores in Nashville and in the vicinity we also received an order stating that all safeguards heretofore given by him would not be considered as protecting provisions and forage.

Question. Do you recollect the date of that?

I think it was somewhere about the 1st of September or the latter part of August.

Recross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Is it not an admitted fact that such irregularities as you have yourself witnessed are more or less inseparable from the system of supplying an army by foraging, and is it or is it not your opinion that they are particularly unavoidable in an army where the means of discipline are as insufficient as they are with ours?

I think it is a fact generally conceded that a system of foraging carried on promiscuously has the effect to ruin the discipline of an army; that it is unavoidable in an army where the punishment is so inadequate for grave offenses as it has been in ours.

General BUELL. There is one witness I would like the judge-advocate to call for himself, not for me. His testimony, I think, is necessary at any rate to give value to testimony that has already been given, and that is the man Miller, who has been said to have brought a message from Colonel Wilder to the commanding officer at Bowling Green. It is not to me a matter of any consequence whether the message was sent, as stated by Colonel Wilder, or whether it was delivered; but as a matter of curiosity, and as having its connections which may be of interest, if not of consequence, I should be glad to have him before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. That is a matter which I feel should to a great extent be left to the judgment of the judge-advocate. I hardly think it is proper for the Commission to assume to manage his examination for him.

General BUELL. Then, if it is more proper, I beg to make the suggestion to the judge-advocate himself.

Commission adjourned to meet Monday morning, January 19, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 19, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Capt. H. C. SYMONDS (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State your name and position in the United States service.

H. C. Symonds, captain, commissary of subsistence.

Question. Were you engaged as commissary of subsistence—if so, where—during the summer of Bragg's invasion of Kentucky?

I have been in the commissary department here in Louisville since September, 1861.

Question. You can state whether you were engaged in forwarding subsistence to the Army of the Ohio previous to and during the invasion of Kentucky.

I furnished all the subsistence for that army that was regularly furnished by the subsistence department.

Question. What lines of communication did you use in forwarding subsistence?

Principally the Louisville and Nashville Railroad.

Question. Did you use the Cumberland River, and was it used to its full capacity previous to its ceasing to be navigable and when did it close that summer?

About the last of April it was considered that the Cumberland was not very available as a means of transportation. There was low water, and nothing but light-draught boats could get up from about the last of April. I was not called upon to furnish all the supplies for Nashville during the whole month of May, only limited quantities, and not for the whole army there. I think the first shipment I made for the whole army, when it drew its whole supplies from Nashville, began about the 14th of June.

Question. Can you state what amount you did send to Nashville by way of the river?

I sent to Nashville by railroad between the 14th of June and the 11th of August very nearly 4,000,000 of rations: Coffee, 3,900,000 rations; sugar, 3,800,000 rations; salt meat, 2,800,000; hard bread, 3,400,000. In order to hurry them up we used boats. They could only go up to the Shoals, and from there they were lightered up by small boats. There were three or four boats employed by the quartermaster for this purpose, but none of them could go beyond the Shoals; some of them could go no farther than Clarksville. We sent up between July 10 and July 23 (after which there was so much difficulty in getting supplies up by the river that it was the opinion of the quartermaster that we had better rely wholly upon the railroad) what would amount to about 300,000 rations. We sent 700,000 rations of salt meat, 650,000 rations hard bread, 300,000 coffee and sugar. I preferred to send the coffee and sugar by railroad; they were the most valuable parts of the rations and the least in bulk. The total amount sent to Nashville between July 14 and August 11 (when shipments were stopped), the receipts of which were acknowledged, was: Salt meat, 3,000,000 rations; hard bread, 4,000,000 rations; coffee, 4,200,000 rations; rice, 1,400,000 rations; beans, 1,990,000 rations; sugar, 4,200,000 rations; candles, 4,400,000 rations; soap, 3,800,000 rations; salt, 5,000,000 rations; and nearly the full amount of the remaining portion of the rations.

Question. What amount was accumulated at Bowling Green from Louisville after the railroad was cut between Bowling Green and Nashville?

There was shipped between the 18th and 27th of August for Bowling Green and received there 300,000 rations salt meat, 80,000 rations of hard bread, 1,900,000 rations beans, 200,000 rations rice, 1,280,000 rations coffee, 1,129,000 rations sugar, 780,000 rations soap. That was all that reached there.

Question. What do you know, captain, of subsistence reaching the Army of the Ohio, while it was occupying Tennessee and part of Alabama, by the way of the Tennessee River?

A part of the time that the army was on the Tennessee in the vicinity of Pittsburgh Landing and Bridgeport I furnished the supplies. The first shipment was made on the 15th of May, and I sent up to that army while they were there 1,200,000 rations of salt meat. In round numbers the average number of rations I sent up the Tennessee River was 1,800,000 to the 13th of June, when I was ordered to send no more up.

Question. What is the weight of a single ration?

Gross weight about $3\frac{1}{2}$ pounds.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Do the quantities stated in your testimony represent what was receipted for to you or what was actually received at Nashville?

What was receipted for to me.

Question. How is it in reference to quantities you have assigned to Bowling Green in that respect?

The same way. I have receipts for that amount. There was a large amount sent out to the depot which was never shipped and afterward returned to me from the railroad depot, and that particular part that was returned was probably the most essential to the movements of an army, namely, salt meat and bread.

Question. Is that included in the quantity represented as having been sent to Bowling Green?

No, sir.

Question. Were you frequently reminded last summer by communications from my headquarters of the importance of accumulating supplies at Nashville?

I was.

Question. Did you use all possible industry and energy for that object?

I did. While I was receiving those dispatches I went so far as to give some advice, to which I did not get a very satisfactory answer.

Question. If you regard that advice as of interest or importance to this investigation state what it was and what answer you received.

I found that by using all the energy and industry that I could I could not get forward the amount of full rations that seemed to be desired at Nashville, and I telegraphed to Colonel Fry that if they would not use more than half rations of salt meat, and would use less hard bread and more flour and procure their flour as far as possible in the country, I could easily supply the army; otherwise I could not see my way clear. He asked me in his answer what I meant by "not seeing my way clear." If I could procure the supplies here there would be no difficulty about transportation; that the quartermaster could furnish plenty, and the agents of the railroad assured him there was plenty of transportation if I would furnish supplies. That was the substance of it, though not perhaps the exact words.

Question. Have you those dispatches?

I do not know whether I have Colonel Fry's dispatch to me or not. I kept it in my pocket for a time and did not put it on the file. I have my first dispatch to him which called forth that answer.

Question. Present both of them to the Commission or whatever you have.

I have merely my own dispatch. I have been hunting for his reply. Mine was in answer to a dispatch from him asking how many rations I had on the way to Nashville and was as follows :

“JULY 15.

“I have now 800,000 full rations on the way to Nashville, half by boat and half by rail. Have shipped to Nashville since July 1 over 1,000,000 rations; shipped from the middle to the end of June 1,000,000 rations. Captain Macfeely calls for 2,000,000 a month. You must use much less hard bread, only half salt meat, or the stores cannot be transmitted. If you make the troops use flour and buy it where you are I can easily feed the army, but at present rates of hard bread and salt meat I cannot see any way clear.”

Question. What proportion of the rations does that dispatch propose should be procured in the country ?

I think it would take out fully one-third, possibly two-fifths, in the gross weight of the rations if it had been arranged for the rations to be drawn in that manner.

Question. Make the calculation, if you please, according to the suggestion in your dispatch. Does that make about $1\frac{3}{4}$ to be procured there ?

It leaves about $1\frac{7}{10}$ to be procured there.

Question. Did you know what the resources of the country were when you made this suggestion, and was it only a suggestion or was it advice ?

I did not know. I gave the suggestion as advice.

Question. Why would you advise what you did not know to be practicable ?

Because I was convinced it would be impossible to meet all the demands made for provisions from Nashville.

Question. And suppose they could not be met there, would you still advise that they should be met there ?

I had no advice to give beyond that. I merely gave it as advice. I saw the difficulties at this end of the line and I thought I appreciated them, and I thought I would advise them to do as much as they could in procuring supplies. I did not know what the capacities of the country were. Captain Macfeely was almost daily writing and telegraphing to furnish supplies to him, but I could not get them down.

Question. Do you know whether any supplies were issued to troops along the line from the stock that was sent to Bowling Green for the army in Tennessee ?

I do not. I continued to send supplies until the railroad was cut this side of Bowling Green. I do not know what use was made of these rations sent to Bowling Green after the railroad was cut.

Question. Do you know why the use of the Green River was discontinued as a means of throwing supplies into Bowling Green ?

I do not recollect that it was used at all for that purpose.

Question. Where do you procure provisions, particularly the bread and meat, that you send for the use of the army in Tennessee ?

Principally in Cincinnati, Chicago, Saint Louis, Louisville, and the towns along the Ohio River.

Question. Do you procure large quantities in Kentucky ?

No, sir; the greater part comes from beyond Kentucky.

Question. Is it because the supplies are not to be had in sufficient quantity that you procure them beyond the limits of Kentucky ?

I do not know that the kind I require could be procured in Kentucky in such large quantities as I required to use them; certainly not of hard bread.

Question. Do you know what was the estimated daily consumption of rations by the army in Tennessee last summer (including wastage) of all authorized issues, both to troops and employes?

I had a great many letters from Captain Macfeely, and he repeatedly said he required 2,000,000 of rations a month. One time he called for 2,100,000, but his letters invariably referred to 2,000,000 a month that I must send to Nashville. Just before the railroad was cut between Nashville and Bowling Green he called for about 2,500,000 rations to be forwarded immediately and that they must arrive there before the 15th of August, as that amount would be necessary to fill up the depots, as ordered by General Buell.

Question. Could you procure in that part of Kentucky, that is, conveniently within your reach, flour enough to supply the army in Tennessee?

I could.

Question. Where would you get it from?

I could get large quantities in the vicinity of Bowling Green, and also in the vicinity of Louisville.

Question. Do you get any considerable quantities from those regions?

Nearly all the flour I use I procure here in Louisville. All the flour that is used in and around Bowling Green is procured by the commissary from that part of the country and has been for some time.

Question. Is what you procure in Louisville the product of this State or does it come from abroad?

I think it is the product of this State. The mills are here in town.

Question. Do you know whether flour and meat were shipped to Nashville last spring and all the time after the occupation of that place for a market when the routes by river and railroad were open?

I have no knowledge of anything of the kind.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Were not the troops along the line between this and Bowling Green supplied from here as usual after the road was cut between Bowling Green and Nashville?

I suppose so. I should have to go to my books to see if I shipped to points along the line.

Question. Please do so.

By General TYLER:

Question. Did you attempt to make any purchases of any part of your rations at Bowling Green or anywhere along the line of railroad between here and Nashville?

All my purchases I made in answer to advertisements, and I do not think anybody from Bowling Green ever bid; but I received letters from parties at Bowling Green offering to sell flour or bacon, but I wrote to the commissary there to attend to that himself; if there was flour to be bought, to procure all he needed at Bowling Green, to send his account to me, and I would pay him. I never bought any myself there.

Question. Were any purchases made under these instructions that you recollect; and, if so, to what extent?

There were some purchases made of flour under these instructions, but how much I cannot say.

Commission adjourned to meet Tuesday, January 20, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 20, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU (a witness for the Government), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. State, if you please, your name and position in the United States service.

Lovell H. Rousseau, major-general of volunteers.

Question. You will state, general, whether you were present at the battle of Perryville; and, if so, who marked out your line of battle upon that day.

At the battle of Perryville, or Chaplin Hills as it was called by our commander, I made my line of battle myself. Some changes were made by General McCook by consultation between us and some by him without consultation. General McCook was not on the ground when I first formed the line of battle.

Question. At what time did you arrive there and how long after was it that you saw General McCook?

It is hard to tell what time we reached the ground. I suppose it must have been about 10 or 11 o'clock; but I am not positive. General McCook was with me on the march and up to the time that we fell in with General or Captain Gay (whatever he may be), commander of cavalry. We heard firing of cannon for some hours as we approached the ground upon which the battle was fought. On the march I think General McCook received a note from General Buell, or else he had received it that morning, stating to him that he should approach Perryville with caution. That, I think, was the substance of the note. When we got to where we could see a portion of the enemy in the woods, who seemed to be scouts, watching, General McCook directed me to send forward a reconnaissance, leaving my artillery in the rear on the road—that the enemy were in the vicinity of Perryville, and would probably resist our approach in that direction. I did so, and they reported the enemy in view when they arrived in sight of the battle ground. I sent word back to General McCook that the enemy were in view. He came up to the front, and we rode up and looked over the ground and selected the line of battle, which was in rear of where it was actually fought. The enemy, however, seemed to be giving way and Gay seemed to be pursuing. He had two pieces of artillery and, I think, nearly all the cavalry. He wrote me a note to send him a regiment to support his pieces; that he had been driving them nearly all the morning. I sent him the regiment, which went to the front where his pieces were.

I made a mistake in my report of the battle in saying it was Captain Harris, when it should have been Captain Hotchkiss, who commanded the section. I did not catch the correct name in the confusion incident to the firing. We saw but few of the enemy, who soon disappeared from view and left toward Perryville. Hotchkiss' pieces were of short range, and I sent back for others to shell where we thought the enemy were. They finally disappeared, and I concluded, and so I supposed did McCook, that they would not fight at or near that point. He then rode off to see General Buell. I did not see him as he left. The enemy disappeared, and after waiting perhaps an hour—I do not remember the exact time—and my men having had no water for a long time and being near the Chaplin Creek and as we were halted by the enemy, I supposed I would be substantially obeying orders by moving on toward the water. I put the column in motion. As the head of the column was approaching to where Hotchkiss' pieces were my attention was called—I do not know by whom—to the fact that the enemy were in view again. I rode up to where these pieces were and got Hotchkiss' glass, and just as I was putting it to my eye they opened some two or three batteries and there was a very rapid and accurate firing of shells. I directed Captain Loomis to bring up the balance of his battery and Captain Simonson to bring up his. They did so, and the enemy soon ceased their rapid firing, but separated their pieces and kept up firing at intervals. I think the enemy had two or three batteries massed at that point. After that shelling they advanced their infantry and I galloped back to the balance of my troops to get them in position so as to front in that direction. The line I selected was almost at right angles with the line of the main army, which was fronting toward Perryville. I had formed, I believe, two brigades, Colonel Harris' brigade and Colonel Lytle's, or rather I directed Colonel Lytle to form his own and I showed Colonel Harris where to form his, and after sending several messages to Colonel Starkweather, who was separated from my command by General Jackson cutting him off, he arrived and reported to me, and I formed his brigade on the left. General McCook, however, returned before I had placed Starkweather in line, and by his orders Generals Jackson and Terrill moved a battery and some of their troops to support it through my lines to the front.

The following note, produced at the president's direction from among the orders of General Buell to General McCook, is identified by General Rousseau as the note referred to in the testimony, and made part of the record at the request of General Buell:

HEADQUARTERS OF GENERAL BUELL,
October 7, 1862—8 p. m.

GENERAL: The Third Army Corps (Gilbert's) is within $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of Perryville, the cavalry being nearer, probably within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles. From all the information gained to-day it seems probable that the enemy will resist our advance into the town. They are said to have a strong force in and near the place. There is no water here and we will get but little, if any at all, until we get it at Perryville. We expect to attack and carry the place to-morrow.

March at 3 o'clock precisely to-morrow morning without fail, and move up until the head of your column gets to within 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of Perryville; that is to say, until you are abreast of the Third Corps, the rest of the corps resting near Bottom's place.* Perhaps Captain Williams, Jackson's cavalry, will know where it is. From the point of the road Gilbert is now on across direct to your road is about $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles. When the head of your column gets to the vicinity designated (3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from town), halt and form it in order of battle and let the rear close well up, then let the men rest in position and be made as comfortable as possible, but do not permit them to scatter. Have the country on your front examined, a reconnaissance made, and collect all the information possible in regard to the enemy, the country, and the roads in your vicinity, and then report in person as quickly as practicable to these headquarters. If your men have an opportunity to get water of any kind they must fill their canteens and the officers must caution them particularly to use it in the most sparing manner. Send to the rear every wagon and animal which is not required with your column. All the usual precautions must be taken and preparation made for action. Keep all teams back except ammunition and ambulances.

Nothing has been heard from you to-day. Send orderlies by bearer to learn the locality of these headquarters. The general desires to see Captain Williams, Jackson's cavalry, by 7 o'clock in the morning at these headquarters.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

A true copy.

J. M. WRIGHT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Addressed to General McCook.

The WITNESS. I do not recollect having seen that note but once, and then only for a moment on the march; that was the next day after it was written. I received orders from General McCook at about 3.30 o'clock, I think, on the morning after the note was written, to march at 5 o'clock. I grumbled a little at the short notice, rode down to his headquarters, and he remarked to me that he had received it at a very late hour himself. I saw another note or two, perhaps, from General Buell, which were received, I think, on the march. I do not remember their substance, though I think I read them. The note just read and placed on the record is the note I previously referred to in my testimony.

Question. How long after the enemy began shelling you was it before you saw General McCook?

I cannot tell. It was not very long, but I do not recollect the exact time. General McCook came and aided in forming the line of battle, as previously stated.

Question. Did you see him during the action, and what orders did you receive from him?

He and I were in different parts of the field, I suppose. I was on the left of the line and in the center and kept so busy that I did not leave the lines. General McCook sent word to me by an aide to see him at Russell's house, I think it was; it was just in the center of the rear of our lines. That was late in the afternoon, and as we approached the house two or three batteries opened upon us from a point between us and Perryville with shell, and it was the most rapid firing I have ever yet seen or heard. I do not know whether the shells struck the house or not, but the air seemed full of them. I think I saw as many as four or five burst at a time. When I got near the house I was informed that General McCook had just left and was gone over toward the left center of the line. There I found the Fifteenth Kentucky falling back and a brigade of the enemy which had turned my right approaching from beyond the house. My time for the next three-quarters of an hour was taken up in repelling that attack, and I could not leave to hunt up General McCook, the attack was so fierce and the result of the enemy's success would have been so disastrous to me; so I did not see General McCook; that night he was on the ground; I could hear of him, but could not get to leave my men to see him until after dark. The enemy pressed us so hard that I had not a moment's time to go anywhere. Not having seen General McCook I rode up to see General Buell, hoping to see General McCook there. Being late in the evening, I supposed he had left and gone to General Buell, with whom I had an interview and told him the result of the day. I told General Buell we would require re-enforcements if the enemy renewed their attack in the morning. I remember when I said to him that they might renew their attack in the morning he said, "We will not wait for them to attack; I will attack them at daybreak."

* See Buell's copy of this dispatch, p. 50.

I went back then to General McCook and told him General Buell wanted to see him, as all the commanders of corps were going to meet at General Buell's headquarters. He left about 11 o'clock at night to see General Buell, and directed me to contract my lines and take another position on some hills there, which I did about half past three in the morning.

I understood from General Buell, in substance, that he was prepared to make an attack, and did not want to frustrate his plans by sending troops to the left unless absolutely necessary, and that that necessity could be avoided by an early and vigorous attack at or near Perryville, and I was satisfied myself that if they were attacked there they could not fight us on the left, as that swept around by a sort of left half wheel and would have placed the enemy rather in the rear of the main army when they advanced and they could not have staid there. The general instructions were to get my men so close together that I could hold my position there so as to let the army attack with the force designed for that purpose.

On my return from General Buell's headquarters I found that General McCook had not left the ground at all, but had called at my headquarters several times to see me, and I found him there on my return. He then went with me and we selected a new line of battle, which he desired me to take while he went to see General Buell. I received during the day several orders from General McCook to advance bodies of troops. I do not remember all the orders now. I received orders at the beginning of the fight, I remember very distinctly, to advance certain regiments to the front, which I did, to support the troops of Jackson and Terrill.

Question. At about what time was it, general, that this heavy firing occurred near the Russell house that you spoke of?

About three-quarters of an hour before night.

Question. When you visited General Buell's headquarters do you know whether you were the first to inform him of the action?

I was not the first. I told the general about the fight. I thought it had been an exceedingly hard one, but the general was pretty cool about it. I told him that I thought he did not appreciate the fight we had had, and that it was the hardest fight I had ever seen. He said he did appreciate it; that late in the afternoon he had heard of the battle; and my impression was that it was between 3 and 4 o'clock that he got the information, as he said, from an aide of General McCook that a battle was going on and re-enforcements were needed, and that he had ordered re-enforcements as soon as he got the information that they were required. His remark as to re-enforcements was called forth by a remark of my own that we had much needed them during the day. I recollect telling him about the enemy's constantly pressing forward without caring whether they were killed or not; and he remarked to me that there seemed to be no advance of the other side, or words to that effect, and I told him that we had a little more than we could do to hold our own. It was very clear to my mind, from all that occurred there between General Buell and myself, that he did not fully appreciate the fight we had had, though as the news came in from various persons he learned the true state of affairs. It was clear to my mind that the information he had received about the matter did not exhibit to him the true state of affairs on the left. Some of General Buell's aides had been over on the battle ground while the fight was progressing late in the afternoon, I understood. The general said there had been cannonading as the army advanced, sometimes more rapidly than others, but he had no information that there was a general engagement till late in the afternoon of that day. General Buell's headquarters were about 3 miles from where the battle was fought. I traveled in the night, however, and could not give an accurate judgment as to the distance.

Question. How was General Gilbert situated in reference to your forces that day?

I did not see General Gilbert during the whole day. I saw the left of his forces, or what I supposed were his, in line of battle not far from my right, perhaps not more than 400 to 600 yards.

Question. They were near enough to render you assistance when your right was turned, were they not?

Almost any part of the army might have been sent to re-enforce us. Gilbert's line, however, had been withdrawn when my right was turned. I think it had fallen back; but I speak of this from hearsay. I did not notice that the line was withdrawn. He was certainly near enough to render us assistance had he been inclined to do it. When I say "any part of the army might have come to our assistance," I do not mean to speak of the propriety of its doing so, but that it was near enough to do so.

Question. What command had Captain Gay that day?

I understood he had the command of all the cavalry.

By General DANA:

Question. What was your opinion on the evening of the 8th, about the time you left the field to go to General Buell's headquarters, regarding the enemy, as to whether they had been defeated or had gained a victory?

It was very certain they had gained no victory. They had gained some advantages on our left, but were finally repulsed and held and during the night they fell back, leaving their dead for us to bury.

Question. At the time you left the field that night to go to General Buell's headquarters was it your opinion that the enemy would stand and fight there next day or that he was retreating?

My impression was when I saw General Buell that he would stand and fight next morning, but when I returned to the field about 10.30 o'clock at night I saw indications that there would be no fight next morning. I saw large fires built in every direction and their cavalry were up to within 200 yards of our pickets; in fact they talked to each other that night. But the enemy were as tired of it as we were, and there seemed a disposition to wait as if by mutual consent. The moonlight was as bright as day almost. I gave orders once to turn one of my batteries on the cavalry, having learned where it was from a doctor who was down there; but I felt a little compunction about doing so and refrained, for I had some apprehension that they would renew the engagement, which I did not want without re-enforcements.

Question. At what time were you convinced that the rebel army was in retreat?

Next morning, when they were not to be found on the battle ground. I believed they were retreating during the night, but I was not certain of it. We heard wagons moving off to their rear.

Question. At what time did you first report that the enemy had retreated?

I did not report at all. General McCook was on the ground, and it was his business to report to General Buell, and I supposed he did so.

Question. At daylight on the morning of the 9th could you see in which direction the enemy was retreating?

No, sir; I could not. Some of the cavalry saw the rear of the enemy move over the hills, the road they came to attack us, as I understood. I am satisfied that a large body of the enemy left during the night; perhaps all the infantry.

Question. Had you any reason to believe at daylight next morning that the enemy was not in force in the immediate vicinity of Perryville and just beyond your view?

None in the world. I did not know anything about it, but I supposed, as the balance of the army did, that Bragg had a large army there, and that we would have a fight. That, I believe, was the universal impression.

Question. What was your impression as to the strength of Bragg's army at that time?

I always thought Bragg's army was overrated, though the information was that Bragg and Kirby Smith and Stevenson would make about 68,000 or 69,000 men. I put Bragg's force down in my own estimation, correct or incorrect, I cannot tell, at 35,000 to 40,000 when they were at Munfordville. I never rated it higher than 40,000. Kirby Smith had about 15,500 troops he brought into the State, so I was informed, and had got about 4,000 to 5,000 since of raw troops. Stevenson, they said, had about 15,000—7,500 I supposed.

I had the impression, as they themselves stated and as Bragg and the provisional governor had assured the people, that they would remain in the State and fight it out. I therefore thought they would concentrate their forces and give us battle up in that vicinity, and I was more impressed with this view from the fact that Kirby Smith had joined Bragg, as I understood, on the night of the battle. General Buell's information was, as I had from a very intelligent spy, that Bragg's army probably was over 60,000 men. In fact he said they had sixty regiments, many of them composed of 1,200 to a regiment. That was General Buell's information while he was considering whether Bragg's troops were going to Kentucky or were still in Tennessee. They certainly formed a line of battle between us and Harrodsburg, for I saw two very extended lines, each 2 miles long, one in the rear of the other, with their flanks well protected, showing that they had a very considerable force.

By the PRESIDENT:

Question. Is it your opinion, general, that the whole of Bragg's army or only a part of it was engaged in the action which you have described as taking place against McCook's corps?

Certainly; only a part of it, and as Bragg himself said in his report it was the divisions of Cheatham, Anderson, and Buckner.

Question. Is it not possible that the main body of Bragg's army at the time of that action was in retreat upon Harrodsburg while this portion that was engaged in the attack was only a corps, left behind to stop pursuit?

I have no idea, sir, that there was any retreat going on then. My information since from general report is that they were not retreating. Bragg himself said in his report that the two armies stood face to face in line of battle. The people told me at Harrodsburg that many of the troops that attacked us had gone up and through Harrodsburg and come down the other road to conceal their movements from us, and I have no doubt it was so.

By General DANA:

Question. In stating that on the morning of the 9th of October you had formed a definite opinion that the enemy had retreated, do you wish it to be understood that your opinion was that he had taken up a line of retreat for some distant point or did you wish it understood that he had fallen back to take up a new position for battle?

I have no "opinion" about their having retreated. It was a fact before my eyes that they were gone, and that was all I knew about it. I had an impression from the repeated assurances of Bragg and the boasts of the secessionists of the State, as well as from the numbers that were joining him, that, he did not intend to leave the State without a general battle. I felt that we might come upon General Bragg any day between Bardstown and the mountains just where he might choose to select his line of battle; and I felt another thing, too, that approaching Bragg was like hunting a "lion in a jungle." He had the best army for its numbers that I ever saw.

Commission adjourned to meet Wednesday, January 21, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 21, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General ROUSSEAU's testimony continued, as follows:

By General TYLER:

Question. General, in speaking yesterday of General Bragg's army you said "He had the best army for its numbers that I ever saw." Did you consider General Bragg's army at that time superior in its discipline and numbers to General Buell's army?

Yes, sir; I did consider it superior in discipline. I understand that he had a man shot every few days by his own orders. The principal reason why I think he had better discipline than we had in any of our armies was because I think he was seconded by his officers in a way perhaps that our generals were not and are not; I mean the subalterns. I did not consider it superior in numbers. That, however, is a mere guess of mine.

Question. General, give me your reasons for the fact that General Buell's army could not be brought to the same state of discipline that Bragg's army was?

In the first place, I understand all the officers who knew Bragg in the Army thought he was perhaps the best disciplinarian in the United States Army or among the very best. That is the universal opinion as far as I have heard, and I have conversed with a great many of the old Regular Army officers. In addition to that, I think the rebel officers, from the highest to the lowest, are more strict in the discharge of their duties than the subaltern officers of our Army, and that, I think, essential to the very existence of the Army in the rebellion, as it has been. I think that the want of discipline in our Army arises from the failure of subalterns to enforce it and to have breaches of discipline properly punished; and that is an evil that every sensible man who knows anything about the fact appreciates.

Question. General, whom do you consider directly responsible for the discipline of a regiment?

Of course the commanding officer.

Question. Who is responsible for the discipline of a company?

Of course the commanding officer, as far as his power and responsibility went, under the commanding officer of the regiment.

Question. Were you with General Buell's army at Corinth?

I was.

Question. Was the discipline of the army at or about the time of the battle of Perryville as good as it was at Corinth?

The discipline of General Buell's army proper was as good as it was at Corinth, and I am satisfied that the discipline of Buell's army was far better than that of any army I have ever seen, better drilled and better disciplined. When I speak of Buell's army proper I mean the troops under his immediate command at Corinth. General Mitchell's division was added to his army and a portion of it was at Chaplin Hills.

Question. What portion of General Buell's army at Perryville was drawn from Mitchell's army and what was the discipline of that portion of the army?

I cannot now tell exactly what troops of Mitchell's division were at Perryville. I had a part of the Third Division there, with a brigade added to it at Nashville and three raw regiments at this place. I think several regiments of Mitchell's command were left at or in the vicinity of Nashville. In the main the discipline is what we would call good, though of some regiments the discipline was not good. Mitchell's division had been stationed in Alabama, and a good deal of feeling had been gotten up between citizens there and the men. Many of the men belonging to it were shot down by bushwhackers, or persons represented to be such, and, as we felt, murdered, and of course that tended to exasperate the soldiers and to cause breaches of discipline; and that want of discipline continued in some regiments in Kentucky, and many grievous outrages were committed here in this State.

Question. Did this want of discipline, as you are pleased to term it, affect the efficiency of these regiments on the field?

Any want of discipline of course affects the efficiency of soldiers, but those men fought well. Soldiers of regiments under the best discipline fought better and were more reliable.

Question. General, you spoke yesterday of Stevenson's division, 15,500; where did that division come from?

I do not know. I never heard of it myself until about the time of that battle, and then I got it from some of the citizens of the country; and all I have said about the numbers of Bragg's army has been a mere guess, from hearsay and from such information as we could pick up. I would not pretend to oppose my opinion to that of the commanding officer, whose means of knowledge were so much superior to my own.

Question. Was this division of Stevenson's a part of Bragg's army that crossed the Tennessee River at Chattanooga and the Cumberland at Carthage?

I do not know anything in the world about Stevenson. I do not know whether there was such a man or whether he had such an army. I believe there was such a man, and my understanding was that he was not with Bragg's army, and had not come from Chattanooga with Bragg's army, whichever way they came. I received a letter from a very intimate and loyal friend, after the battle of Perryville, stating the rebel force in Kentucky, and Stevenson was set down as reputed to have 15,000 men; this friend said 7,000 or 8,000 in fact, and that they were at Danville at the time this letter was written. The letter was written before the battle by a person who passed through Richmond after the battle there to this place around by Lexington.

Question. What was the position of your command with respect to that of the enemy on the night of the battle of Perryville a little after sundown, say about 8 o'clock?

The right of my line had fallen back some distance; the line, in fact, was turned, pressed back; the left fell back perhaps 200 or 300 yards, the center more, to about the original line of battle selected that morning. The enemy, it is true, were near us; their cavalry were within 200 or 300 yards of our pickets; but we had a front to the enemy, and were ready to renew the fight had there been any effort to drive us from our position. The artillery on the left fired guns, under my immediate orders, till after dark, and the infantry were there to support the guns.

Question. Was your line of battle or any part of it changed between 8 o'clock on the night of the battle and daybreak the next morning?

Yes; I have already stated that, and that it was done under the immediate direction of General McCook, who ordered the change and directed where it should be, and then went to call upon General Buell.

Question. Do you know anything of General Mitchell's command having possession of the village of Perryville on the afternoon of the battle and what that possession amounted to?

I suppose it was between 10 and 11 o'clock on the night of the battle. As I was leaving General Buell's headquarters I met General Mitchell, and he informed me, according to my recollection, that he had approached near the town with his forces, and had himself, with his escort, rode into the town and got a glass of water, and was just from there. I do not know whether he had possession of the town or not.

Cross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Has the removal of the death-penalty from the authority of our army commanders had any effect upon the discipline of our armies, do you suppose, general?

I have no doubt of it, and no one with whom I have ever conversed on the subject doubts it.

Question. Judging from the experience of all armies and from your own observation do you suppose it is possible to have thorough discipline in an army without it?

I suppose such a thing would be possible, but I am sure it is not practicable, and am sure that it would tend greatly to induce discipline.

Question. Was our army at Perryville composed to a considerable extent of raw regiments, that had only been in service a very short time?

Yes, sir; there were a good many raw regiments in that army, who marched badly and fought worse.

Question. Were those regiments under my command or discipline in any manner prior to their ingraftment upon the old army?

General Buell personally could have had nothing to do with them. I had no knowledge as to whether they were even in his department or not up to the time they were added to the army.

Question. Do you suppose, general, that a lavish provision for troops in the way of clothing, provisions, and other comforts, and the occasional deprivation of those comforts unavoidably would have the tendency to produce a worse state of discipline than though they were habitually limited to what was absolutely necessary for them?

Of course it would.

Question. Will you state, if you please, whether that difference exists between the army of the Government and the rebel army probably in the most marked degree?

My information from rebel prisoners and others who pretended to know is that the rebels have never indulged the soldiers in lavish supplies. I suppose that that difference between the two armies does exist. Our army, when it receives its regular rations, has a lavish supply.

Question. Were you stationed in North Alabama last summer, general?

I was; at Huntsville.

Question. Do you know anything of the policy that had been observed by our troops in that section of country toward the inhabitants? If so, please state what that policy was, or at least what the effect of this treatment was upon the temper of the people.

I know something of the practices of the soldiers there. General Mitchel had left before I reached Huntsville a few days. I can only say that between some of the regiments of General Mitchel's army and the people there was a very bitter feeling existing, and, as I before said, it was partly induced by the shooting of the soldiers by bushwhackers, and they in turn handled the people very roughly. I heard many well-authenticated incidents well calculated to excite a feeling among the inhabitants. I believe that many of the soldiers had been very much in the habit of taking everything they wanted and many things they did not want, such as men and women's and children's clothing, &c. I was informed by a loyal man there—and there were not many of them, in my judgment—that the course previously pursued had done great injury to the cause of the Government, and I have no doubt it was true. The people did not complain so much on account of what was taken from them as they did of the manner and the persons who did it. They seemed to give very freely to the officials, when it was demanded, whatever the Government required. The complaint was soldiers and officers entered private residences and took out of them whatever they wanted—silver plate, money, and anything else—and the manner of doing it, and of the wanton destruction of the furniture of the houses.

Question. State, if you please, what you know in regard to my policy with reference to the treatment of the people among whom we were and with reference to their property.

I had many conversations with General Buell as to the proper course to be pursued. His policy was one I cordially approved myself, and that was that whatever the Government needed its officials should take peaceably and peacefully, and that all private marauding, stealing, and robbing, which tended to the destruction of discipline and the efficiency of the army, should be repressed, and I have had occasion at various times to see that policy enforced in person by General Buell, and I believe that on all proper occasions that policy was enforced. That has been the policy of General Buell, as far as I have understood it, during the time that he commanded this department. As his army marched to Shiloh this policy was pretty faithfully carried out, but as the army returned in September last there was a great want of discipline exhibited; yet as it returned comparatively few grievances were complained of or outrages committed, and that is something I have never understood. I do not think that the want of discipline arose from any fault of General Buell, for I consider him one of the best disciplinarians I know.

Question. Do you know any instance of my failure to make use of the supplies of the country through which we were marching when they were necessary for the efficiency of the army?

No, sir; quite to the contrary. On all occasions when the army needed supplies and they could be obtained they were freely taken and used. I have never known a United States officer in this war that would fail to take supplies when the army needed them and he could obtain them.

Question. My policy with reference to slaves in the country through which we have marched has been made a subject of inquiry before the Commission. Will you please state what you know in regard to it?

The question is somewhat indefinite. I can say this much of General Buell's policy, that he desired to have as little to do with the slaves as might be. When they were needed as teamsters or to work on the fortifications I understood it to be his wish to use them freely as teamsters when belonging to secessionists and to take them all alike when they were needed on the fortifications. I recollect he objected to having slaves in camp, on the ground that whatever might be the political principles of the owners their presence there tended to the demoralization of the army; that they consumed the supplies intended for the army or else were driven to steal and maraud to get something to eat. I believe his policy was to turn all slaves whom you might call "surplus" out of camp up to the time that the law was changed on that subject. I believe he was opposed, as distinctly as I was, to aiding in any possible way a secessionist in obtaining possession of his slaves, but desired that loyal men should have their negroes. With General Buell's concurrence I used several hundred negroes at Huntsville and Nashville in erecting fortifications, and he knew that I had a great number of able-bodied negroes as teamsters in my command, as I think I informed him several times and as he could see himself. He objected to negroes going with the army in large numbers and waiting on the soldiers, as was practiced in the troops of General Mitchel and perhaps in others.

Question. Do you know any instance of my availing myself of the information of negroes, particularly when we were in Northern Alabama, and of my making certain disposition of my troops in consequence of their reports?

Yes, I know of several such instances occurring in which negroes gave information and bodies of troops were used on that information.

Question. Was that information generally of much value?

Generally not of the least, and on the occasion I refer to the stories told by the negroes were either entirely untrue or so exaggerated that the information amounted to nothing except to fatigue and weary our soldiers to no purpose. The negroes are far more useful to the rebels than to us, although nearly all of them are friendly to our Government, and for the reason, among others, that they are so useful to the rebels I am opposed to their owning any.

Question. State, if you please, what you know in regard to the scarcity or abundance of supplies in North Alabama and other parts of the country through which we marched last summer.

Supplies were very scarce on the whole line of march; in fact I think the inhabitants had not enough for their own purpose, though in some neighborhoods we could procure forage and now and then other supplies for the army. It was this scarcity that created the difficulty of keeping up very strict discipline, as one cannot very well punish a soldier who gets something to eat on the plea that he is suffering with hunger. We were a good deal of time on half rations from Huntsville up to Kentucky.

Question. Do you know whether the people about Huntsville were in very considerable want for the necessaries of life when we were there last summer; whether such articles did not demand very high prices among them, and whether they were introduced from the North?

Yes; many of the people of Huntsville and about Nashville I found to be in want of the necessaries of life, especially about Huntsville. Old Governor Clay's lady—a very strong secessionist old lady—told me that her family had very little to eat and that the soldiers had taken their bacon. I told her I would divide with her after her supply was exhausted, and she accordingly called upon me when her store was out. They are worth some hundreds of thousands of dollars; her husband was probably worth half a million. I told Captain Paul to issue rations for the Governor and his wife as indigent persons. The old lady said she would not have them in that way, and was disposed to take offense. I told her that was the only way in which she could get supplies, and she declined to take them as "poor persons." Many of the wealthy people there were hard pressed for the necessaries of life. Such articles already commanded high prices, of course, and persons were allowed to introduce what was prudently thought to be a simple supply to the citizens in and about Huntsville. I was in command there myself, and under General Buell's policy I allowed the bringing of supplies from Nashville and Louisville to that place, but always in limited quantities. The supplies designed to be taken there were always named and set down on paper and permission given to bring only such supplies as were therein named.

Question. Do you remember whether some such supplies were actually taken possession of for the subsistence of the troops subsequently?

Yes, sir; I remember especially some considerable quantities of bacon were taken possession of, and other articles which I do not now remember, and used by the army. In fact it was spoken of, when this policy was settled, that any provisions brought there in the way spoken of should be taken and used, if they were needed, before they were sold.

Question. When you were lying at Horse Well last summer, on the march from Nashville to Louisville, did you send off any detachment? If so, please state on what occasion and with what object and what result.

I do not think I sent any detachment. I went myself with a brigade and some cavalry to Glasgow to get some hundreds of barrels of flour that were said to be below the town. I did not get any; they had been taken away by the rebels, so I was informed. I asked General Buell's permission to go down there myself with that view and he gave it.

Question. Do you know anything of the capture and paroling of rebel prisoners of war while you were in that vicinity?

I captured a good many prisoners there.

Question. How long did your division remain in Louisville on your arrival here last September?

I do not recollect exactly; it was a few days. I think we left here on the 1st of October; that is my recollection. I suppose we remained here four to six days, but I am not certain. I have not thought of it.

Question. Will you state how the time was occupied in preparing the army for future operations; whether you were busy yourself and the rest of the army as far as you know and what was necessary in order to make the army efficient?

The army was much in need of clothing, shoes, &c., and I believe every commander here exerted himself to get supplies, and it was with great difficulty that we obtained them. The clothing, as I understood, had been removed, under General Nelson's orders, to Jeffersonville, Ind., in the expectation that General Bragg would help himself to it if it remained here, and it was with difficulty we could get hold of it. I had myself a great deal of trouble to get supplies, and I know that General McCook and others were also much troubled in getting theirs. I was not when I arrived here under the command of General McCook. I commanded the two divisions composing the right wing of the army below Mumfordsville. Ours were separate commands until the night before we started toward Perryville, as far as my knowledge of the fact goes. My division finally left without having obtained the supply of clothing and shoes needed.

Question. Was the army during that time provided in whole or in part with an outfit of light cooking utensils? If so, please state whether you consider it was necessary to enable the army to move with the limited transportation with which it did move.

By an order it was required that the troops should be supplied with so many coffee-pots, mess pans, &c., to be always carried by the men in the army, and the transportation was reduced. I thought then, and I am sure now, that the arrangement was a very excellent one, as the men were always prepared to make coffee and cook meat whether the train was with them or not. I think that was necessary to enable the army to move with facility, and I look upon the wagon trains of the United States Army as a great impediment to its movements and a nuisance.

Question. Considering the work that was done, paying, feeding, and supplying the troops with these various essentials, and the ingrafting of a large number of raw troops into the army, amounting almost to a reorganization of the whole, do you think that any time was wasted before the army marched from Louisville against the rebel army in Kentucky?

I know there was none, for I was myself at work as hard as I could to obtain the necessary supplies, and thus had an opportunity of knowing that no time was lost.

Commission adjourned to meet Thursday, January 22, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 22, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General ROUSSEAU'S testimony continued, as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Were you in command at Bowling Green on the 13th and 14th of September last?

I was senior officer there for two or three days about that time. General Smith had been placed in command of the post and was supposed to be acquainted with the routine of matters, and I thought it best not to change the command, though all matters of importance requiring action were referred to me, I believe, as commander of the forces there.

Question. Do you remember the arrival of any persons at that place on the days mentioned with information from Munfordville? If so, please state who they were and all the information they gave you.

While I was there several persons came from Munfordville or the vicinity with information of the state of matters at Munfordville. I do not recollect the name of any person except a Mr. Miller, who formerly kept a saw-mill at Munfordville. Somebody from that vicinity had seen me before I saw Miller; I think two or three had called on me from the neighborhood of Munfordville to give me information. I recollect that my information first was that Munfordville was taken. I do not recollect who gave that information now, but I told General Buell on the morning of his arrival at my headquarters, to which he came directly on reaching Bowling Green. I perhaps gave him that information and referred him to the person or persons who gave it. My recollection on those points, however, is not clear; rather indistinct. I am sure that I got the information that Munfordville was taken. Afterward that report was contradicted by Mr. Miller, as I recollect it, but I do not know how long after.

Question. If those persons had come to you with any pressing and important message do you think the impression would remain on your mind? I will thank you, general, to refresh your memory as well as you can, and state to the Commission anything in connection with the arrival of those messengers or scouts that made an impression upon you which you can now recollect.

I recollect the information given much better than I do the parties who gave it.

Loyal men from several directions were coming in to give me information. About the same time I received information of the approach of Bragg's army, which was at that time occupying much of our attention. My recollection is that my informants were from the neighborhood of Munfordville; from a countryman living there. There were a good many of them, and I think I turned some of them who had important information over to General Buell in my tent and he conversed with them. That is my recollection of it now. One of those men said that he was between Munfordville and Bowling Green (I think he said he lived there), and that he inferred Munfordville was taken because he heard very rapid firing of cannon and musketry at the place and which lasted some time. I think that was his evidence for believing Munfordville was taken. He thought there was force enough of the enemy there to have taken Munfordville. It turned out that that was General Chalmers' attack, which was repulsed. I think General Buell obtained from the person or persons who brought that information the true state of the case—the evidence and conclusions that the informants had—and of course drew his own conclusions from the premises.

Question. Do you mean by that that I obtained myself the ground upon which they came to the conclusion that Munfordville had been taken; or, if not, what do you mean by "the true state of the case"?

When I say that General Buell had the ground and conclusions, he had the information and conclusions of the informants. Of course I mean that he could draw his own conclusions from the facts detailed.

Question. Is the impression left on your mind that these messengers, or any of them, came with pressing information from the commanding officer at Munfordville?

I am sure they did not. They brought no information from him at all—those I saw and to whom I now refer. When the information came to us, after the attack on Munfordville was repulsed, I felt no apprehension of its being very soon renewed. I thought from the information I had that Bragg's army was much worn down, and could not gather itself up and get to Munfordville as soon as it did.

Redirect examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. General, you were speaking yesterday of the discipline of our army; was not the Army of the Ohio while falling back to Nashville and from Nashville to Louisville very much demoralized?

No; I do not think it was. There was more marauding than I had seen and a good deal of straggling. The marches, however, were pretty rapid, and we were pretty short of rations. These things, and, as I remarked yesterday, other matters I did not understand, had caused a laxity of discipline on coming up that did not exist as the army went back. I sometimes thought that the marauding and want of discipline on coming up resulted, perhaps, from the opinion of the soldiers that they would not go back again. That, however, was a conjecture. After our arrival at this point we lost a great many men by desertion, who went home to see their families; but I think the army at Munfordville, at least the two divisions I commanded, were in the best condition of any United States troops I have ever seen, and would have fought a battle better than they would before or since. They were well rested at Horse Well and pretty well supplied with rations and every way in fine condition for a battle; better than at Chaplin Hills by far. It is very probable that the retrograde movement had its bad influence on the discipline of the army, but I am not prepared to say to what extent.

Question. Is it not an admitted fact that the superior discipline and drill of the rebel army gives it an advantage over our forces?

I am sure that the rebel army is not better drilled than ours, and I believe not near so well drilled; but I think discipline will always tell, and the discipline of the rebel army under the command of Bragg gave them an advantage over troops that are not so well disciplined. In speaking of the difference in discipline of the two armies I must not be understood as underrating the discipline of the Army of the Ohio or the Cumberland. That army has never lacked discipline in any great degree, in my judgment. Its discipline was, perhaps, as good as we could have with the sort of punishment we were allowed to inflict, and the failure of the subaltern officers in a great many instances to discharge their duties faithfully has also resulted finally in a lack of punishment both with officers and men. My opinion is that the soldiers of our army are the best in the world, and all that they want to exhibit that on all occasions is that the officers should be as good as the soldiers. But punishments are very rarely inflicted upon officers and about as rarely upon soldiers. My judgment is that more than one-half of the army is now absent from the field. Some regiments that I have commanded, I was informed, had in one or two instances but little over one-third of the men that were in the service in the field; and it has been impossible to get the subaltern officers to either report or punish the straggling of soldiers as a general rule—a practice, I think, which would ruin any army in the world. The subaltern officers did not want intelligence or courage, but the disposition to strictly enforce the necessary discipline. By subalterns I mean captains, lieutenants, &c.

Question. Do you attribute this lack of one-third of our forces at the present moment to absence without leave?

No, sir; but to leaves obtained on every possible kind of pretext; and that evil may in a great degree be traced to the same source I have been speaking of.

Question. Have not the rebel forces exhibited a superior steadiness under fire to our army and are they not easier handled in battle?

In attacking it seems almost impossible to repel the rebels; their dash is very hard to resist, and I have rarely seen it resisted when their troops were fresh. But one dash with the same troops is about as much as you get well done. I think our troops, if ordered to attack and well led, would probably attack as well as they do and I think may be handled as well. Individually I think the rebel soldiers are generally superior to our own, and that they understand as well as we do, and hence they never fight us in open ground where they can help it. They always skirmish where they can, that the individuality of the soldier may tell. In the battles I have seen them fight they always fought in the woods or on uneven ground if they could get it. That may in a great measure result from the desperate position they occupy and from the invincible hatred toward the Federal forces that has been inculcated by their leaders, and I think it is so. I saw them resisted for hours at Perryville, or Chaplin Hills, by the Third Division and driven back; and I must say that I do not consider any rebel command superior to that division in discipline or drill, or that could, in my judgment, whip it with equal numbers.

Question. What became of the slaves that were used on the fortifications after you were through with their labor?

In truth I never got through. I left Huntsville before the fortifications were completed and I left Nashville also before they were finished there. I think, however, I may safely say that very few of them have found their way back to their owners, even to loyal men. There were very few loyal owners about Huntsville, but a considerable number about Nashville.

Question. What do you know, general, about supplies having been furnished the army from the Tennessee River while you were at Huntsville?

I never heard of any coming from that direction.

Question. Do you know anything about the capture of Colonel Forsyth and another rebel officer, whose name I do not know, near Horse Well or in that neighborhood?

Yes, sir; I know all about it. Colonel Forsyth was, I think, on Bragg's staff. There was a Major Sheppard taken at the same time—he was on Hardee's staff; and a captain or a major on Governor Harris' staff, and I think three other commissioned officers. I think there were six taken in all. They were brought to my headquarters at night at Horse Well. We were just up from the supper table, and I inquired if they would take supper, and they said they would. They complained a good deal of fatigue, and I gave them some Bourbon and supper, and sent them under escort to General Buell's headquarters. I went to bed, and some time afterward these men were sent back to our picket lines, and I received a note at that time from Colonel Fry, chief of staff to General Buell, saying that I must send no more prisoners to headquarters, but to have them paroled, and that it was much to be regretted that those prisoners were allowed to come into the lines or to go to General Buell's headquarters, and that prisoners must not be sent there any more, and that I must send those prisoners out of the lines before day. This I endeavored to do, directing the officer in command of them, a major, I think, of the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, to parole them. He was an intelligent gentleman, and told me that he understood it and would do it. They were accordingly taken away under escort, and sent away as ordered, and that was the last I saw of them. I sent no more prisoners to General Buell's headquarters. This is the substance of the order as I now recollect it, but I am not aware that I have thought of the circumstance since it occurred.

Question. Do you know whether their parole was properly taken or not?

I do not. I talked with the major on the subject and told him what I thought about the parole, and he said he understood it in the same way, and paroled them.

Question. Do you know whether Colonel Forsyth and the officers considered themselves under parole or whether they resumed their duties subsequently?

I have no information on that subject, except that Forsyth resumed his duties on Bragg's staff on the ground that he was a citizen and not a soldier, which fact he did not intimate to me when I had him in custody. He said he was a colonel and on Bragg's staff, and I treated him, of course, as an officer of the army, and never had a suspicion that he was anything else. Major Flynt, on General Thomas' staff, told me that Forsyth had resumed his duties on Bragg's staff on the ground stated. I only heard that down in the neighborhood of Nashville lately.

Question. Do you recollect the officer's name who paroled them?

I do not, but I am sure I could learn who he was.

Question. Do you not consider the paroling of these officers at that time and under the circumstances very imprudent?

It did not occur to me that it was so. I almost thought it was a very good thing they came into our lines. I was not of opinion that we could attack and drive Bragg from his position at Munfordville without the loss perhaps of half our army; and I did not agree with the implied censure of Colonel Fry for sending them into camp. Our troops were all along the road and had fires, and exhibited evidences of a very large force—very large; and I am of opinion to-day that it was the information gotten by Bragg from these men that started him from Munfordville, though that is a mere guess of mine. If Forsyth was really a citizen, which fact he concealed from us, and broke his parole, I suppose he gave whatever information he had. I do not think we had anything to lose one way or another by it. They seemed, however, to be very honorable gentlemen all of them, and I did not doubt they would keep the parole given. When speaking of "our troops," I mean the two divisions under my command. I do not know how the others were encamped, but believe the larger portion of them were not, perhaps, seen by these officers, as they were beyond General Buell's headquarters and up toward Cave City. My own campfires made a great show, and I allude to them in what I have said.

Question. Did not your advance, general, at Chaplin Hills, from the position assigned you by General Buell, really bring upon you that attack?

I cannot say that it did. We were not much in advance of where we first halted and where I supposed General McCook believed he was directed to go. We were attacked while on the march, before the column had barely been put in motion. It had not gone 200 yards, and in fact had not passed the position occupied by Hotchkiss' guns, under the command of Gay. My impression was then that the enemy had planned that attack. I thought so from the fact that the rebel scouts before referred to carried the information and soon after the attack was begun, though of course I cannot tell what induced the attack. It was not announced by General McCook that we would halt permanently there, and at the time I felt that the march was merely interrupted by the appearance of the enemy. I did not know and was not informed how much farther we would have to go to get to the point or position designed by General Buell; hence I thought it was right to advance and get water, though before the advance had progressed more than 200 or 300 yards, as before stated, the shelling by the enemy began and the attack by the infantry followed.

Question. Your men were suffering for want of water at that time were they not?

A good deal.

Question. When this movement was made in the direction of the water was there not some confusion naturally arising from the anxiety of the men to get there?

Not in the least. I should have felt that they had very little discipline if it had been so. The men stood up and fought all day afterward in the heat without water and without grumbling.

Question. Had you remained where you halted would you not have been in a better position to meet that attack than where it found you?

No; but the original line of battle selected was far better than the ground we fought on, I suppose. There were more undulations there, and the enemy's advance, I think, would have been more difficult; but both positions had their advantages and disadvantages. The troops were originally halted in the rear of the line of battle selected by General McCook and myself on approaching the field, as stated in the early part of this deposition. I do not now refer to the ground upon which the line of battle was finally formed.

Question. These people from Munfordville came to Bowling Green in search of General Buell, did they not?

No; I think they were stampeded off from up there and were hunting up the military authorities. They were not aware that General Buell was at Bowling Green; and, in fact, he did not reach there till after they had been there for some time, and he found them, as before stated, at my headquarters. I introduced them to General Buell on his arrival, and referred them to him to give such information as they had.

Question. Your impression is that they brought no message from Colonel Wilder; may you not be in error about this?

Well, I think not, with respect to the men I have referred to. It strikes me that while we were staying at Bowling Green some messenger came from Wilder with the news that he had repulsed the enemy. That is my recollection of it. I remember feeling a good deal of exultation and pride in Wilder for his spunk and confidence exhibited in reference to matters at Munfordville, and I think it was the news coming directly from Wilder by somebody that prompted the belief that he would not be again attacked, having repulsed the enemy with great loss in a considerable fight, in addition to the other reason that Bragg's army was much worn down by coming through the mountains. I am not sure that the person came as a messenger from Wilder. It may have been that he merely saw Wilder and received that information from him, though I am inclined to believe that he was from Wilder to the commanding officer at Bowling Green.

Question. What regiments are those that you were informed had not over one-third of their number?

My recollection is that the Thirty-eighth Indiana is one of them, and that portion of it that is now in the field is among the best regiments in the army. I do not recollect now what the other regiments were, but I think I may say that half the regiments have about one-half or two-thirds of their number in the field. That is my best impression.

By General DANA:

Question. General, in reference to the opinion that the rebel army is individually superior to our army, is this superiority to be attributed to a greater physical development on their part or to greater intelligence and courage?

I do not consider their physical development superior to that of our soldiers. It is certainly true, however, that men who love strife and fighting for its own sake have very generally joined the Confederate Army in the South. Even men from the free States who love mischief and blood have joined that Army. I think that consideration adds to their vim. Then, as I have before stated, they generally cherish a hatred and bitterness toward what they call the Yankees that our army does not entertain for them. I certainly do not consider them more intelligent, generally less intelligent, than our own soldiers.

Question. Do you not think a perfect self-reliance on their superior courage would naturally lead them, in equal numbers, to seek a fight in open field, in plain daylight, in preference to hiding in woods?

No; I have never seen a rebel lose a chance yet of winning an advantage with certainty if he understood it; and in the battles we have had they have been very well acquainted with the woods and the ground, and of course, even with equal courage, had a very great advantage in availing themselves of covers. Besides, I do not think their armies have generally been equal to ours in numbers, and that was a fact that was better conceded by fighting us in the way they have. There is another consideration: our troops are generally very well drilled, and fight in large bodies in the open field far better than they fight in any other way. They are better drilled as heavy infantry than they are as skirmishers, infinitely. This, I think, the rebels understand. Many prisoners I have taken have intimated the fact to me in talking to me about the progress of battles.

By General TYLER:

Question. In your testimony yesterday you said that the necessities of life about Huntsville were brought from the North at the time you were there; what do you understand by the necessities of life? Please enumerate the articles that were brought from the North.

I understand by the necessities of life sugar, coffee, bread, meat, rice, &c.

Question. Was there not great want of fresh provisions—beef (cattle on the hoof), pork, &c.?

I think there was. North Alabama is not a cattle country, and when our supplies got low there I sent out and brought in all the cattle for many miles around, under the orders of General Buell—milk-cows and yearlings and everything I could scrape up.

Question. Over what extent of country?

Some 6 to 10 miles, I suppose, in every direction. When I say all, I do not mean every one. The order to the commissary was to get all he could. They were, however, very inferior cattle, small and thin. I think we left without using all the cattle while there. Several hundred, I think, were sent up to the troops at Stevenson on the cars. I don't think the supply of beef was worth talking about. I cannot tell whether it was reduced by supplying the army under General Mitchel before I got there, which I think probable. Whenever his communications with his base of supplies was interrupted he supplied himself from the country, as I was informed, and so did we under like circumstances. There was, I believe, very little pork in the country. I think it is a very poor hog country; poor probably for the reasons already stated and because attention was not turned in that direction.

Question. What was the condition of the summer crops—corn, wheat, &c.—so far as they could be made useful to the army, at the time you were passing down?

I did not go from Huntsville to Stevenson, but the corn crop seemed to be pretty good around the country about Huntsville, and I saw more corn than I expected to find in portions of Tennessee and Alabama. An order came from Captain Chandler, quartermaster to General Buell, directing us, when our supplies got short there, to have all the corn stripped by the farmers, so as to make it fit for the use of the army. It was not sufficiently cured without stripping it. The work was begun, and we sent out and procured a good deal of corn, but shortly afterward we evacuated the place and I do not know what else was done.

Question. You spoke yesterday in your testimony of the discipline of the army having been weakened by the ingrafting on it of new regiments. How many new regiments were put into each brigade?

I am not sure that I know; but I had three in my own division, one regiment added to each brigade, and I think that was the number added to each brigade in the army.

Question. What proportion, then, of your division consisted of new soldiers?

It is difficult to say. The Ninety-fourth Ohio had lost 200 or 300 near Lexington, Ky., taken by Kirby Smith's forces, and I do not recollect the number of the other regiments. I suppose 1,600 to 1,800 raw troops were added to my division, and I suppose my division amounted to between 7,000 and 8,000, artillery, cavalry, and all included. Considerable numbers of the raw troops of the army gave out on the road or straggled and did not go into battle at all, the hot weather, want of water, and hard marching rendering it almost impossible to keep them up.

Recross-examination by General BUELL:

Question. Do you know of any division or of any brigades in the other divisions that were composed entirely of raw troops; Sheridan's division, for example?

I think so. It must have been so, for we had a great many more raw troops than could have gone into the army a regiment to a brigade, as I understood it.

Question. Do you know anything about the composition of Jackson's division and of Colonel McCook's brigade in Sheridan's division? If so, please state how they were composed, whether of raw troops or of old troops.

The division of Jackson was entirely composed of raw troops, I believe. Col. Dan. McCook's brigade consisted of raw troops, and although Jackson's division was composed of excellent and brave men, I think they were very inefficient in battle, because they were raw and inexperienced.

Question. Has there been anything decided in my policy in reference to the absence of officers and soldiers from their regiments? Have my orders and my practice on that point been loose or decidedly the reverse?

The policy of General Buell as to those matters was more strict—a great deal more strict—than that of any commanding officer I know. In fact, it has been the cause of great complaint and much dislike in the army. To my certain knowledge a great many good men and good officers have taken great offense against General Buell on that account.

Question. Do you remember what day of the month it was that Colonel Forsyth and the other rebel officers you have referred to were captured and was it in the day or night, and if in the night were they sent off the same night?

I do not remember the day of the month. They were captured in the afternoon, about 9 miles from my headquarters, as I understood from Colonel Forsyth himself, over on what is called the Goose Neck road, or some such name. They were brought to my headquarters after dark. As soon as they had supper they were sent on to General Buell's headquarters, and returned between that time and 12 o'clock at night, and on the same night were sent out of our lines.

Question. Without inquiring at all what ground there may have been for the delays, supposing that my orders to General McCook had been exactly and promptly executed, that similar orders to General Thomas, who should have been within 7 miles of Perryville on the night of the 7th of October, had also been promptly and exactly executed, what effect do you suppose they would have had upon our fortunes at Perryville and the result of our operations there?

I do not think I can say what failure there was in obeying the orders of General Buell. I do not know how near we had arrived at Perryville to this day. I never was there, and I do not know whether the battle that we fought there was beyond where General McCook was expected by General Buell to go or not. I can however say this: that if our army had been in position when the enemy attacked us I think we should have obtained a very decided victory. It might have cost us a great deal, but that we expected and were willing to submit to. I thought General Bragg had a good army, but I also thought that we could whip it if we could get to it and have a fair fight. In fact I did not doubt it. The order to General Thomas I have not seen, and do not know what his specific orders were, and, as I before stated, I cannot say certainly whether General McCook was in or out of the position that General Buell designed he should take. After reaching the battle ground there was no reconnaissance made to the front by infantry or artillery. There was some of the Second Kentucky Cavalry sent off to our left front, and they watched the motions of the enemy. It may be that this order required, and it seems it did, that a reconnaissance should be made and the roads understood before General McCook reported to General Buell in person. Of course I cannot say that General McCook did not understand as much as General Buell required that he should by this order of the roads and the neighborhood before he reported to General Buell. I do not know what he knew on the subject. A reconnaissance was made, as I before stated, before we reached the battle ground, but it was directly on the road on which we were marching. I am unwilling to give a general answer as to whether this order was obeyed or not, or to say what would have been the result had a different course been pursued. I do not know the distance from the battle-field of Chaplin Hills to the town of Perryville. I was told it was a mile and a half and others said it was 3 miles. I can say that if a reconnaissance had been made to the front from the point where General McCook left us to report to General Buell the enemy would certainly have been discovered in force.

General BUELL. I wish to say myself to the Commission that I do not mean by the question to make any defense by reflecting on General McCook or General Thomas; that I am satisfied that some of the delays were unavoidable, and I do not know but that all of them were. It is simply meant to inquire what would have been the result if everything had worked as I expected it would and as my orders expressed.

Commission adjourned to meet January 23, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 23, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Col. GUSTAVUS A. WOOD (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Colonel, state your name and position in the United States service.

Gustavus A. Wood; lieutenant-colonel of the Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers.

Question. Were you with the troops at McMinnville in August last?

I was in command of my regiment at Verrilla, from 7 to 10 miles from McMinnville.

Question. Were you sent to Altamont during that month by the general in command at McMinnville? If so, please to state with what object.

I was sent in command of the regiment on the 23d of August, receiving my instructions from General Wood, the division commander, which were to report as to the nature of the road to Altamont, and as to the forage and supplies that might be obtained in the vicinity, the facilities for camping, and also to gain such information with reference to the movements of the enemy as could be gathered during the expedition. The additional instructions as to my encampment were that I was to fall back and not to stop at Altamont and encamp a mile this side. Those were orders that I could not obey, so I fell back some 8 miles.

Question. Did you understand that your instructions emanated in the first place from General Thomas?

I understood them to originate in authority higher than General Wood, but was under the impression that the expedition was directed generally by General Buell. I was not advised as to whom the orders were from, but supposed it was carrying out some order of General Buell.

Question. Was your division under the command of General Thomas at that time, in common with the troops in the vicinity of McMinnville?

I supposed it was, although I was informed that in one instance orders were sent directly by General Buell to General Wood.

Question. State what the orders were in that instance, if you please, colonel.

It was an order for our division, in connection with others, to move to Altamont, designating the road the division was to take. We had received orders from General Thomas on the morning of the same day, the 25th or 26th of August, to move to McMinnville, and when in sight our direction was changed, and we moved down the Decherd road until coming to what was called the Hickory Creek road, when we were turned in the direction of Altamont. I was caused to make inquiries on account of the extra march made by the regiment, and learned the fact as above stated as to the issuing of orders. This is the only order that I know of General Buell delivering or sending directly to General Wood at that camp.

Question. You were informed that this order was given by me directly to General Wood, were you?

Yes, sir; I think I saw the order.

Question. Are you positive that that order was addressed to General Wood by me directly?

I am not; I did not notice the direction.

Question. What information did you gain while you were at Altamont or in that vicinity in regard to the movements of the army?

I was informed generally by the citizens, who were mainly rebel, and by a Mr. Tipton, recognized as a loyal citizen, that it was their expectation that we would soon be attacked at McMinnville, and Vervilla particularly. I also got from the person of a prisoner I arrested a letter in pencil, dated August 19, on the north side of the Tennessee River, informing his cousin, the prisoner, that he was not at liberty to state the force they had there, but their officers were very confident they would soon clear the Yankees out of Tennessee, and containing also this expression: "I shall in a few days come through or near Altamont, at which time I shall be able to see you." The letter purported to have been written by the son of the county clerk of Grundy County, in the infantry service of the enemy. I reported also as to the nature of the road, that it was very difficult and rough, but possible for the transportation of light guns; that there was water for the camp at Altamont; that there were about 200 cattle in the various coves in the neighborhood of Altamont; that there was hay, but no corn, and no provisions except potatoes. I think I referred to a Michigan man who had potatoes, but no provisions to any amount. There was not much water or facilities for a large camp. I understood it meant only the establishing of an outpost at Altamont or a temporary camp. With that view I reported water there, where there was but little.

Question. Was the information, such as you received, positive that the enemy were advancing by Altamont?

It was, and was deemed of so much importance that I was directed by General Wood to hurry up a report of the results of the expedition, which I did in his office, addressed to him, in which I gave it as my very decided opinion that the enemy was approaching by the Sequatchie Valley and Altamont and would attack this line, and that speedily. Appended to the report above referred to was the date, viz, 24th of August.

Question. Do you know whether your report was forwarded by General Wood to higher authority?

I do not, sir. I only know that General Wood urged as a reason for my hurrying up the report that he desired to forward it immediately.

Question. May you not be mistaken in regard to the date of your report?

I may be mistaken one day in the date of that report. I am confident that it was about the 24th, but it may have been the 23d or the 25th. I am also confident that the letter above referred to was dated the 19th, and I think it could not have been over four days old when I got it. I reported the next day.

Question. Were you with the troops that subsequently moved toward Altamont for the purpose of concentration?

I was.

Question. Was it your understanding that you were advanced to meet the enemy on that occasion for the purpose of battle?

It was.

Question. Do you know anything about the destruction of public property at McMinnville when that advance was made?

Only from information; and I do not know now that I can state from whom I got that information.

Question. Was it reported among the troops that public property had been destroyed at McMinnville when they left that point for the purpose of advancing to Altamont?

It was very generally reported.

Question. Do you know or did you hear by whose orders that property was destroyed?

I think Colonel Ammen was mentioned in connection with the destruction of a portion of it, but about that I am not positive. A portion of the enlisted men and subordinates mentioned General Thomas in connection with it. Some enlisted men of General Wood's division, stragglers, passed through McMinnville that day; the command generally did not.

Question. Did this fact or report of the destruction of property at McMinnville have a bad effect upon the temper of the troops, do you think?

I think not, sir; at least not upon our branch. I do not know the effect it might have had upon General Thomas' immediate command of the troops at McMinnville.

Question. State, if you please, colonel, what property was said to have been destroyed.

Camp equipage and some ammunition.

Question. Did you ever hear any explanation of the act subsequently?

I heard it stated that the property was destroyed for want of sufficient transportation; that all the troops were to be concentrated at Altamont for the purpose of battle without being able to leave a sufficient guard at McMinnville to protect it. I understood that the troops at McMinnville had been directed to send their surplus baggage to Murfreesborough, and a portion of the transportation may have been engaged in this or may have been on the road hauling provisions from the railroad to McMinnville.

Question. In what way were your supplies transported at this time to McMinnville?

My impression is by wagon from Murfreesborough; some may have been transported over the Tullahoma branch, but I think at this time they relied upon the railroad at Murfreesborough and by wagoning from the railroad at Murfreesborough to McMinnville. The Tullahoma branch was cut a few days after the second Altamont expedition.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Colonel, this information that you received of the approach of the enemy at Altamont is based, I understand you to say, upon that letter you spoke of?

Not entirely. I only looked upon the letter, bearing the impress of having been written by an intelligent man, as confirmatory of the universal opinion of all the rebels outside of our lines at Altamont and on the road from our camp to that place. I looked upon their opinion, they having uninterrupted communication with their camp, as of value.

Question. Are the rebels in a habit, when meditating so important an expedition as this was, to advertise the route along which they intend to move?

I should think they would not generally. I suppose they were confident, however, in this respect from being so far from any camp of our troops.

Question. On the contrary, has not your observation taught you that they are secret and sudden in the performance of those things?

They have moved with celerity at times, but I cannot say that they have been generally very secret. In fact, before the end of the month cavalry did pursue that route, as I was informed, and destroyed our communications.

Question. Is your knowledge of the destruction of property at McMinnville of such a character as to justify you to say who was responsible, the extent of the destruction, and the result of it?

It is not, sir.

By General TYLER :

Question. How, when, and where did the enemy's cavalry destroy our communications?

By cutting the railroad, about the 28th of August, between McMinnville and Tullahoma.

Question. Did that cavalry pass over by Altamont?

I was informed that they had passed near Altamont.

Question. How, when, and where?

I was informed they had passed over the mountains by some road not generally traveled. I am not acquainted with the roads in that neighborhood, other than those leading into Altamont, and I cannot say by what exact route they crossed. From what I saw of the range I should judge the cavalry could cross in a great many places.

Question. At what point was the Tullahoma and McMinnville Railroad cut?

I cannot be positive. I was informed, if I am not mistaken, that it was between McMinnville and Manchester.

Question. What is the distance between McMinnville and Manchester?

I never traveled the route but once and did not pay particular attention to the distance, but I should think it would be from 15 to 20 miles.

Question. Do you know anything personally of the country between Tullahoma and McMinnville, and also do you know personally of any route by which those cavalry could come over and cut the communications?

I only know from traveling the road from Tullahoma to Manchester three times and from McMinnville to Manchester once. As to crossing the mountains other than by some three roads on the west, and one or two on the east, entering at Altamont, as before stated, I have no positive information, and relied upon the representations of the people of the country.

Question. Do you know by which of these three roads the cavalry came over and cut those communications?

I do not. My impression is that they did not come up either of these three roads—roads used for wagons, more or less—and was informed, as before stated, that the cavalry used a less public route, avoiding Altamont.

Question. What did you do with the letter written by the son of the clerk of Grundy County?

I appended it to the report of the expedition made to General Wood.

Question. You stated that there were some 200 head of cattle in the coves about Altamont; were these cattle collected for the use of our army?

Not to my knowledge.

Question. Was the army then in a condition to require fresh meat?

I believe we were at that time on full rations, though meat might have been used to great advantage. We were very shortly thereafter limited in rations.

Question. At what time were you at Altamont and what was the condition of the crops while you were there?

I was at Altamont about the 23d of August. In the immediate vicinity of Altamont there were no crops worth mentioning, it being an exceedingly sterile country.

Question. Was there any green or dry forage there?

A few farmers had a very little, but not enough to pay for gathering up. In the coves at the foot of the mountain the farmers had a very fair yield of corn, but very little dry corn or old forage, many farmers having none.

Question. State what kind of positive information it was you received that the army was marching on to Altamont to attack the enemy.

I was so informed by General Wood, my division commander. I saw, as before stated, some orders that to my mind indicated nothing less than an expected fight.

Question. Who were those orders sent by?

One was sent by General Buell and one by General Thomas.

Question. What was the purport of these orders?

General Thomas' order was one directing us to concentrate at McMinnville. General Buell's, as before stated, was directing us on the same day to concentrate at Altamont; at least it was executed the same day we attempted to execute General Thomas' order.

Question. Who was in command at McMinnville at the time the property was destroyed there?

I only know from information. I saw General Thomas with the troops and saw orders from him.

Question. How came you to see General Buell's order for concentration; was it published?

On the march, having marched from Verrilla to within 7 miles of McMinnville, and then down the Decherd road to a point opposite our camp $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant, and then from that by way of Hickory Creek road toward Altamont, and being a very hot day, our troops were much exhausted and were straggling very much. There was some intimation that it was desired to execute the movement speedily, so as to arrive at Altamont that night. Having before passed over the road, and knowing it was a very difficult one up the mountain, it was thought best by Colonel Wagner for me to ride ahead and see General Wood and make proper representations as to the road and the degree of fatigue of our troops, so that, if it were possible and consistent with orders, to have the command stopped for the night at the foot of the mountains, 8 miles distant from Altamont. I rode ahead, met General Wood at the head of the column, and stated the facts of the case. He examined his orders in my presence, and not only stated what they were, but showed them to me, and finally concluded to remain there. I am not aware of General Wood showing them to anybody else. There was some dissatisfaction manifested by our portion of the troops in the expedition at the unnecessary march of 10 or 12 miles under a very hot sun, and it was not deemed improper that it should be known that it was not originally intended, but grew out of a change of orders.

Question. You say that General Wood showed an order from General Buell for this concentration at Altamont?

Yes, sir; for our troops to go there. It may have been an order directed to General Thomas, but handed to General Wood from the fact that he was on the road in advance and General Thomas' troops were not yet ready to start, and contained instructions as to the route to be pursued. I did not notice the direction.

Question. Do you suppose it was possible General Wood would open a communication addressed to General Thomas?

By no means; but it might be quite probable that under the circumstances General Thomas would hand the original letter to General Wood.

Redirect examination by General BUELL:

Question. Colonel, in giving information to General Wood, to which he attached such importance, of the result of your reconnaissance at Altamont, did you state to him the ground upon which the enemy was expected to advance by that route?

I stated to him fully and at length the information I had obtained, inclosing the original note referred to in my examination in support of my opinion that they were undoubtedly contemplating an early advance. I took into camp some 12 prisoners from Altamont, some of whom, I believe, were examined by the direction of General Wood. I also informed him verbally, if not in the communication, that a detachment of the enemy's cavalry had been at Altamont the day before the expedition.

Question. Did this marching and counter-marching of the troops to McMinnville in such hot weather and then back again for the purpose of going to Altamont produce dissatisfaction among them?

Nothing of a permanent nature. They became very much fatigued, and were, as soldiers are apt to be, quite impatient, but after a night's rest there was nothing further heard of it. Twice afterward during the same month they went through fatiguing marches with their usual cheerfulness.

Question. Did they or did they not look upon it as evidence of confusion of plans?

They did, sir.

Question. Are you able to say how far they ascribed this apparent indecision and confusion to the commander of the army?

I cannot say in that instance. My opinion is that they generally charge it upon the highest officer in the army. It is the usual custom of the soldier, and I am not aware that it was generally known that the movement was the result of two orders.

By General SCHOEPF :

Question. You stated, colonel, that the troops were disheartened by the marching and counter-marching from McMinnville to Altamont. What was the feeling of the troops after their march to Kentucky and back again without any result?

I did not use so strong a term as disheartened. I stated that they were temporarily discouraged. So far as the Kentucky expedition is concerned, they looked upon it as barren of results in the way of destroying the enemy, and, of course, regretted the necessity of returning to Tennessee.

By General BUELL :

Question. Can you point to any instance in this war or to any instances in any war within the recollection of your reading where a large army in an open field has been destroyed by another?

General SCHOEPF. I object to that question, Mr. President, as it is to be supposed that every general is sufficiently conversant with military history to know all about it. This investigation is for our information in regard to the operations of the army in the Kentucky and Tennessee campaign, and the question has no bearing upon the investigation before the Commission.

The court was cleared, when, after discussion, it was decided that the question should be put.

The WITNESS. None in this war; very few in modern history. I believe the Romans claimed almost universally to have destroyed their enemy's armies, and in turn had armies destroyed at Cannæ by Hannibal; but within reliable history the instances are few, as far as I have read.

Question. Have you any doubt that the rebel army invaded Kentucky for the purpose of controlling it and bringing it to the support of the rebellion or for the purpose of defeating the armies of the Government that might be found in Kentucky?

I have not; although I am not yet satisfied that they attempted to carry out their plans as first intended.

Question. The question of one of the members of the Commission assumes that the march from Tennessee to Kentucky by the Army of the Ohio was barren of results; in view of the fact that the rebel army was foiled in the purpose which you have stated in your last answer are you prepared to say that the campaign was barren of results?

I am not, and did not so mean to be understood when I stated that the troops looked upon the expedition as barren of results in the way of destroying the enemy's army and regretted the necessity of their return to Tennessee. I look upon the campaign as successful, saving our army and defeating the enemy's plans upon Kentucky.

Question. Has the opinion prevailed among the troops of the Army of the Ohio that our force was vastly superior to the enemy in that campaign, and has that circumstance tended to increase their disappointment, if there has been any?

It was believed, up to about the time that we arrived between Munfordville and Elizabethtown, that our force was greatly superior to the enemy. About the time I refer to, the opinion of the army, so far as I know, underwent a change, and we looked upon the enemy as at least equal to us in numbers and effectiveness. The opinion that we largely surpassed them in numbers did not contribute to the dissatisfaction of the soldiers.

Question. How was it on that point with reference to the subsequent operations of the army against the combined forces of the enemy in Kentucky; I mean what was the prevailing opinion as to the relative strength of the armies?

It was thought by the soldiers after we left Louisville that we largely excelled them in numbers, and dissatisfaction was expressed by them in not engaging the enemy. This occurred mainly immediately after the battle of Perryville.

Question. In the impatience which troops naturally and always feel before engaging an enemy that they consider not superior to them do they take much account of the advantage which an adversary may derive from strength of position or of other circumstances which may determine the question of the battle?

Soldiers who express impatience do not and generally are not qualified to take such facts into consideration.

Recross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Colonel, have you read Bragg's report, Colonel Forsyth's and Hawes' letters, and Benjamin's dispatch, and other documents from rebel sources relative to this campaign in Kentucky?

I have read General Bragg's report and Benjamin's dispatch; I believe I have not seen the other communications referred to.

Question. Did not that expedition originate in an expectation that the people of Kentucky would respond by a general rising, and was not the disappointment in that in fact the cause of the hasty retreat of the combined forces out of Kentucky?

I suppose that General Bragg contemplated larger accessions to his army than he received, but I am not prepared to say that the disappointment in that was alone the cause of his evacuation, for the reason that he probably could not have the means of arming the people of Kentucky generally had they welcomed him heartily, and his effective force would not have been much greater than it was. He doubtless hastened his evacuation partly on account of such disappointment.

Question. Did he not depend upon the country he invaded for supplies?

I believe he did, sir.

Question. Would not his position then become hazardous on finding a country of enemies instead of friends?

Yes, sir.

General BUELL. Although Bragg did not receive that encouragement which he expected, did he actually find himself in the midst of enemies such as the Army of the Ohio was surrounded by in Tennessee?

No, sir; he must have received a great moral support from persons who failed to enlist in his army, judging from the expressions of the people along the march.

Commission adjourned to meet January 24, 1863.

LOUISVILLE, January 24, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

HARRY I. TODD (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By General BUELL :

Question. Please state your name and place of residence.

Harry I. Todd ; Frankfort, Ky.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the Kentucky River ? If so, please state at the same time what opportunities you have had of acquiring a knowledge of it.

I am thoroughly acquainted with it. I commanded a steamboat for seven years which ran from the mouth of Dick's River most of the time to the mouth of the Kentucky River (though Louisville was the end of our trip), and for ten years I ran coal-boats from the forks of the Kentucky River to Frankfort. I have crossed all the principal fords and ferries between Franklin and Boonesborough very often at low water.

Question. How far are the forks you speak of above Clay's Ferry or the point at which the Lexington and Richmond road crosses the Kentucky River ?

It is 85 or 90 miles.

Question. Mention, if you please, the various points at which the river can be forded at low water—at which it could have been forded in the months of September and October last. You may limit your answer to the distance between Frankfort and 10 or 15 miles above Clay's Ferry.

There are nearly if not quite fifty places at which it could be forded between those places from July to the middle of December.

Question. Name the principal of those fords, if you please.

You can ford it immediately at Frankfort; within 4 miles above Frankfort; 8 miles above Frankfort; 13 miles above Frankfort, at which there is a turnpike road crosses from Versailles to Lawrenceburg; 17 miles above Frankfort, at which there is another turnpike road; 21 miles above Frankfort; 26 miles above Frankfort, at which there is another turnpike on both sides of the river, leading from Versailles to Harrodsburg; 30 miles above Frankfort, at which there is a turnpike leading on one side of the river to Harrodsburg; 45 miles above Frankfort, where there is another turnpike road from Versailles to Harrodsburg; 50 miles above Frankfort, where there is a turnpike road from Lexington to Harrodsburg; 55 miles above Frankfort; half a mile below the mouth of Dick's River there is a turnpike road on the south side of the river; 75 miles above Frankfort, where there is a road from Lexington to Danville; 80 miles above Frankfort, at the mouth of Sugar Creek, leading from Jessamine County into Garrard; 85 miles above Frankfort; 90 miles above Frankfort; 95 miles above Frankfort; 102 miles above Frankfort; 110 miles to Clay's Ferry, where there is a road from Lexington to Richmond; 115 miles to the next ferry above that; 120 miles to Boonesborough, where the road from Winchester to Richmond crosses; 125 miles to the next; 131 miles to the next; 138 miles to the next; 145 miles to the next; 155 miles to the next, and 165 miles to the next. That is up to within 35 miles of the fork, and covers all the principal ferries where there are main roads leading to them.

Question. Do you mean to say that there are good practicable fords at all these points, captain ?

Yes, sir.

Question. What is the character of the ford at Clay's Ferry ?

It is a very good ford, sir. The road for getting to the ford is not so good as that for getting to the ferry, but it was passable for wagons and stock and everything of that sort at the time you speak of or has been this last season.

Question. Are you acquainted with the country on the south side of the Kentucky River between the Lexington and Richmond road, the Lexington and Danville road, and the Lancaster and Richmond road?

I know the country between Lexington and Richmond, that is, immediately along the turnpike road, very well.

Question. I mean the country embraced by those lines I have named.

No, sir; not very well.

Question. That is, on the south side of the river, between the Lexington and Danville road, the Lancaster and Richmond road, and the Lexington and Richmond road—that angular tract of country in there?

I am not acquainted with the road between Lancaster and Richmond at all.

Question. Do you know anything of the character of the country generally?

I have not been in that particular locality. I know all about the country between Lexington and Danville toward Crab Orchard, leaving Lancaster to the left, or between Danville and Crab Orchard. I know all about the country between Richmond and Lancaster and beyond that, away into those mountains there, but have no knowledge of the road from Richmond to Lancaster. I never was on that road.

Question. Were you in Frankfort about the time of the battle of Perryville?

Yes, sir; I was there at that time.

Question. State under what circumstances, if you please.

I had been a fugitive from home about five weeks, and went there with General Sill's division as a sort of guide.

Question. Was there any apprehension among the people of Central Kentucky that Bragg's army would fall back into that region after leaving Perryville?

Yes, sir; a good deal.

Question. Was it the opinion of the people that that army had invaded Kentucky for the purpose of holding it?

Yes, sir; many of our best people were firmly of the opinion that they had found "the last ditch" up there, and would make a desperate fight there. That army took a great deal of property from some of our citizens; among other things about $80,000 worth of jeans and linseys. The parties to whom they belonged went from Lexington to Camp Dick Robinson, and from there to Danville, at which points they expected to see General Bragg or General Smith, or some of the prominent men, to get some evidence of the indebtedness. Failing in that, they came back, believing that there was to be a most desperate battle there or in the neighborhood of Camp Dick Robinson, and they would whip the Federal army, or if the Federal army whipped them they would fall back and take everything between Lexington and this place (Louisville), and this if they chose. Gentlemen who were there—friends of mine, and very intelligent men—satisfied me so well that they intended to make a determined fight there that I moved my family from Frankfort to this place, so that I could get across the river in case the war was transferred to that locality or its coming here. A great many people in my part of the State were induced to unite themselves with the rebel army because they were made to believe they would never have to leave the State. Other misrepresentations that were made in regard to the course that the Union army were pursuing as they came up induced a great many to run off and join the rebel army for protection. Among other things they told was that the Union army were taking up old men who had not joined their army and were making breastworks of them. There were similar reports of the same sort.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. These fords that you speak of on the Kentucky River are ordinary ferries, are they not?

No, sir; there is a ferry at all the principal crossings, and at others a ford that is used at all seasons of the year when the water is down.

Question. Were they not made so numerous and practicable by the low stage of water at that time?

They are nearly always fordable at that season of the year and at divers other points; at almost every considerable little branch that runs into the river it can be forded.

Commission adjourned to meet January 28, 1863.

CINCINNATI, January 28, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General J. T. BOYLE (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Will you please give your name and position in the United States service?

J. T. Boyle; brigadier-general in the volunteer service. I am commanding at Louisville, District of Western Kentucky.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the Kentucky River and its various crossings from Frankfort up some 20 miles east of the Lexington and Richmond road?

I am tolerably well acquainted with the geography and topography of that part of the country. I was born there and have lived there all my life.

Question. Mention the principal fords within the distance alluded to, as far as you know.

There are so many fords that I do not know that I can recall all of them at this moment. Ascending the river, there is Schryock, one of the main crossings between Lawrenceburg and Versailles into Woodford County. There is McCowan's Ferry, where there is a crossing to Versailles and Lexington, from which there are diverging roads to these places; a crossing at Munday's Landing; at Oregon; at Brooklyn, which is on the turnpike road from Harrodsburg and Shakertown to Lexington. There is a crossing at Lewis' Ferry, on the direct road to Shakertown and Lexington. There is a crossing immediately at the mouth of Dick's River, which is only a few hundred yards above this. The next main crossing is at the mouth of Hickman Creek, on the Lexington and Danville pike. There is a crossing at the mouth of Sugar Creek; another at the mouth of Paint Lick Creek; another at Tait's Ferry. The next main crossing is at Clay's Ferry, on the Richmond road. There are several small crossings that I do not now remember the names of, used mainly for neighborhood communications between the two sides of the river.

Question. Are these that you mention good fords at a low stage of water?

Yes, sir; most of them are very good.

Question. And were they so in the month of October last?

I presume they were, from the low stage of water in the streams at that time.

Question. Will you give the topography of the country on the south side of the Kentucky River—the country between the Kentucky River and the Lancaster and Richmond road—bounded on the north by the Kentucky River and on the other side by the road from Hickman around to Lancaster and Richmond and then on toward Clay's Ferry?

The country is undulating; parts of it very much broken. There are a variety of streams running into the Kentucky River from the south—Silver Creek, Paint Lick, Deep Creek, Scott's Fork of Sugar Creek, Sugar Creek, another fork of Sugar Creek of which I do not remember the name, besides other small streams. The country is broken by these streams and is hilly, but on these ridges there are very considerable tracts of fine level country, but elevated above the beds of these creeks. The road mentioned in the question passes above the source of most of these streams or crosses most of them high up. The roads that run to the Kentucky River from the turnpike pass on the ridges and sometimes down the valleys of these streams. One of them is a turnpike road from Lancaster to the Paint Lick Creek on the road to Richmond. I believe there is a turnpike partially made to the mouth of Sugar Creek from Lancaster; but of that I am not certain. The land near the Kentucky River, except in the bottoms formed by these creeks and in other bottoms of the river is rugged and broken. The cliffs of the river in some places are precipitous. The land is very rich, and it is a country very well settled. They have as good roads as can be made in a country as broken as this is.

Question. Are there very good roads passing along the river on the south side of it; is the country up and down the river considered to be practicable for wagons, and are there any roads by which an army can move with facility?

All the roads up and down the river are at right angles with these streams, which break and cut up the country. There are country roads passing up near the river that are made for the purpose of traveling up the river so far as to fall into the roads that lead to the county seat of Lancaster. There is no public road that I remember running parallel with the river or nearly so that is near to the river. The road from Lancaster to Richmond by the mouth of Paint Lick Creek is a good road, but it does not run exactly parallel with the river, though its general direction is in a line with that of the river. It would be very difficult for an army to pass up near the river with all the equipage of an army on those roads.

Question. What is the character of the Tait's Ferry road?

It is a very good road. At that season of the year it is a very eligible road for traveling. I think it is very much traveled to Richmond and to Madison County at that season of the year.

Question. Do you know whether a portion of Kirby Smith's force used that road in invading the State last summer?

I know it only as it was communicated to me officially. I have no personal knowledge of it. I have no doubt that they did use it, from information received by me.

Question. That is a road leading from Richmond to Lexington, is it not?

Yes, sir.

Question. How far below the Clay's Ferry road does that cross the Kentucky River?

I really cannot say with any certainty. I think it must be 10 or 12 miles.

Question. According to the best information you were able to obtain what do you consider to be the force with which Kirby Smith entered Kentucky in August last?

I have no accurate knowledge about the matter; of course any estimate that I would give would be but an approximation.

Question. What I want is the estimate you made about that time.

I believed at the time, and felt no doubt about it, that his force was from 15,000 to 20,000 strong. I believed afterward that his force was even greater than that; probably 25,000.

Question. Does this estimate include the troops commanded by Humphrey Marshall and the force that subsequently came in under the command of Stevenson?

I do not mean to embrace the force of Marshall or Stevenson either. They both came in some time after Kirby Smith entered the State—after the battle of Richmond.

Question. Under all the circumstances of that invasion, was it fair to believe, and is that your opinion, that it had for its object to hold the State to secure it to the Southern Confederacy?

I think that was a very reasonable and natural inference. I think that was their object and they felt the fullest confidence in the success of it, and the great body of the people of the State had serious apprehension that it would be the result and feared it greatly. I was so strongly impressed with that opinion myself that I was urgent that steps might be taken to prevent their permanent holding of it, but I was afraid the State would go. I believe I telegraphed to that effect to the President and probably to the Secretary of War. I think, however, that I communicated the fears I had on the subject before Kirby Smith had actually entered the State from the information I derived from General Morgan at Cumberland Gap and from spies I had in the country. I believe I also communicated the same thing to General Buell. I am sure I telegraphed to General Buell (I could tell when were I at Louisville) that it would be absolutely essential for him to come back to Kentucky to save it. There are some other matters that I telegraphed to the President, but I do not feel sure enough to speak of them without examining my papers.

Question. Has your reading of history and your observation of war brought you to the conclusion that there is no success in military operations short of the extermination of your enemy or his capture bodily, supposing the armies to be nearly equal and in an open field?

Most certainly it has not; either my knowledge of history or my observation of war, which is limited. I think, so far as I know, that few contending armies ever exterminated each other, and I have never known or heard of an instance in which a retreating army of any considerable force was ever captured by the pursuing army. If there is such a case I have no recollection of it, unless it was in the history of the Jews, where God might have intervened and allowed them to take their enemy bodily. I remember no other case.

Question. Under all the circumstances, considering the strength of the rebel army which invaded Kentucky, the circumstances and object of that invasion, would you consider that the march of the Army of the Ohio through Tennessee to Kentucky, and the subsequent operating against the rebel forces in Kentucky, barren of results?

I do not, sir; I think it absolutely necessary to have brought the army there for the purpose of saving the State. That was my opinion first, before it moved, when it was moving, and after it had reached Kentucky and moved in its operations against the rebel army, and is my opinion now.

Question. What effect do you suppose its movements had upon the object for which the State was invaded by the rebel forces?

I think it had the effect of defeating their object; that is, if their object was to make their invasion successful by holding the State, which I believe was their object and purpose. I believe that they could and would have held the larger portion of the State if the army had not been moved from Tennessee. I think that we could have held a portion of the border of Kentucky on the Ohio against them, but that they would have held the greater portion of the State, including its capital. I believe that they would have derived great assistance from the people if they had held it sufficiently long to have inspired them with confidence that it was going to be a permanent result.

Question. About what force and what description of troops had you to oppose this invasion in the first instance, and so on up to about the time of the arrival of the Army of the Ohio?

I cannot speak with positiveness and accuracy as to the amount of force that I had in Kentucky when I first ascertained that Kirby Smith was entering the passes of the mountains. I think I had about 2,000 men. I called for more troops from everybody; and Governor Morton and the president of this court, General Wallace, hastened up movements in Indiana so as to throw over several thousand troops by the time Kirby Smith had reached London. I think I had in the State some twelve regiments, probably not that many. General Wallace came to Louisville in command of a regiment and tendered his services to me. I requested him to go to Lexington, where I had thrown the great body of the forces I had, and I think when he reached there there were seven regiments. Probably two arrived afterward, making nine, which I requested him to take command of and to reconnoiter the country in the direction of Richmond, Big Hill, and of London, and that I would send him forces as fast as I could get them. I had besides those nine regiments some three or four regiments that were stationed at Munfordsville and along the road and at Louisville. But all the forces that could be spared from guarding the road were directly afterward thrown toward Lexington. More troops were sent into Lexington, but not until General Wallace had been relieved by General Nelson. The battle of Richmond occurred directly afterward. The remnant of the forces up there that were not killed or captured retreated to Louisville. There were then massed at Louisville new troops from Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. The new Department of the Ohio was created and General Wright assigned to the command. Other officers superior to me in rank—indeed an officer who was not superior to me in rank, by my consent and at my request, had the command, feeling he was better qualified than I was myself. The number of troops that were brought in from these States at that time, new regiments, I cannot state with accuracy, because reports were not made to me. General Nelson came down as soon as his wounds would permit to Louisville and assumed command. Such returns as were made of the troops were made to him. Regiments arriving and reporting to me, supposing I was in command, I notified him of, and required the officers to report to him. I knew generally about the number of regiments and the approximate strength of the force, but I do not believe anybody knew it with any degree of certainty, or with that degree of certainty that such a fact ought to have been known at the time, owing to the great confusion, excitement, and alarm. I believe that the forces in Kentucky, exclusive of those who were at Covington and Newport and concentrated at Louisville, amounted to from 45,000 to 50,000. Probably there were 51,000 or 52,000, estimating the regiments and batteries as full, including between 4,500 to 5,000 that were at Munfordville and that were captured, leaving probably 44,000 to 46,000. My estimate of the force is founded upon the number of regiments and batteries, as I now recollect them, that were there. There was a very small artillery force—two or three batteries and two or three that we improvised for the occasion. Such reports and returns that were made were, I presume, made to General Buell and to General Gilbert. Those returns would show approximately the force, though I doubt very much whether any such reports were made, or could have been made, as ought to have been made at that time, and especially after General Nelson got back, when he increased the excitement and alarm very much.

Question. Do you understand your estimate to cover the aggregate force; and, if so, about what would have been the effective force?

It is the aggregate force. I do not know what the effective force would have been of such a concern as that was. The men marched from camp, on the edge of the city, to the town, for the purpose of review and to learn how to march and to handle their guns. Large numbers of them broke down and one man was killed by sunstroke. I believe they were all raw regiments. I could not say what would have been the effective force.

Question. Do you remember the date of the arrival of the last division of General Thomas, of the Army of the Ohio, at Louisville?

I do not. I cannot remember the date with any degree of accuracy. I think that General Buell arrived there on the 26th or 27th of September, but I am not certain. I am merely stating the recollection I have of it now. General Thomas arrived there several days afterward.

Question. Did your position give you an opportunity of judging of the labor that was required to prepare the old army for further service and to complete the organization of that with the new force? If so, please state what your observation was with reference to it and whether it was done sluggishly or expeditiously.

I was left in command and continued in command at Louisville all the while when it arrived there and while it was there, with the exception of six or eight hours, when I was assigned to the command of a division, but was afterward ordered to remain at Louisville. I saw a good many of the troops. I knew probably most of the general officers of the army; I had served with it myself in the campaign to Shiloh and Corinth. I went to the camps of a portion of the force and to a brigade that I commanded at Shiloh. I heard a good deal of the condition of the men from the officers, and from all I heard and saw I thought the army was in rather a bad condition in some respects; it needed shoeing, clothing, and paying—inspiring them by paying. They seemed to me to pretty much need everything that recruits just mustered in need. I think some of them were rearmed there.

I think the work of arming, shoeing, clothing, paying, and supplying them in every respect; combining the new with the old and organizing them into brigades and divisions and army corps: preparing them to march against the enemy; preparing all the provisions and supplies of subsistence and ammunition, and actually moving them, showed what struck me as wonderful energy, industry, and ability. I have never seen, known, heard, or read of anything evincing more in the same length of ime. I saw no sluggishness, delay, want of energy, or want of anything for a preparation to meet and fight the enemy; on the contrary, everything was brought into requisition, it seemed to me, that any man or set of men could have exercised for the purpose of moving against the enemy and driving him out.

Question. On what day was the battle of Richmond fought, general?

I do not know positively.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. At what season of the year and for how long a time, general, is the Kentucky River fordable at the places you have located?

That depends entirely upon the dryness of the season. As a general thing it is fordable from the latter part of June or the 1st of July to November, unless we have heavy fall rains to raise the streams. Sometimes it is even beyond that time, commencing earlier and extending later into the season in cases of extreme drought.

Question. Are not the banks of the river high and steep and the fords therefore difficult to approach at the places you speak of?

At those main crossings the roads are good and the approaches comparatively easy; on the turnpike road they are uncommonly good. There are many other crossings besides those I have mentioned that are not so generally used, where the approaches to them are more difficult to travel, not being worked so much. The cliffs of the river are precipitous on one side or the other nearly all the way up and at all the crossings, requiring much labor to make the crossings from the one side to the other practicable. They are less so on the other side.

Question. Enumerate those crossings, if you please, that you say are of easy access.

Schryock, which is on the road from Lawrenceburg to Woodford County; McCowan's Ferry—that is on the road from Salvisa, and I believe a road from Lawrenceburg runs into it, crossing over toward Woodford County; Oregon—there is a turnpike road running to Oregon on the south side; Munday's Landing—there is a dirt road, I think, not a turnpike—from Harrodsburg to Woodford County and to Jessamine via Shakertown to Lexington—that is a very fine pike on both sides of the river; Lewis's Ferry—that is on the direct road to Shakertown from Lexington and Nicholasville—a very good road to the ferry. The main road from Danville to the mouth of Dick's River crosses several hundred yards above that. It is a fair dirt road, considering that it is not worked much. It has been somewhat injured by a railroad crossing the river there, over which there was to have been a suspension bridge. The crossing at the mouth of the river is approached by the best turnpike in the State; it is one of the best I ever saw. The crossing on the Tait's Creek road I know more about from information than from personal knowledge. It must be an excellent one from what I understand of it. The cliffs are not so high or precipitous as below the crossing at Sugar Creek. Most of the crossings I mention have pretty good roads at that season of the year. The turnpike crossing is good at all seasons.

Question. Are not these crossings of such a character that a comparatively small force could dispute the passage of an army over them?

Yes, sir; I think so. An inconsiderable force at almost any of the crossings eligibly situated could impede and prevent the passage of a larger force. There are a great many minor crossings, besides those I have mentioned, at which infantry and cavalry could cross, but not in such force; but at any of them an opposing force in proper position could prevent it. The cliffs of the river are so precipitous and of such generally difficult crossing that they could be crossed only at these places, and a force in position on either side, whichever force had possession of it, could hold it. It is a strong natural defense.

Question. When did Kirby Smith's army enter Kentucky, general?

I cannot state the exact date, just as I cannot state the date of the battle of Richmond. He entered the State about eight or ten days before the battle of Richmond; perhaps it was ten days.

Question. At what point did he enter Kentucky?

The forces entered Kentucky at different points. The main force of Kirby Smith's entered by Deep Creek Gap, I believe. Scott's force of cavalry or some other cavalry must have entered at Kirby Smith's left at a considerable distance, and must have crossed through Jamestown, Tenn., into Clinton County, Kentucky, and came up by Mill Springs to Somerset, from Somerset to London, and joined a force which had come in with Kirby Smith, as I understand.

Question. From London through what places did they march?

I do not know certainly, as there was nothing at all to hinder their marching in that region of the State. I have believed that a force for the sake of subsistence and forage passed over different roads, concentrating at London or Big Hill. I think it likely that the main force came through Whitley County to London. Some of the force likely passed much nearer Cumberland Gap, and may have crossed at the Cumberland Ford and passed to Barbourville and London. I do not know the exact point at which he struck the Wilderness or Cumberland Gap road; that is, the main road. It diverges at London, one road running in the direction of Lexington and the other in the direction of Crab Orchard.

Question. From London he marched to Lexington and Frankfort, did he not?

Yes, sir. I do not know that he was ever in Frankfort; part of his army was at Frankfort; but from some telegraphic dispatches we captured I think he was never there.

Question. Was he not engaged after that invasion in gathering up supplies and did he not propose making Camp Dick Robinson a permanent place to gather them in?

I have no doubt he was extensively engaged in gathering up supplies of all kinds; there was nothing on the earth to hinder him from doing so, and I am sure from what I have learned that the necessities of his army demanded it. I do not know that he was concentrating his supplies at Camp Dick Robinson. A proclamation was issued by General Bragg at Danville, in which he announced that Camp Dick Robinson would be held as a recruiting point. I presume supplies were concentrated there for that purpose and that General Buckner was to have command there, and all the Kentucky troops that were to be raised were to report to him at that place. I received that proclamation two or three days after it was printed at Danville. They did accumulate at Camp Dick Robinson considerable supplies. A considerable portion of them were seized there after they left that were not destroyed, as I learned from the officer who had seized them and from the people from whom they had been taken, who appealed to me for the purpose of having them restored to them—property that they could identify, several thousand barrels probably of pork and other things. I think they had large supplies at Nicholasville and at Lexington, and that they were apparently gathering up supplies to last the army all the time, as if they were going to make a permanent occupation of the State. It may have been done for the purpose of impressing upon the people that that was their purpose; it certainly had that effect, and it looked as if it was intended as a permanent occupation from the amount of troops and the accumulation of supplies.

Question. Was he not engaged in sending these supplies out of Kentucky previous to the return of the Army of the Ohio?

I do not know. I think not, from anything I have heard. The only things that I heard of being sent were some jeans and linseys that it was reported he had sent out in the direction of Knoxville, but of that I have no reliable information. I do not think any considerable supplies were sent at all, excepting those which were sent just in advance of the retreating army.

Question. What became of the supplies that you understand were gathered at Lexington and Nicholasville as Kirby Smith fell back?

Some of them were destroyed; some of them were left, not destroyed, and were captured by our forces; others, I think, were sent off in the direction of Knoxville just before the retreat, and, as I believed, for the purpose of covering them and being protected by the army. I think they carried off considerable supplies. It would take a great deal to subsist them through the barren regions of country through which they passed.

Question. Was not the retreat of this invading army really caused by their disappointment in not being sustained by Kentucky?

It is conjectural entirely as to the extent of their disappointment; I could not say what effect that had upon it; but I have never for a moment thought that that was the cause of their retreat. I had believed it was because of the movement of our army upon them much earlier than they had any conception it would be prepared to move and from the fact that they had an exaggerated idea of our forces. I have believed that if they had known the force they would not have retreated, and that they could, considering the discipline of their troops and the length of time they had been in the service, successfully cope with our army. I had most serious apprehensions of it at that time. I felt that the retreat, from all that I had learned in regard to its character, was cowardly, and that the whole result was a grand triumph on the part of the Government.

Question. Their information of our forces, position, &c., is generally very accurate, is it not?

I cannot say what is the degree of accuracy of their knowledge in that respect, but I have supposed generally that they had much more accurate knowledge of our forces than we had of theirs. I think in this case that the universal impression of the people of the magnitude of our forces had impressed them with the idea that it was greater, and the information that they had received through all the agencies that they usually employ and the advantages they had in Kentucky were overcome by the universality of that impression of our own people, including those that were ready to join them, for I know there was an impression that there was an immense army at Louisville and an immense army here in Cincinnati.

Commission adjourned to meet Thursday, January 29, 1863.

CINCINNATI, January 29, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General J. T. BOYLE's testimony continued, as follows :

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. You saw Bragg's report, did you not, of that expedition into Kentucky and the letters and comments of the rebel press upon it shortly after it occurred?

I do not think I saw it; if I did, I did not read it. I saw the substance, probably, of an article of Provisional Governor Hawes, of Kentucky, and one of Mr. Forsyth, of Mobile. I do not think I ever read General Bragg's report.

Question. You cannot state, then, what estimate the rebels placed upon our forces immediately after the expedition?

Only from information which I received from domestic rebels and citizens of Kentucky.

Question. I understand from your answer that you saw nothing of an official character at that time from Bragg or any of his officers?

None at all, sir; excepting I might state that a great many prisoners, privates and officers, made statements to me in regard to the matter, but no official statement was made.

Question. Do you know anything of a communication addressed by General Buell to General Nelson upon the subject of holding or evacuating Louisville?

I do not, sir.

Question. You spoke of an officer having been put in command over you that had no right to that place; who was that officer?

I did not speak of an officer put in command over me except by my consent. That officer was General Gilbert; it was done by General Wright. General Gilbert was placed in command at Lexington to withdraw the forces that were there, and not at Richmond, as well as the remnant that escaped from Richmond, and ordered, as I understood, to retreat or withdraw them from Lexington to Louisville or Cincinnati. Finding the route to Louisville the most desirable, he fell back by the road from Lexington to Frankfort and from Frankfort to Louisville. He was in command of that retreating column of General Cruft; General Jackson was with him. Both of them were brigadier-generals, and General Gilbert was not a brigadier-general. He was placed in that position at their written request by General Wright. When he reached Louisville, occupying that position, knowing him to be a man of talent in his profession, and believing him to have skill and ability, I readily acquiesced in his occupying the position. He continued in command until General Nelson arrived. There was but one officer, I believe, who was of the rank of brigadier-general objecting; he was not left there.

Question. What rank was given to General Gilbert?

I do not know. The forces that were there when he arrived and the column with which he retreated at that time amounted to fully the command of a division. There must have been more than 20,000 there and on the road; they were thrown in rapidly from the States.

Question. Did he not assume the title and wear the uniform of a major-general?

I never saw him with the uniform. I never knew him to claim the title, though I had the impression that his report was signed as major-general; but of that I am not at all certain.

Question. Were these circumstances explained to General Buell when he assumed command at Louisville?

Not that I know of. I did not communicate them to him, though I gave him such information as I had with regard to matters and affairs there. I speak now of the position and relation of General Gilbert to the troops. I told him about the battle and the retreat of the column. General Buell made diligent inquiry in regard to all the matters connected with the battle of Richmond and the retreat and condition of the forces—as to their arms and equipments of every kind. I never made any allusion to the position General Gilbert held at all that I remember.

Question. What was probably General Gilbert's rank in the army about that time?

I think he was a captain in the Regular Army.

Question. Do you know anything about Captain Gay having been given command as a general in that expedition?

I think General Wright or General Gilbert placed him in command of a brigade of cavalry. I think he continued in that position on the march. Whether he held the command as a general commanding the brigade or whether he was issuing and delivering orders as a staff officer I do not know; I was not with the expedition.

Question. And where are the books connected with General Nelson's command at that time?

I do not know where they are; I do not know if they were preserved. If he had any books there I did not know it. His orders to me of every kind were informal. I made and kept a record of them myself.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. Who was that general you referred to that refused to be commanded by General Gilbert?

General Green Clay Smith.

Question. Was that the reason of his being sent away or was any other reason assigned?

General Wright did not state to me that that was the reason; I suppose it was, and thought he ought to have been sent away, for he was not fit to have taken the command of that retreating column in the condition it was. General Gilbert, in my opinion, and General Wright was of a similar opinion, was the best fitted man for the position; and that was the opinion of every brigadier-general that was there. It was apparently a military necessity.

Question. Please state the names of all the generals who were there unfit to command.

I have not formed opinions in regard to the qualifications of men such as ought to be expressed. General Smith, I suppose, could have commanded a brigade under ordinary circumstances very well; but these were not ordinary circumstances, and so it was felt by everybody at the time.

Question. You stated in a previous reply that the generals applied for Gilbert to be put in command; who were those generals?

General Jackson and General Craft. I understood from General Jackson that he and General Craft, and probably colonels of regiments, had requested of General Wright that it should be done. I do not remember any other brigadiers who were there except those three.

By General TYLER:

Question. General, you say that General Smith was unfit for this command that General Gilbert took; in what did that unfitness consist? Was it in habits or want of military experience or knowledge or what?

General Smith's habits, as far as I know, were excellent. He had no military knowledge or experience, or very little. I think he had not the steadiness of purpose and power of controlling men to have conducted the retreating column. General Jackson had much more experience, but was a very modest man, and felt his want of capacity for the position.

Question. At the time of the capture of Munfordville in what military district was it?

I do not know in what district Kentucky was for some considerable length of time. I was assigned to the command of the State of Kentucky on the 27th or 29th of May, and ordered to report to the Secretary of War and afterward ordered to report to General Halleck. I did not understand the matter, and reported to General Buell and General Halleck both. I think on the 19th of August the new Department of the Ohio was created. This battle of Munfordville occurred some time after that.

Question. Do I understand by your answer that you were commanding the State of Kentucky at the time Munfordville was taken or not?

No, sir. If I understand it, when Munfordville was taken it was in the new Department of the Ohio, which was created some time before. General Wright was in command of the Department of Kentucky up to that time. General Gilbert was in command of those forces, under General Wright, at the time.

Question. On what day were you relieved from the command of the District of Kentucky and by what order?

I think it was on the 23d of August, by the order of General Wright, assuming command of the new Department of the Ohio, which was created some days before, of which I had received notification from the Secretary of War and had communicated it to General Buell.

Question. What was your military position after the Department of the Ohio was created?

I was left in command of Louisville and the forces in the vicinity of Louisville and upon the lines of the road until General Gilbert was placed in command. I then commanded the forces in and immediately around the city until General Nelson arrived, when I commanded the forces in the city—two regiments and the convalescents.

Question. Who was in the immediate command of the troops along the line of railroad when Munfordville was taken?

My understanding is that General Gilbert was in command.

Question. Where was General Gilbert's headquarters?

At Louisville.

Question. Were your headquarters there at that time?

Yes, sir.

Question. You spoke yesterday, general, of Clay's Ferry route, from Richmond to Lexington; are you sure that Kirby Smith's army passed over that route?

I have no doubt that a portion of them passed there; a portion of them crossed at other ferries or fords.

Question. Are you acquainted with that route personally?

Yes, sir.

Question. Are not 2 or 3 miles of that Clay road, the other side of the river, almost impassable for artillery?

Not unless it has become so within the last year or so. It is a turnpike road.

Question. Are you sure it is a turnpike road the whole distance over that ferry?

I have not been over it for a long time, but it was a turnpike when I went over it.

Question. Is there not a dirt road connected with the turnpike?

There is a dirt road passing from the ferry up to the ford. Where the river becomes fordable it is a dirt road, but I would suppose perfectly passable as a turnpike road at that season of the year, for it was a season when such roads are good.

Question. What is the character of the country on the south side of the bank of the Kentucky River, along the face of those ferries, 2 or 3 miles back from the river?

For a mile or two it is hilly and broken in most places; the lands then are undulating and rolling and among the best lands in Kentucky at most of those crossings. At some of the points where the cliffs of the river are entirely precipitous the level land commences within a few hundred yards of the top of the precipices, and it has the general level of the country. Some of the richest lands of the State run within a hundred or two yards of the precipitous cliffs of the Kentucky River, but generally for a mile or two off it is rugged, and where these roads go down in the valleys it is more rugged, because it is broken by those streams, and at most of the crossings I have spoken of it is rugged and broken for 2 or 3 miles.

Question. Are the banks of the Kentucky River, as you have described them in your last answer, fit for encamping a large army?

I suppose at most of the places within half a mile to a mile of the river, extending back, you will find camping ground for considerable armies. At the mouth of Hickman, I suppose, within a mile of the bridge over the Kentucky River and on a direct line not more than half a mile or a little more and extending back indefinitely for any distance to Nicholasville, would be as fine a quality of camping ground as could be found in Kentucky. It is the same at Tait's Ferry. At the crossing on the road to Harrodsburg it is much farther off from the river.

Question. Which crossing is that?

That is the crossing by Brooklyn, the turnpike road from Lexington to Harrodsburg; it is farther off where the camp could be accommodated. At the crossing on the direct road to Shakertown camps could be formed up to the tops of the precipitous cliffs where the towers of the suspension bridge are built. There would be some want of water, but it could be obtained by drawing it from the river or from a stream or creek which is a mile or two back.

Question. Do you think that at the place where the towers of the suspension bridge are built there is camping ground on the south bank of the river?

I think, sir, you could commence within 50 yards of the towers and extend back to Lexington. The width of the ground as you approach the river becomes narrow, but it opens as you go back. Bradshaw's whole farm, which is in the immediate vicinity, would answer for camping purposes.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that General Bragg expected a large accession to his army from a general rising of the people of Kentucky to his assistance?

I do not know that I could say that I have any well-founded reasons, though I have a belief that they expected a considerable rising in Kentucky in their favor. I believe that the Kentuckians who were with him and the domestic rebels at home had made extravagant and exaggerated representations in regard to the matter. How far Bragg was possessed of such a belief and how far such representations influenced him I have no knowledge, but I would presume naturally that he was to some extent influenced by them.

Question. From what you know of General Bragg's campaign do you or do you not believe that his retreat out of Kentucky was caused entirely by his disappointment in not being recruited from Kentucky as he expected?

From what I know of General Bragg's campaign I do not believe that his not receiving recruits in Kentucky or his disappointment of a general uprising had anything, or if anything very little, to do with his retreat from the State.

Question. What military reasons do you think General Bragg had for his retreat from Kentucky?

I do not know that he had any good reason for retreating, but I have stated that I supposed it was because of the exaggerated estimate of the force that General Buell was represented to have had and to the fact that he supposed his force was not able to cope with them. The facts that General Buell's army was prepared for motion and put in motion and moved against him much sooner than he could reasonably have expected were, I think, the reasons for his retreating. He was not prepared to receive General Buell, as I presume he thought at the time. I do not think he would have retreated if he had known the strength of our forces or if the movement had been delayed ten days on the part of our forces. I have no knowledge of any good military reason for his retreat except as indicated in this and other answers.

Question. Then, general, you believe that Bragg was able to contend with General Buell's forces with the probability of success?

I believe that his force was nearly as large as the effective force which General Buell could have brought against him. I believe Bragg's force was so large that, taking the largest number that he could have brought into action and handled effectively, it would have left him a strong reserve to have enabled him to have made the contest doubtful. I do not think that the disparity of numbers, of 8,000 or 10,000 where the armies reach over 50,000, is a reason to create a belief in the certainty of victory to the side having the larger force. As far as my knowledge of history extends and my personal observation such disparity is not much in favor or disfavor of either party. I have believed and still believe that in a fair fight, with any good general commanding on either side, the contest between those forces would have been doubtful. The superiority of numbers on our side was compensated for by the length of service, discipline, and drill that we might reasonably conclude the enemy had.

Question. Were not the two armies recently engaged at Murfreesborough substantially the same two armies that were opposed to each other last summer?

I do not know, but think not exactly, from the best information I have, which I think is pretty reliable. There must have been withdrawn from the rebel army, from the information that I have, a division, the strength of which I do not know, under Kirby Smith. Bragg lost in Kentucky in his retreat and in battle I think from 6,000 to 8,000 men; besides, he must have lost many from the effects of his campaign that we know nothing of after their arrival in Tennessee. Bragg received an accession before the battle of Murfreesborough of Breckinridge's command of not less than 5,000 men; he received some recruits and conscripts from Tennessee and some few troops, two or three thousand, from Georgia and Alabama, as I have been informed. But the army on our side had from 8,000 to 12,000, I do not know how many, of old, disciplined troops that General Rosecrans had. I should think there would be probably 10,000 of them; there may have been more, possibly less. I think the forces engaged in the contest were generally the same as were in Kentucky, with the exceptions I have named. I derived this information and the belief resulting from it from General Rosecrans, and the accounts of spies sent by him into the enemy's lines, whose reports I saw (one was delivered to me because it could not reach General Rosecrans), and from the statements of officers who were at Murfreesborough. I do not think there was any great inequality of force at Murfreesborough. I think that was a doubtful contest, and rather demonstrates the view I have taken of the issue of things in Kentucky had there been a battle there.

Question. Did you consider Bragg's army acting on the offensive in the campaign of Kentucky or not?

I considered it so at first. I think he was put on the defensive, though, much sooner than he expected to be.

Question. At what point of his march do you consider General Bragg put on the defensive in the campaign in Kentucky?

I do not know but what he may have been considered to be on the defensive the whole while; yet his demonstrations were unquestionably offensive at Munfordsville and threateningly so at Bardstown. The other forces, under Smith, were part of Bragg's army, and were on the offensive from the time they entered the State, and were continually so advancing toward Cincinnati, having taken Lexington, marched upon the capital of the State and taken that also, marched to Shelbyville, to within 32 miles of Louisville, and a portion of them advanced to Floyd's Fork, within 16 or 17 miles of Louisville. Bragg did not advance farther toward Louisville than Bardstown with the main body of his army; some of them may have advanced as far as Salt River, which is within 20 miles of Louisville. They took the defensive then, I think, and maintained it for some time, falling back and massing on Chaplin River, in Mercer and Boyle Counties. They waited there the advance of General Buell's army. I suppose they may be said to have been on the defensive from the time General Buell reached Elizabethtown. Certainly their offensive demonstrations were less, if they did not cease, about that time; I mean that they fell back from the advanced positions near Louisville and Cincinnati and concentrated their forces. They were not offensive in their demonstrations except in the sense they seemed determined to give battle. I never expected them to retreat from the State without a battle. I think they were made to retreat by the expeditiousness with which the army moved against them and for other reasons before given.

Question. Do you consider General Buell's army to have been acting on the offensive or defensive from the time Bragg crossed the Tennessee River until the battle of Perryville?

In answer to a question from Mr. Lincoln by telegraph as to where Bragg was, I stated to him that he was in Tennessee, moving northward on a line parallel with the line on which General Buell was moving and east of General Buell, but how far from that line I did not know; but I thought he was harassing or would harass General Buell in his retrograde movement, or that he would diverge, crossing the Cumberland east of Nashville, at Carthage or Gainesborough or Burkesville and enter Kentucky, and I was fearful would penetrate the State before General Buell could possibly reach it. I believed then that General Buell was on the defensive, and I suppose that he continued so up to the point at which he could have received support from the forces at Louisville or, say, Elizabethtown. Which army was in point of fact on the defensive I cannot state, except as to the opinion I have formed from the movements of the armies and the results of those movements.

By the PRESIDENT.

Question. You spoke yesterday about the forces under Marshall and Stevenson having joined Kirby Smith; would you have us infer that they were with Kirby Smith when he made a junction with Bragg?

My belief is, from the information I have, that Stevenson moved to Danville and not to Lexington, and that he formed a junction with Bragg before Kirby Smith did. Marshall came to Lexington, and was in camp for some days in the immediate vicinity of Harrodsburg with his forces and before a portion of Kirby Smith's forces had crossed the Kentucky River. I do not believe that Marshall's forces had formed a junction until Kirby Smith came up that side of the river; they were resting back of Harrodsburg at the time of the battle. I think Stevenson's forces marched down the road toward Frankfort as far as Lawrenceburg and probably farther. I think they fell back in the direction of Harrodsburg and formed a junction when General Sill moved in that direction.

Question. You have a good knowledge of the country, have you not?

Yes, sir; I have lived in the immediate vicinity all my life.

Question. In your opinion would it form much of an obstruction in the way of General Buell's advance if he had intended to make an attack upon the other side of that river or to get into the way of Bragg's retreat from Camp Dick Robinson southwest?

Dick's River is very much like the Kentucky River in its banks and cliffs; they are precipitous, perpendicular cliffs, one or two hundred feet. There are a number of places, as on the Kentucky River, where there are crossings more or less eligible—at every crossing of turnpike or country roads or neighborhood roads. Those cliffs as they extend up to the vicinity of Crab Orchard become less precipitous and less high as they go up. A very small force on the south side of Dick's River could have held it against a large force attempting to cross. I think the natural defenses formed by the river and its cliffs are about as good as any artificial ones I ever saw. General Buell could not have crossed the river with an opposing force of any strength, such as a reasonable man would have thought of placing there, unless he had made a flank movement in the direction of Crab Orchard and crossed the river where the cliffs drop off and the banks are not high, as in the vicinity of Crab Orchard.

Redirect examination by General BUELL :

Question. Do you mean the Commission to understand, general, that all the rebel forces were on the south side of the Kentucky River and were within concentrating distance of the vicinity of Harrodsburg about the time of the battle of Perryville; I mean Kirby Smith's original force—Marshall, Stevenson, and Bragg's army proper?

That is my information and belief. A portion of Smith's forces may not have reached Harrodsburg until the day of the battle. They had small forces holding the different points of the country.

Question. Have you seen it stated in the official report of the general-in-chief that I had 100,000 men under my command while I was operating against General Bragg in Kentucky?

I have never seen anything of the kind.

Question. In the various criticisms of the Southern press upon Bragg's campaign and the various apologies made by his friends have you ever seen his retreat excused on the ground that his force was inferior to mine?

I have not; but I have read very few of those criticisms. I do not remember to have read but two articles, I believe, of all of them. I have read some comments in our papers on the controversy between Forsyth and Governor Dick Hawes.

Question. Do you consider that the statement of General Forsyth in the article you refer to, that Kentucky was backed by an army of 40,000 men, was any indication of the actual strength of Bragg's army?

I do not consider it as an indication of the actual strength, for I feel absolutely certain, as far as I can be sure from human testimony and the most reliable information, that there was a much larger force.

Question. Do you understand, general, that in all military operations the sphere of offensive movements is limited by certain circumstances, such as the amount of supplies and the distance to which you can carry supplies with the means available, and perhaps by other considerations also?

I certainly understood that these circumstances mentioned—the amount, condition of supplies, means of transportation, and distance to be transported—and everything entering essentially into the time and expedition at which offensive movements can be made.

Question. Does it not follow, then, that an army may be on the defensive for everything beyond the sphere which is limited by these circumstances, and that within that sphere it may assume the offensive if an enemy should come within its reach?

I suppose there can be no question that the offensive movements of an army must be limited by its means of subsistence and the means of transporting its subsistence; that an army may be on the offensive at one time and on the defensive at another, as they may have the means of supporting themselves in any offensive movement and in transporting subsistence.

Question. Is it not true that an army acting on the offensive within the sphere of its operations may be consequently checked in its offensive movements by the enemy's taking a position which it would be unwise to assail?

I think so, certainly.

Question. So that for various reasons an army may be on the offensive one day as far as its movements are concerned and on the defensive another day; is it not so?

Yes. I have stated in my former answers that an army might at one time be on the offensive and at another on the defensive; limited in its movements, offensive or defensive, by its means of subsistence, means of transportation of subsistence, by the advantage of position of the enemy, and by other considerations. Having the advantage of supplies within the reach of depots of supplies, its operations might be made offensive. I would suppose that the relative positions of armies as to whether they are acting on the offensive or defensive would depend entirely upon these considerations, or at least mainly upon these considerations.

Commission adjourned to meet January 30, 1863.

CINCINNATI, January 30, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General BOYLE's testimony continued, as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Can you state whether Major-General Nelson served under the command of his junior in Kentucky about the time of the invasion of that State by the rebel forces?

He did, sir. I was present when he met General Wright, and he stated to him, as General Wallace had to me, that he was ready to serve in any capacity that he could for his country's service; that rank should make no difference and should not be regarded. He did receive orders from General Wright.

Recross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. General, please look at the paragraph marked there (a strip of newspaper was handed to the witness by the judge-advocate) and state to the Commission whether that is what you referred to yesterday in speaking of Colonel Forsyth's estimate of the forces in Kentucky?

(Objected to by General Buell. Objection overruled.)

The WITNESS. No, sir; I never saw that notice before.

Question. In your cross-examination of yesterday this question was asked you: "Do you consider that the statement of General Forsyth in the article you referred to, that Kentucky was backed by an army of 40,000 men, is any indication of the actual strength of Bragg's army?"

General BUELL. This may be a proper time to urge the objection I made to the question.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. What is the ground of your objection?

General BUELL. The objection is that the question assumes that an estimate was made by Mr. Forsyth in this article as to the strength of Bragg's army, whereas neither my question nor the answer to that question implies that any specific estimate was made by Mr. Forsyth in the article alluded to. I only alluded to it myself because the statement is one that might by an ingenious critic be put forward as an estimate by Mr. Forsyth of the strength of that army.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. I now ask you if this is the article to which you referred?

No, sir; I had no reference to this article, which is one I never saw before in all my life. The article which I saw was many times less in length than this. We had a condensed statement in some paper of the controversy alluded to, but I never saw this before. I understood from the paper that I did read that the controversy was as to the extent of rebel feeling in Kentucky and the number of men that would be likely to join the Confederates on their entering the State, and the numbers spoken of were not intended to represent the strength of the army, but the amount was stated as an argument by Forsyth to show that even with a great number the feeling did not exist in Kentucky which had been represented. The article representing the controversy which I saw, and which was a very condensed statement, made very little impression on me anyway.

Question. I would ask you whether the following sentence impressed itself upon your memory to such extent as that you can recollect it: "This is not a supposable case, seeing that Governor Hawes stands as the advocate of the loyalty of the State, which has just refused to take up arms for its own redemption with a Confederate army of 40,000 brave men at its back"?

I have just stated that I never saw the article, and of course it could not have impressed itself upon my memory, as implied by the question, nor do I remember the numbers stated in the article that I did see. I supposed, as I stated before, that it was fixed at an amount sufficiently large for the purpose of the argument, but I do not remember if it was 40,000 or 50,000 or 30,000. I certainly had no idea that it pretended to state the exact number of the rebel army that was in the State.

Question. You wish, then, to correct the impression made yesterday in your explanation to General Buell, that you had seen no such statement as to the number of men under General Bragg in Kentucky made by Mr. Forsyth?

No, sir; I wish to make no correction at all. I do not see that it is at all necessary.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. In connection with your testimony that General Nelson agreed to serve under his junior in rank, do you know that Congress has vested the President only with that power, and was not General Buell, in assigning a senior to serve under General Wright, assuming a power not delegated to him?

General Buell never did any such thing. I never intimated that he had done any such thing any more than he assigned General Wallace to serve under me. General Nelson and General Wallace both volunteered as a duty of patriotism, as I understood, to serve under those who were their juniors. General Nelson was ordered to Kentucky before the new Department of the Ohio was created, which took Kentucky out of General Buell's command. When General Nelson reached Nashville I advised him by telegraph of it. He continued, however, on his route to Louisville. When he arrived there I showed him the order of the Secretary of War to me creating the department and assigning General Wright to its command. A day or two after his arrival General Wright came, and having seen the first general orders of General Wright, I can state that he assumed command on the 23d day of September. It was voluntary entirely on the part of General Nelson that he took command under General Wright, just as it was with General Wallace taking command under me.

Question. You stated that Bragg lost during his invasion of Kentucky 8,000 men; will you please enumerate those losses?

I cannot answer the question with very great accuracy, not having the papers and records of my headquarters with me. My recollection and present estimate is that there were about 4,300 to 4,500 prisoners taken, and sent to Louisville and paroled there. I think the number altogether would be about 4,800. I think the killed were from 800 to 1,100; I cannot state the exact number. I think there were, from all the information I have, from 2,000 to 2,500 that were paroled, and made their way through the country home; some of them, I have no doubt, joined the army notwithstanding the parole. My estimate is that there were from 6,000 to 8,000, as I stated in my answer. I have no doubt that the final effects of the campaign of Bragg's army diminished it even more than that, if we knew the results upon it after it arrived in Tennessee, but about which I have meager information and upon which it would not do to form an estimate.

Question. Did not our losses in prisoners, killed, and wounded at Perryville exceed those of the enemy during his invasion of Kentucky?

No, sir; I would not suppose it was to be compared, though I do not know so much of our loss as I do of the enemy's, the other branch of it having come under my notice from the administration of my own duties.

By General TYLER :

Question. Were you engaged in such military operations during the invasion of Kentucky as to place you in contact with Bragg's and Kirby Smith's armies, or is the information you have given the Commission as to the force, operations, and losses such as you have obtained from reports and from reading the public press ?

I was in command of Kentucky when Kirby Smith entered the State. I had communication with General George W. Morgan at Cumberland Gap by telegraph daily. I had scouts in the country, spies in the country, to ascertain the position and force of the enemy. After Kirby Smith was in the State I had persons who entered his lines and who could form estimates of his force. I heard expressions of opinion from General Wallace, General Nelson, General Cruft, General Jackson, and other officers as to his force, according to the information that they had derived, having received it through spies and scouts, and from their observation. I acquired my knowledge and information of Bragg's forces in the same manner. I do not remember to have seen any newspaper statements or estimates; they would have formed no basis of opinion for me at all. I have seen numbers of officers and privates of intelligence that belonged to Bragg's and Kirby Smith's armies, some of whom I knew, and from information they gave me, and from the various sources, such as I presume are relied upon by prudent and discreet men placed in the position in which I was, I drew my opinions and formed my estimates. I supposed my position, commanding in Kentucky, required me to take all necessary steps for the purpose of ascertaining both the force, position, and amount of the armies of the rebels, and that I did, I thought, with industry and care; and I suppose that my information and knowledge upon the subject are as accurate, or ought to be more accurate, than that of most persons, if not of any one.

Question. What points of time does your command in Kentucky, referred to in the last part of your answer, cover ?

I assumed command in Kentucky on the 4th of June. I remained in command until the 23d of August, when General Wright assumed command. I still remained at Louisville after he assumed command, and after General Buell's arrival I was left in command at Louisville of the forces that were left there.

Question. After General Buell's arrival at Louisville to the close of the campaign was your command confined to Louisville ?

I had the command of the troops that were outside of Louisville. Some of them were at Shepherdsville.

Question. Please name the points where the troops under your command were stationed.

At Louisville and immediately around it, at Shepherdsville, at Jeffersonville, and of troops that were coming in. Some of them came in after General Buell left there, I believe. I took command of such troops as I sent to escort the trains as far as Bardstown. Some of the troops were those that arrived after General Buell left there or were on the north side of the river.

By General BUELL :

Question. Apart from the limits of your command, do you consider that your interest in the state of Kentucky and your acquaintance with its people would have given you peculiar facilities for gaining information in regard to the enemy that was invading it ?

I think so, sir. I think I had as much facility and opportunity as almost any other native citizen of the State could have had, having a considerable acquaintance in every section and county in the State.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Before the witness is dismissed I wish to say I did not call his attention to the correspondence between Forsyth and Hawes for the purpose of introducing it before the Commission, because that was done by General Buell yesterday; but having procured that correspondence and having found a positive statement as to the number of Bragg's army in Kentucky, I wished to call the attention of the witness to it, to see whether his memory was exact in that, and how far he could explain the comment made upon it yesterday; that was all.

General BUELL. My impression is that the controversy referred to was made the subject of testimony by the judge-advocate himself, and I should like to have the record examined to determine whether that is so or not.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. In every instance the witness has said he knew nothing about it. I have alluded to it several times and the witness has said he did not know anything about it.

General BUELL. I repeat my request that the record be examined as to whether the subject was introduced by the judge-advocate. The questions which I refer to are in the first part of the cross-examination by the judge-advocate. The first question is (General Buell reading from the record of January 29):

You saw Bragg's report, did you not, of that expedition into Kentucky and the letters and comments of the rebel press upon it shortly after it occurred?

The second question is:

You cannot, then, state what estimate the rebels placed upon our forces immediately after the expedition?

And I wish to say here that my impression is that the question is not properly recorded, and I submit to the judge-advocate whether it is or not. You may judge from memory or from the context as to whether it should read "our forces" or "their forces." I had myself seen no article in which the strength of the rebel army was alluded to in any manner in figures, unless the article of Mr. Forsyth should be considered as pretending to make an estimate of its strength, and therefore I alluded to that article in particular; so that I consider the subject was introduced by the cross-examination, and it was for that reason that I took it up in the further examination of the witness. I present the question to the Commission and the judge-advocate as to whether that question is correctly recorded in that one word, as to whether it should be "our" or "their" forces. It can be determined by the context better than by the recollection as to which word was used.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. My recollection is that it is correctly recorded. General Boyle had stated in his examination-in-chief that Bragg and his officers overestimated the force under General Buell, and hence his hurried retreat from Kentucky. In the cross-examination I asked this question, as it is recorded:

You cannot state, then, what estimate the rebels placed upon our forces?

General Buell does not seem to appreciate the statement that I made in reference to this criticism. I have referred to it repeatedly, but never for the purpose of bringing it before the Commission, but for the purpose of testing the information of the witness who happened to be upon the stand. Yesterday General Buell referred to this criticism and quoted a portion of it, and I therefore claim that he introduced this correspondence that I examined the witness upon this morning.

General BUELL. Then, Mr. President, I may answer that the frequent reference to this correspondence by the judge-advocate in his examination justified me in fortifying myself against any use he may design to make of that correspondence in the first place, and I may say also that I can give the same reason that he gave for examining the witness with reference to the substance of that correspondence; and I do not think the question I have raised as to the accuracy of the record is of very great importance. I will add, with reference to my views, that I remember asking the witness whether he had ever seen any defense made of Bragg's retreat from Kentucky on the ground that his force was insufficient to cope with mine.

(The recorder, having referred to his notes by the order of the President, stated at the next session the word reported and read to the court was "our.")

General W. S. SMITH (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. Will you state your name and position in the service, if you please?

William Sooy Smith, brigadier-general of volunteers.

Question. Were you in command at Bowling Green from the 10th to the 16th of September last?

I was.

Question. Did you receive any messages during your command from the commanding officer at Munfordville calling for re-enforcements and giving reasons why he should have them?

I did not.

Question. Do you remember to have seen any scouts or messenger who represented themselves as having been sent from the commanding officer at Munfordville for any purpose?

No, sir; I did not. I saw a citizen, who reported that he had come from the vicinity, but not by command of the commanding officer. I think it was on Monday morning succeeding the attack.

Question. Who was that citizen?

I do not recollect his name.

Question. Do you remember what information he brought?

He brought information of an attack upon Munfordville, but particulars he did not know.

Question. What information did he give in regard to the attack; do you remember?

He simply stated that an attack had been made; that he heard firing; and said he had been within 3 miles of Munfordville and heard very heavy firing, which continued at the time that he left.

Question. Did you about that time hear of the arrival of any messenger from the commanding officer at Munfordville with such information as I have alluded to in the previous question?

No, I did not. Col. Bruce had been in command there and might have received such a messenger. No such messenger was reported to me and I knew of no such.

Question. If any such messengers had gone to Colonel Bruce on the supposition that he was still in command would it have been his duty to send them to you and is it probable that he would have done it?

It would have been his duty and I think he would have done so.

Question. Were you at the headquarters of the Army of the Ohio at Decherd, Tenn., about the 22d or 23d of August last, for several days about that time?

I was at the headquarters of the Army of the Ohio at Decherd for several days.

during the month of August last, but what part of the month I do not distinctly remember.

Question. Have you any recollection that during that time information was received of the advance of the rebel forces from Chattanooga and other points? If so, please state what that information was, as far as you recollect it, and what movements were ordered in anticipation of it by the commander of the Army of the Ohio.

Information was received that General Bragg was concentrating a large force at Chattanooga, a force also at Kingston, and a small force below Chattanooga, on the Tennessee River, intending to cross the Tennessee River and the mountains lying between the Tennessee River and our position in Middle Tennessee. That force was variously estimated at from 40,000 to 100,000. It was understood that one hundred and twenty regiments had crossed or were about to cross the Tennessee River near Chattanooga. In consequence of that information the troops of the Army of the Ohio were ordered from Northern Alabama and several positions in Middle Tennessee in the direction of Decherd, Tullahoma, and McMinnville. Of the movements that were made farther back I know nothing. A force was afterward sent to Altamont and a small force was at Cowan.

Question. Can you state about the date of the orders for the concentration at Altamont?

No, sir; I cannot.

Question. Do you remember such orders distinctly?

I do.

Question. Can you state whether the information upon which those orders were issued appeared to make it certain that the enemy was advancing by way of Altamont and that he would arrive at that point very speedily?

I cannot say that the information rendered that certain. So far as the information reached me, I can only say that it was the general impression that that was their first objective point. It seemed to me that it was in his power to advance by that line or by one of several others leading through the mountains. It was a general impression that at least a portion of his force would certainly come that way.

Question. Was there anything in the information received about that time which indicated any other as the road by which he was to be expected to pass into Middle Tennessee?

There was information received, which was deemed reliable, that a force was advancing upon the Therman road, but I think that that information was later. I do not think any information had reached us of any movements farther north than the Altamont road; none certainly reached me.

Question. Do you understand the Therman road to be, for a considerable distance from the Sequatchie Valley, the same as the road leading to Altamont?

Yes, sir. I do.

Question. Do you remember the distance from Altamont at which the road forks, the Therman road going to the right to McMinnville and the other fork going to Altamont?

No, sir. I do not.

Question. Is your information with regard to the geography of that country sufficient to enable you to explain what made Altamont an important point for concentrating the Army of the Ohio in anticipation of the advance of Bragg's army by the Therman road?

The only information I possess in regard to the geography of the country is gained from maps of that region and conversations with the inhabitants of that part of the country, and the impression in my mind made by such knowledge was that it commanded at least two of the best routes through the mountains that were known;

two, at least, of the direct routes from the Sequatchie Valley into the valley of Middle Tennessee. It commands the route direct through Altamont, also the route through McMinnville, being within striking distance of the forks of the road.

Question. Can you state whether the impression existed at headquarters at the time the orders for concentration at Altamont were given that the enemy had made such progress that it was even a matter of doubt whether the concentration could be effected at that point before the enemy could arrive there?

Such was the impression, and I recollect distinctly hearing the commanding general express the desire that such a concentration should be effected, but said that there was not time to get sufficient force into position at that point.

Question. Do you know whether the troops actually moved to form such a junction?

I know that troops did move to Altamont and other troops moved in that direction to within supporting distance—as many troops as could be made available at the time.

Question. What was your position and command at the time you allude to?

I was in command of the post at Decherd, commanding all the troops stationed there.

Question. What was the strength of your command and what was the object of having troops at that point?

There were about 4,000 men. The object of holding a force at that point was to watch the approach of the enemy by the road which debouches from the mountains near Cowan and to perform this duty in conjunction with the force at Cowan; also to guard our railroad communications with the rear, then threatened by a cavalry force of the enemy.

Question. Was Decherd also a depot for the troops along that line at that time?

It was the depot for supplies.

Question. Can you state what there is in the topography of that country which made Decherd an important point with reference to any movement of the enemy to get in rear of the positions we held in North Alabama at that time?

There is a good road, which, debouching from the mountains, passes through Decherd, and, running in a southwesterly direction, leads directly to the rear of the position of our forces in North Alabama.

Question. What is the character of the country between the Chattanooga Railroad and the road leading from Decherd to Huntsville which you have just described, and in what position would the peculiar features of that country place a force at Huntsville taken in rear by a force coming from Decherd as you have supposed?

The country is very rugged and mountainous and not traveled by any practicable roads to my knowledge; so that it would be impossible for a force to escape from Northern Alabama and make its way to our positions in what we suppose the neighborhood of McMinnville by turning the enemy's force to its left; in other words, they would be cut off from a junction with the remainder of our forces.

General DANA here moved—

“That as the body of General Sill, lately killed at the battle of Murfreesborough, has arrived in Cincinnati, the Commission adjourn to enable the members to pay proper respect to his memory and the occasion.”

Carried.

The Commission adjourned to meet January 31, 1863, at 10 a. m.

CINCINNATI, January 31, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General W. S. SMITH's testimony continued, as follows :

By General BUELL :

Question. Do you know enough of the country between Huntsville and Chattanooga, or any portion of that district of country, to be enabled to speak in regard to its resources—its supplies of forage and provisions ?

I have passed through the country lying between Huntsville and Stevenson, with the exception of a very limited section. There are little valleys somewhat productive, but generally it is a very sterile country, and it could not be relied upon for supplies of provisions and forage to any very considerable extent.

Question. Can you describe the natural features of the country between Decatur and Stevenson so as to indicate to the Commission its agricultural advantages? Describe the breadth of the Tennessee Valley at these different points relatively, the positions of the mountains, and so forth.

From Decatur to a point a few miles beyond Huntsville in the direction of Stevenson there is a level country. We there reach the western line of the mountain ranges, which, running in a southwesterly direction, pass near Huntsville, and so on nearly to the Tennessee River. From that point to the northeastward is a mountainous region all the way to Stevenson, with the river running nearly parallel with the railroad, and is, as I have been told, a very narrow valley, scarcely producing anything. But what the breadth of the valley is I do not know, having never been there myself. It is a very flat country west of Huntsville, extending up into Middle Tennessee, and is very fertile.

Question. Do the mountains close in upon the river abruptly near Stevenson or a short distance above there ?

At Stevenson they are but about 2 miles from the river. The direction of the range would seem to bring them into the river above.

Question. Do you know anything of the character of the country on the south side of the Tennessee River above Stevenson either from observation or from any other means by which a knowledge of the geography of the country is to be obtained ?

I have heard that the mountains on the south side of the river between Stevenson and Chattanooga come right up to the river and that the mountainous country extends to a great distance to the south. I am familiar with the country from Chattanooga to Atlanta and farther south, and know that the whole country between Chattanooga and Atlanta is a mountainous country.

Question. Can you say anything in regard to the resources of the country between Chattanooga and Bridgeport or within a distance of 20 miles of that line ?

The country within a distance of 20 miles of that line to the southward I suppose to be very barren. To the northward there would be a strip of country in the Sequatchie Valley within that distance of the line mentioned which is productive. The valley I understood to be of a width varying from 1 to 5 miles. With that exception I know of no fertile country within the limits mentioned, except perhaps a limited region lying immediately along the Tennessee River on the north side, above the point at which it is struck by Walden's Ridge, lying between the Sequatchie Valley and the Tennessee River and Chattanooga.

Question. Would the Sequatchie Valley be within 20 miles of Chattanooga ?

It would not. A portion of it would be within 20 miles of the line connecting Chattanooga with Stevenson, the Sequatchie Valley running obliquely to the line.

Question. Do you know anything in regard to the amount of supplies procurable in the valley of the Tennessee, as far as you had any opportunity of observing; had the previous occupation of that country by our troops and other causes effectually drained it of supplies?

I know that it was exceedingly difficult to procure supplies or forage. I think no provisions of any amount could be collected between Decatur and Stevenson. That region of country had been occupied by our troops under General Mitchel for some months previous to the arrival there of the remainder of the Army of the Ohio, and must have been dependent on that region to a great extent for their supplies, inasmuch as railroad communication with Nashville had not been restored. The inhabitants of Huntsville were actually in want during my command of that post immediately after my arrival there.

Question. State, if you please, what time you were at Huntsville and what position you occupied there.

I was there in June and July. I was assigned to the command of the Third Division, and being the ranking officer, was in command of the post.

Question. State, if you please, what you know of the resources of the country at other points where you were stationed during the months of July and August, particularly along the Chattanooga Railroad north of Stevenson in the direction of Nashville.

From Stevenson to Cowan it is a barren, mountainous country. We there reach the valley of Middle Tennessee. That portion of it immediately adjacent to the mountains is fertile. Passing a belt of 4 or 5 miles we come to a glade country, the soil of which is thin and not very productive; it extends in the direction of Nashville to a point about 3 miles to the northwestward of Tullahoma. We there reach a hilly country that is but moderately productive, which extends to within about 10 miles of Murfreesborough. The country from that to Nashville is mostly level and fertile. A belt of fertile country next to the mountains follows the directions of the mountains, I believe, as far as McMinnville.

Question. How was that part of the country that you were in off for supplies last summer and were the supplies made use of for the public service as far as possible?

Supplies could not be collected to any very considerable extent. I received an order to collect all within my reach, and in compliance with that order succeeded in getting a thousand barrels of flour at Manchester, and perhaps two hundred barrels in all near Tullahoma at McQuiddy's mills. I also got beef cattle and sheep enough to supply my troops, who were part of the time on half rations.

Question. Did these supplies that you collected from the country go into the hands of the commissaries to be issued as regular supplies or were they consumed by the troops in addition to the half rations which were authorized to be issued?

They were turned over to the commissary to be issued regularly.

Question. Were you employed after the evacuation of Corinth in superintending repairs on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad between Corinth and Decatur? If so, please state, as circumstantially as you can, the work that was performed and the time occupied in that way and whether the work was executed with industry and energy.

I was so employed. The road had been greatly damaged by the destruction of its bridges and trestle work, both by our own troops and the troops of the enemy. There were placed under my command for the execution of the work an entire regiment of Michigan Engineers and Mechanics, with the exception of a detachment of two companies which were then serving with General Mitchel. In addition to that force I was authorized by order of General Buell to call upon division commanders whose troops were on the line for such additional force as I might require. I employed all the force that could be worked at the various points requiring repairs and pressed forward those repairs with all diligence, constructing 1,200 feet of bridges and trestle work, some of it to the height of 40 feet, and consumed in repairing the road about three weeks. Troops were ordered forward for the special purpose of assisting in the work and guarding the working parties.

Question. What was the ostensible object in repairing that road, and by whose orders, if you know, were those repairs made?

I understood that the road was to be opened for the purpose of transferring that portion of the Army of the Ohio that was then at Corinth over to Decatur, and also that the road might serve as a line of communication afterward between the Army of the Ohio and the Union forces in Northern Mississippi and West Tennessee. I also understood that the road was to be repaired by order of General Halleck.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. You need not state that unless it be of your own knowledge; the original order can be produced, if any such exists.

The WITNESS. I was told so by General Buell; that is all the knowledge I have of it.

By General BUELL:

Question. Do you know anything about the amount of rolling stock that was on the road and as to what practical use it was to the Army of the Ohio? If so, please state what you know about it.

There were seven locomotives captured to the westward of Corinth, immediately after the evacuation of Corinth by the enemy, in a damaged condition; besides those there were perhaps half a dozen locomotives in and about Corinth, also in bad condition, but still in running order. Almost every one that was sent upon that part of the line under my charge broke down and became utterly worthless; scarcely any use could be made of them on our line. There was a very limited number of cars available, and not over a dozen were employed at any time on the line between Corinth and Decatur during my superintendence there.

Question. Who had the immediate control of this working stock?

General McPherson.

Question. Who was responsible for the limited amount of it that was employed in the service of the Army of the Ohio?

That was a result to some extent of the necessities of the case. I applied constantly to General McPherson for additional rolling stock, which he failed to furnish; whether he could have done so or not I do not know.

Question. Have you any professional knowledge and have you had any experience in railroad engineering?

I am a civil engineer by profession, and was actively engaged in the duties of my profession for six years previous to my entering the service. Bridge building was a specialty in my practice.

Question. Have you, by reading or other means of information, any knowledge of the country between Somerset, Ky., and the Tennessee River, along the line running through Jackson, Tenn.?

In conversation with those familiar with that region of country I have learned that it is a rough and barren country.

Question. Do you know anything of the character of the road from the mouth of the South Fork of the Cumberland River to Jacksborough and so on toward Knoxville?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. General Smith's answer to the previous question is objectionable; hereafter the general will confine himself to his personal knowledge.

General BUELL. I desire to say, in reference to the injunction of the judge-advocate, that the information to be derived in regard to the geography of a country from personal knowledge is very limited. The subject of geography is one that is within the reach of every man who can read, write, talk, and hear, and the knowledge derived in that way of such subjects is as legitimate and reliable as can be expected, or as is necessary either for evidence or for practical purposes.

General ORD. I beg to remark that we should bring this question to a vote. The judge-advocate has no business to direct what the witness shall or shall not say.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I was instructed by the Commission to warn witnesses to say only that which they knew of their own personal knowledge.

General TYLER. If the judge-advocate is to be lectured, I vote that the court be cleared.

The court was cleared, when, after discussion, the judge-advocate withdrew the remark.

The WITNESS. I do not.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. General, what was done with the fortifications about Decherd when the Army of the Ohio fell back to Nashville?

Nothing, to my knowledge.

Question. What became of the various improvements made by yourself and others upon the various lines of railroad when you fell back to Nashville?

I burned a number of bridges that were situated between Decherd and Murfreesborough; also one of the stockades.

Question. Will you state what number of bridges were destroyed?

I think three; two of the most important.

Question. Were not all the lines of railway, that had been put in order with so much labor, destroyed when the army fell back?

I do not know what was done upon any other line than the one from Stevenson to Nashville.

General BUELL. I will save the judge-advocate time and trouble upon the subject, if he desires, by saying to the Commission that they were destroyed or ought to have been; that I gave directions to General Smith to destroy the bridges, as he moved along the road, as far as Murfreesborough.

The PRESIDENT. Then it becomes important for us to know whether your order was executed; and, if so, how far.

General BUELL. My directions were confined to the destruction of the bridges, I believe.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. How much of that order was executed that was referred to by General Buell?

As already stated, three of the bridges were destroyed; two of them were the most important, one over Elk River and the other over Duck River. There were a number of small bridges—I do not exactly recollect how many—that were not destroyed.

Question. You may state why they were not destroyed.

Some of them were situated at some distance from my line of march, and I thought that the small ones would be easily repaired, at any rate, while the larger ones were being rebuilt, and, if so, their destruction would cause the enemy no additional inconvenience or loss of time.

Question. At what time did you become aware of the fact that Bragg was crossing the Tennessee River at Chattanooga?

The first information that I deemed reliable of his crossing I received while at Decherd, but at what precise date I do not remember.

Question. Was it in the forepart of August?

I think it was in the latter part of August.

Question. What did you estimate his number at ?

From 45,000 to 60,000 men.

Question. Was not your information of such a character that you could come to a nearer estimate than these two extremes ?

It was not. The number of regiments was stated at one hundred and twenty ; their average strength I could not exactly ascertain, but I reckoned it at 400 to 500.

Question. If the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio, with fair means to make their estimate, fixed that army at 35,000 to 40,000, is your information of such a character that you could contradict them ?

General BUELL. I object to the question in its present shape. The principal officers of the Army of the Ohio have not estimated the strength of the rebel army at 35,000 to 40,000.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have not said that the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio had done so. I put a supposable case for the purpose of ascertaining the reliability of the witness' estimate. It is not allowable to tell the witness what previous witnesses have stated. I did not do it. General Buell has no right to do it.

General BUELL. I withdraw my objection.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The mischief is done ; it has taken my supposable case out of my hands. I move that the court adjourn.

Commission adjourned to meet Monday, February 2, 1863.

CINCINNATI, February 2, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present ; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Gen. W. S. SMITH's testimony continued, as follows :

General BUELL. I desire, Mr. President, to say, with reference to the objection I made on Saturday, that I desire now to repeat the objection and insist upon it. The question (of the judge-advocate) does not positively assert that a certain statement has been made in the testimony before the Commission, but it implies as much. Whatever may have been the design of the question, the tendency of it is to mislead the witness, and in a certain way to intimidate him also, by showing his opinion in contrast to that of officers of higher rank than himself, and whose opportunities for obtaining the information referred to he might naturally suppose to be better than his own. The question does virtually assume or assert that the evidence upon which it is founded has been established before this Commission in this investigation. I have no doubt that the rules of evidence would exclude the question, and that perhaps should be the only ground upon which I should urge my objection ; but I might also say that if by a strict interpretation of the rules of evidence the question should be permitted to slip through, yet I see no reason why that sort of investigation should be pursued before a body of army officers and in the examination of an army officer.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. That the question was asked for the purpose of putting General Smith upon his guard is certainly a fact ; whether you would call it intimidating or not is merely a choice of terms. It is an important question, one of the most important in this investigation, and I was anxious that General Smith should give us as clearly as he could the foundation upon which he fixed the number of that army at the time it crossed the Tennessee River, and that he should also state to us how far that was a conviction in his mind. For that purpose I put a supposable case, that could not, by any manner of means, be construed into an assertion of the fact—If the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio stated so and so, is your information of such a character that you can venture to contradict them?—a thing I had an entire right to do and which it was my duty to do. I hold that it is one of the more important points of this investigation. If that army of Bragg's was inferior to the Army of the Ohio in numbers, as in everything else, from the commander down to the humblest private in its ranks, it is a thing the Commission ought to know; and it is very necessary for the Commission to have the evidence on which the conviction of each witness, especially a witness as intelligent as General Smith, is founded. For that purpose I put a supposable case, and the urgency was sufficiently strong to justify me in insisting upon it in such a circumstance as this. I made no statement of fact, and only put a supposable case, which I hold was strictly correct—as to whether we were in the presence of an army inferior to our own or not—and I find no reason for not insisting upon its being put. On the contrary, when General Buell came in with his objection and stated as a fact that which is not a fact—and I have no hesitation in saying it is not a fact—General Buell was himself guilty of transgressing the rules of an investigation of this sort. The question, I maintain, is a legitimate and proper one.

General BUELL. I have nothing more to say, except that the question does imply that a certain supposition, an assumed fact, has been established in evidence before the Commission. I will say also that the question at this time has no reference to the actual strength of Bragg's army, but to the strength it was supposed to have at that time. The judge-advocate has framed his answer in an ingenious method, which I do not think it necessary to dissect or comment upon, and am quite content to leave the decision to the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would remark that after the statement made by General Buell my whole supposable case is taken from me. I would withdraw the question; I have no motive in asking it.

General BUELL. So I understood the judge-advocate on Saturday. It is not for that reason alone that I urge the objection, but it is for the sake of a principle and the establishment of a rule.

The court being cleared, General TYLER moved—

“That the question put by the judge-advocate, as follows: ‘If the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio, with fair means to make their estimate, fixed that army at 35,000 to 40,000, is your information of such a character that you could contradict them?’ and objected to by General Buell, is correct, and that the objection made to it by General Buell in connection therewith was a violation of his duty to this Commission.”

General ORD moved as an amendment—

“That, the question of the judge-advocate having been withdrawn, the Commission does not deem it necessary to take any further action upon the subject.”

Carried.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Were you in command at Bowling Green previous to Colonel Bruce taking command there?

No, sir; not previous.

Question. What time?

From about the 10th to the 16th of September.

Question. It was known there at that time what force was at Munfordville, was it not?

I do not know precisely; it was supposed there was about one brigade there.

Question. Was it not known that one brigade depended upon the Army of the Ohio for support and assistance?

No, sir; I supposed it would be re-enforced from above.

Question. At what point above?

From any forces that were stationed between Munfordville and Elizabethtown or at Louisville, railroad communication being opened.

Question. At what time was it known at Bowling Green that the enemy had moved out of Glasgow toward Munfordville?

I do not recollect the precise date. The first intimation that I had that any portion of the rebel force had moved out of Glasgow was that brought by the messenger referred to, that an attack had been made at Munfordville.

Question. Do you recollect the messenger's name?

I do not.

Question. Was it Washington Miller?

I do not recollect.

Question. After the fall of Munfordville did not the estimate made of the force of the enemy change into a certainty as to their number?

I was told by Colonel Wilder, who had been in command at Munfordville, that he had seen pretty much their entire force, but could not state definitely their number. I think he said that he estimated them at from 35,000 to 45,000. He stated the number of pieces of their artillery at from ninety to one hundred. That is the nearest approach to certainty that I was able to make.

Question. Did not Colonel Wilder tell you that he refused to surrender until he knew positively the force of the enemy?

He said that before surrendering he had been shown the enemy's force in position, and then it was apparent to him that further resistance would be hopeless and would only result in useless slaughter; he therefore surrendered. He did not tell me that he knew their force positively.

Question. Did he not say to you at that time that from the best estimates he could make they did not exceed 36,000?

My recollection is that he said he estimated them at from 35,000 to 45,000.

Question. Did not the prisoners and the citizens give you some information subsequent to the capture of Munfordville upon which you could come to a positive knowledge as to the enemy's force?

They did not. I never conversed with any prisoner except Colonel Wilder, and with no citizen who could make any definite statement as to the enemy's force.

Question. Did you have any conversation with General McCook on that subject?

I never did.

By General TYLER:

Question. Is Chattanooga a strong and defensible position?

I regard it so.

Question. Do you think the army under the command of General Buell could have taken Chattanooga when Bragg occupied it?

I do not.

Question. How many men would you have required to hold that position against the same strength as the Army of the Ohio was at that time?

I think I could have held it with 25,000 men.

By General SCHOEPF :

Question. Do you know the strength of General Buell's army at that time?

Its strength was about 50,000.

Question. Supposing General Buell had marched his army directly from Corinth to and occupied Chattanooga and Knoxville, with Cumberland Gap in our possession and East Tennessee loyal to the Union, what would have been the strategic and moral effect?

The occupancy of those positions by our troops would have been an advantage scarcely to be estimated.

Question. You stated in your reply that you could have held Chattanooga with 25,000 men; would not the remaining 25,000 men have been sufficient to defend Nashville?

Supposing General Grant's army to occupy positions then held by it and the positions already named taken by the troops of the Army of the Ohio, Nashville would have been in a very retired position and I think safe without any considerable garrison. The remainder of the troops of the Army of the Ohio would have been more than sufficient for that purpose.

Question. Please state to the Commission if you have received a military education; and, if so, where?

I am a graduate of the West Point Military Academy; served one year in the regular service, and have been in the volunteer service from almost the commencement of the present war.

By General TYLER :

Question. On what day did the advance of General Buell's army reach Bowling Green?

I do not know the precise day. I found one brigade of it at Bowling Green on my arrival there about the 10th of September.

Question. Can you not fix the exact date?

I cannot. I ordered my adjutant to keep an accurate journal of all our movements and so never treasured those dates in my own mind, and I have not access to that journal now and have not had since I was summoned before the Commission.

Question. Can you give the position of General Buell's army on the 17th of September, the day that Munfordville was capitulated?

No, sir; I cannot.

Question. Can you give the position of some parts of it, those about Bowling Green for example?

I cannot on that precise day; as I said before, I do not treasure those dates in my mind.

Question. How long did General Buell's army remain at Bowling Green from the time its advance arrived there until a forward movement was made?

From the time that the first detached brigade reached Bowling Green to the time that the advance of the whole army moved from that point I should think was about ten days, though the place was held by this detached brigade for several days before the arrival of any of the rest of the troops. There was scarcely any delay at Bowling Green after the main body of the army came up. That delay was understood to have been caused in order to await the arrival of the troops in our rear.

Question. What amount of General Buell's army was concentrated at Bowling Green on the 15th of September?

I cannot say how many troops were concentrated on that particular day. I understood that the whole force finally concentrated there amounted to 35,000 or 40,000 men.

Question. At what date?

I do not know the exact date; it was immediately previous to the advance of the army.

Question. Between what dates were you at Bowling Green?

From about the 10th and the 16th.

Question. What amount of General Buell's army was concentrated at Bowling Green between the 10th and 16th?

They did not report to me, General Buell himself being present, and the precise number concentrated before I relinquished command of the post I cannot state.

Question. On what day did you relinquish command of Bowling Green?

I think about the 16th. I cannot say that that was the exact day.

Question. Can you make an approximate estimate of the number of troops that arrived and reported between the 10th and the 16th?

I cannot; they did not report to me.

Question. And still you were in command?

Yes, sir; in command of the post.

General BUELL. I would suggest it was not the duty of the Army of the Ohio to report to Brigadier-General Smith, in command of the post. Brigadier-General Smith commanded a brigade, and was not the superior officer of the Army of the Ohio. The Army of the Ohio did not arrive immediately at Bowling Green as a military post; it came to Bowling Green and encamped in the vicinity, and the commander of the post had no more to do with it than the commander of any brigade in the army had to do with its management and position.

General TYLER. Do you object to the question?

General BUELL. No, sir. I thought I could save the trouble of putting questions that lead to nothing.

By General TYLER:

Question. Can you give the position of General Buell's army on the 16th, when Bragg's army crossed the Tennessee at or near Chattanooga?

No, sir; I cannot.

Question. What was the position of General Buell's army about the 23d of August, when you were at General Buell's headquarters at Decherd?

There was a portion of his troops, I think one brigade, at Huntsville, Ala.; there was perhaps one regiment between that and Stevenson; and I think one brigade—perhaps not so large a force—at Battle Creek. There was perhaps a brigade stationed between Stevenson and Decherd, a considerable portion of it being at Cowan. There was my force at Decherd of about 4,000 men. There was a force of one or two divisions I think at Altamont, one at Hillsborough, a small force at McMinnville, and some small forces at Manchester. Those are the only positions of troops at that time with which I am familiar.

Question. What was probably the aggregate number of men included in these forces that you have recapitulated?

I should think about 30,000 men.

Question. Was this the position of these different forces when it was your opinion that General Buell could not concentrate his forces at Altamont in time to meet Bragg?

It was.

Question. What force or corps occupied Altamont and how long did they remain there?

That I cannot answer.

Question. Was Altamont ever occupied by any considerable force even for twenty-four hours?

I understood that we had a force there of one or two divisions, but whether the town itself or whether any position in that vicinity was held for any long time I do not know. I know that the forces were moved from point to point with a good deal of activity about that time in accordance with the information that was received.

Question. But you do not know positively that any particular force occupied Altamont even for twenty-four hours?

No, sir; I do not know.

Question. You say in your testimony that it was in Bragg's power to advance by way of Altamont or one of several other lines leading through the mountains; please name those several other lines.

He could proceed up the Sequatchie Valley to Dunlap and from that point through to McMinnville; that is one of the lines to which I refer. There is another road that I understood was practicable farther north still, leading from the Sequatchie Valley over to Sparta and so on up toward Gainesborough. I know of no other practicable routes.

Question. You say that the only information you possess in regard to the geography of the country about Altamont is derived from conversations with the inhabitants and consulting the maps; would not an officer stationed at McMinnville and in that vicinity and who had passed over the country in and about Altamont have far better opportunities to judge of the geography of the country than yourself?

As far as his personal observation extended he would.

Question. Did not the line into Middle Tennessee by way of Pikeville and Sparta present itself to you as one that Bragg would or might adopt?

It appeared to me that Bragg might use that road for at least a portion of his forces.

Question. Will you give the date at which such progress was made by Bragg when it was doubtful that General Buell could concentrate his forces at Altamont in time to meet him?

I cannot give the exact date; it was while I was at Decherd, as already stated.

Question. Cannot you give the date at which Bragg passed out of the Sequatchie Valley at Pikeville?

I have not treasured any of these dates, and cannot therefore give them.

Question. What reason did General Buell give you that he could not concentrate sufficient force at Altamont to meet Bragg?

He said that there were not troops within reach of that point to exceed the number of 25,000 within the time at which Bragg was expected to arrive at that point, positive information having reached us of the enemy's arrival in force at Dunlap.

Question. Where were you or General Buell when this information reached you that Bragg's army had arrived at Dunlap?

At Decherd.

Question. General, can you not by some event fix the date?

I cannot. I do not treasure any of these dates in my mind. Either from some mental peculiarity or habit the relation of events I can recollect, but dates I do not.

Question. What troops were moved to Altamont and how long did they remain there and what troops were moved into a supporting position?

I do not recollect what particular commands were moved either to Altamont or to Hillsborough, which is a supporting position. I only recollect that troops were thus moved on the supposition that the enemy were advancing upon Altamont.

Question. General, please name the road "that debouches from the mountains leading in a southwestwardly direction to the rear of our forces in North Alabama" and what forces were those.

I do not know the name of the road. The forces were those already mentioned as stationed at Huntsville and along the line from Huntsville to Stevenson, being about one brigade at Huntsville and about one regiment between that and Stevenson. There was also another brigade en route to Decherd from Huntsville.

Question. How far on each side of the line of railroad did you personally examine the country between Huntsville and Chattanooga? I mean in reference to its supplies.

I made no examination on either side of the road personally. I was instructed to order the troops under my command stationed along that line to collect supplies, and the knowledge that I gained of the resources of the country was from the replies of commanding officers that scarcely any supplies could be obtained and that the country surrounding them at the various positions for a considerable distance was barren.

Question. Was not that part of the Memphis and Charleston road between Huntsville and Chattanooga well supported from its local business—previous to the rebellion, I mean?

Of that I have no knowledge. I think it impossible, however, unless it drew business from a very great distance.

Question. Do you mean to say that the country from Huntsville between the railroad and the Tennessee River to Chattanooga is a barren and sterile country?

That is my information.

Question. You say you are familiar with the country between Chattanooga and Atlanta?

Along the railroad line connecting those two places I am.

Question. Do you mean to say that this is a barren, sterile country?

Nearly that entire line leads through a mountainous, rough country.

Question. Is it not the railroad from Chattanooga to Atlanta?

Yes, sir.

Question. Have you ever been over it?

Yes, sir.

Question. Is there any grade in that more than 45 feet to the mile? I ask you as an engineer.

That I cannot answer. The road follows the ravines and abounds in sharp curves, by means of which such a direction is given to the line of the road as to avoid, as far as possible, any heavy grades.

Question. What is the distance from Chattanooga to Atlanta; do you know?

I do not know the precise distance.

Question. Does not that tract of country from Chattanooga to Atlanta embrace the whole land ceded by the Cherokees to the State of Georgia and is it not considered the most productive part of the whole State, and in fact the granary from which the lower counties obtain their corn, wheat, pork, and other agricultural supplies for the support of their people?

I know nothing of that grant nor do I know anything of the country lying off the line of the railroad already mentioned from personal observation. I know I saw no fertile territory on the whole line, except perhaps a very limited region in the immediate vicinity of Atlanta.

Question. What is the distance from Chattanooga to the entrance to the Sequatchie Valley?

I should judge about 30 to 40 miles; I am not positive.

General BUELL. I would suggest that the record be not loaded with inaccurate information; if that information is needed it can be obtained; and for that purpose I would suggest that the witness' answers be confined to what he knows.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. That is just what I wished.

Question. To what extent did General Mitchel exhaust the supplies in the neighborhood of Stevenson and what kind of supplies were the inhabitants of Huntsville destitute of?

I cannot say to what precise extent General Mitchel's troops had exhausted the supplies of the country. The supplies which the inhabitants of Huntsville were destitute of were breadstuffs in particular. I do not think they lacked meat.

Question. While you were in command at Huntsville did you or did you not derive any supplies from the surrounding country?

We derived supplies of forage; not of provisions.

Question. Did you attempt to collect any provisions from the country; and, if so, in what manner?

I transmitted orders to the commanding officer under me, in obedience to instructions from General Buell, to collect supplies. At the post at Huntsville I collected none in the way of provisions; the commanding officer referred to succeeded in getting but little.

Question. At what point did you obtain the 1,200 barrels of flour you spoke of in your testimony?

One thousand barrels at Manchester and about 200 at McQuiddy's Mill, near Tullahoma.

Question. What were the circumstances attending the offer of those thousand barrels to you and how came so much to be collected there?

There was a fine mill near Manchester, owned by Mr. Huggins, at which I understood the flour had been manufactured. This Mr. Huggins came to me while I was in command at Tullahoma, accompanied by a staunch Union man, Mr. Rathbone, of Manchester, and tendered the flour for the use of the Government, stating that he feared it would be disturbed or taken away by the rebels. I immediately telegraphed to Major Darr, chief of the commissary department, and asked if I should purchase the flour. He replied that I should, and the flour was accordingly taken in accordance with these instructions, and an order received about the same time to collect all the supplies within our reach.

Question. Did you know that that quantity of flour was at the mill before it was offered to you by the owner?

No, sir; I did not.

Question. General, do you not believe from this fact of 1,000 barrels of flour having been offered to you that if proper exertions had been made a very large amount of flour might have been collected in that vicinity, or do you believe that was all the flour they had?

I do not think that any very large quantity could have been collected. I did collect all I could hear of in any amount, and the 1,000 barrels and that got at McQuiddy's Mill was all that I could procure. The grain of the country for a great distance surrounding those mills seemed to be taken to them for manufacture.

Question. To what extent could beef cattle, sheep, &c., have been collected there at that time?

I had great difficulty in collecting enough beef and sheep to supply the troops of my own command, part of the time being compelled to issue but half rations.

Question. You did supply your command with beef and fresh meat, did you?

Not fully. There was a small quantity of bacon delivered to us from day to day at Tullahoma and Manchester.

Question. Have you reason to believe that other corps and division commanders labored under greater difficulties in obtaining supplies of flour, fresh meat, &c., than you did?

I think they did, from the fact that their commands were larger and most of them were in a more barren region.

Question. Were you in charge of the repairs of the Memphis and Charleston road after the evacuation of Corinth?

I was; of that portion of the line between Corinth and Decatur.

Question. What was the length of that part?

I do not recollect its length.

Question. Did you report to General Buell the quantity and condition of the rolling stock which you stated in your direct testimony to be very imperfect?

I made no formal or complete report. I did complain that it was insufficient in quantity and in such bad condition as to be almost useless.

Question. Did you not as an engineer see that the repair of that road would be nearly useless with the rolling-stock you had on hand?

Yes, sir; I did.

Question. Did you report that fact to any superior officer?

I suggested to General Buell that the repair of the road would be useless, both on that account and because, lying parallel to the enemy's supposed front, it would be vulnerable at every point and liable to constant interruption. This he seemed to appreciate fully, and said that the repairs were being made against his own wishes.

Question. Did you say that in your march from Decherd to Murfreesborough you destroyed the bridges, &c., on the Nashville and Chattanooga road; how far distant from the railroad did you march, and did you destroy all the bridges and mechanical work between Decherd and Murfreesborough?

I have stated that I destroyed three bridges, two of them being the most important, and one stockade. My line of march was generally nearly parallel with the line of railroad and from 2 to 5 miles distant from it.

Question. Did those bridges include all the mechanical work?

No, sir; they did not. There were unimportant bridges and trestle works which I did not destroy, for the reason stated in my direct testimony. There were stockades which, having been constructed of green timber, I could not burn, and had not time to destroy them in any other way. The one destroyed had been built of seasoned timber. That I burned.

Question. How far had we possession of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad at that time?

At the time I commenced the repairs, immediately after the evacuation, our forces had just commenced to advance on that line toward Decatur in sufficient numbers only to furnish the necessary protection to the working parties for the execution of that work. The road was not actually occupied by our troops. As the repairs proceeded we advanced along the line until we finally held possession from Corinth to Decatur, this possession being disputed by the rebels, who attacked the line at various points almost from day to day. On the north side of the Tennessee River I think the line was held from Decatur to Stevenson by the forces under General Mitchel.

Question. What is the military advantage of Chattanooga to the rebels?

It is a salient point in their line of communication between Atlanta and Knoxville, and is itself a very strong position, which, held by them, enables them to cover that line for a great distance. It is far more important to them than it would be to us, inasmuch as it is not upon the direct line from Atlanta to Knoxville. The road leading from Dalton to Cleveland serving the rebels as a cut-off, this road could be used by them even if Chattanooga were held by us.

Question. How far is Chattanooga from Dalton?

I do not recollect the distance.

Question. Is it 30 miles, should you think?

I should think it was as much as that.

Question. If we held Chattanooga in force would not the junction at Dalton be under our control?

Not if that junction were held by the rebels in force.

Question. Suppose we held that intersection at Dalton, what would be the possibility of getting from Georgia to Alabama by railroad?

There would be but two lines left open, one by the way of Augusta up through Raleigh; the other line, lying near the coast, running from Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington, Petersburg, &c.

Question. From what section of country did Bragg draw supplies for his army while he lay at Chattanooga before he crossed the Tennessee River?

The line south to Atlanta opens the line of communication for him to all their depots of supplies and from Atlanta southward. The road north would bring him supplies from the valley of East Tennessee. I suppose he drew his supplies mainly from those two lines and from all the region of country reached by that and other connections.

Commission adjourned to meet February 9, 1863.

CINCINNATI, February 9, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Gen. W. S. SMITH'S examination continued.

General BUELL. In looking over your record, Mr. President, I observe something in the remarks of the judge-advocate in reference to my objection to a question of his which I did not distinctly hear and certainly very much misunderstood, or I should have asked the Commission to inquire upon what ground the judge-advocate contradicted my statement in the objection alluded to. I think it proper now to call your attention to the evidence, which substantiates the statement I made in my objection. I will premise that the question of the actual strength of the rebel army is one of interest.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If we are going into a discussion it is scarcely proper to detail in the presence of one witness what has taken place in the presence of another.

Of course, and for ulterior purposes, it is one of importance also; but as far as the object of this investigation is concerned it is the apparent strength of the rebel force that we are most concerned in, as justifying the measures that were adopted by the commander of the army with reference to the movements of the rebel army. That apparent force is something which will of course vary from time to time according to the information we obtain in regard to it. With reference to that there are three points of time at which the question of the strength of the rebel army becomes one of importance to this investigation. First, about the time of the crossing of the Tennessee River and the advance into Tennessee; the next is perhaps about the time that the rebel force was at Glasgow and Munfordville; and the next is about the time of the battle of Perryville. The question of the judge-advocate had reference to the strength of the rebel army at the first period I have mentioned, and you will remember that it was with reference to the estimate that was made of the strength of Bragg's army at that time. You may remember also the question and the objection I made to it. I stated that the principal officers of the army had not testified that Bragg's force was estimated at that time at from 35,000 to 40,000. The judge-advocate, I discover, contradicted that statement very positively, and it is to that point I desire to call your attention. For my own part I may say I should be very unwilling to contradict the statement of any gentleman without being well assured I had sufficient ground for doing it. I find by referring to the record that General McCook estimated the strength of the rebel army, according to the information he had of it, at from 60,000 to 70,000; General Wood at 45,000; General Thomas estimated it at 45,000; General Negley estimated it at 50,000 or 60,000, I am not positive which. These are the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio who have given evidence upon this question. Other officers, such as Colonel Shoemaker, General Steedman, and General Fry, estimated it from 30,000 to 36,000. These are not the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio, either by their rank or by the command which they exercised or the opportunities they had for obtaining information. I simply submit this statement of facts, which I certainly should have submitted at the time had I understood the remarks of the judge-advocate as they now appear upon the record.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not know how my remarks appear on the record, as they were not read to me after they were delivered. The question in discussion I apprehend was a supposition made for the purpose of testing the accuracy of General Smith's estimate, and which was totally defeated by the interference of General Buell. The discussion that arose upon that point was simply as to the propriety of informing a witness of what had been sworn to by a previous witness, and which I had abstained from doing. Nor do I propose now discussing what was the actual strength, or the estimate at the time made by officers of the Army of the Ohio, of the force under Bragg at the time of crossing the Tennessee River, or indeed at any other time. It is all a matter of evidence, and the record is under the inspection of the Commission. The discussion we had at the time was as to the course pursued by General Buell, which I held to be improper. As to what the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio may have testified, my impression is that with the exception of General McCook and General Negley the weight of testimony of the principal officers was that the rebel army was estimated at from 35,000 to 40,000. But this is simply a matter of fact within the province of the Commission. It was only in reference to the conduct of General Buell that I made the remarks that I did.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate still persists in the contradiction, notwithstanding I have stated to you that the evidence is so and so. It is a matter very easy for you to determine. I simply inform you that I obtain these facts from the record. It is not a matter of opinion and not a debatable point.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I thought it was improper and think so still, and shall continue to do so, to tell a witness what has been sworn to previously.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate committed that error himself when he virtually stated that the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio had testified so and so. I shall not interfere with the performance of the duty of the judge-advocate when he performs it legitimately and properly. He is represented as denying my statement, and it is to that point that I now address my remarks. It is not with reference to the strength of the rebel army, but merely to call attention to the contradiction made to my statement at the time, and for which, if my statement on record is correct, there was no sort of justification or excuse.

The PRESIDENT. I must be allowed to say that in my opinion it is a point that will have to be settled by the Commission from the testimony. There is considerable contradiction on the part of witnesses, and whenever there may be contradiction on the part of witnesses as to the strength of the rebel army the question must remain to be settled, and it is to that extent debatable.

General TYLER. I understood that the judge-advocate put a certain question, "Supposing so and so to be the case, would you put your opinions against the other officers whose means of obtaining information were as good as yours?" and the judge-advocate says, "My question is lost by General Buell saying there had been no such testimony before the Commission." The proper course would have been for General Buell to have objected to the question, and then had the court cleared to decide whether the question should be put or not.

General BUELL. It is very possible that I might, in my want of practical experience in proceedings of this kind, have overstepped the strict rules of such investigations; but that is not the question, nor is it the question as to what was actually the strength of Bragg's army at that particular time. The point is this: I stated that the principal officers of the Army of the Ohio had not testified that the strength of Bragg's army was from 35,000 to 40,000; it is the judge-advocate's flat contradiction of that statement that I object to, and that is the point I make now; and in answer to his contradiction I simply state to you what the record shows. I do not pretend to sum up and strike the balance between the evidence of the principal and subordinate officers of the army for your guidance. I simply show the evidence that substantiates the statement, which statement the judge-advocate contradicted. I am not considering the strength of the rebel army as you may decide. So far from understanding the judge-advocate to have contradicted my statement, I understood him to have admitted it; otherwise I should not have allowed those remarks to pass without calling your attention to them, because I am not in the habit of making statements that can be contradicted truthfully; I may do so accidentally.

By General BUELL:

Question. Do you know why the brigade which preceded you to Bowling Green was ordered to that point?

I do not know positively, but supposed that it was ordered there to strengthen the garrison of that place, in anticipation of a movement of the rebel forces in that direction.

Question. Do you understand it to have been independent of a movement of the Army of the Ohio toward Kentucky and was it considerably in advance of that movement?

It was considerably in advance of that movement, and I supposed it to be part of the distribution of that army, with a view to meeting the rebel force that was then understood to be advancing northward; but at that time I had no knowledge of any intended movement of the Army of the Ohio into Kentucky; I supposed its movements to be entirely controlled by those of the enemy.

Question. Were your instructions to you orally or in writing?

They were given to me orally, except the order to proceed to Bowling Green and there assume command.

Question. How long did the troops which were ordered to that point precede you?

I think four or five days, but am not sure.

Question. Is it proper to say that the Army of the Ohio remained at Bowling Green from the time of the arrival of this detachment for this special service up to the time of the departure of the army from that point in its advance toward Glasgow or Munfordville?

I should think not.

Question. What was the estimated strength of the rebel force at Corinth about the time of the evacuation of that point?

I should think an average of the estimates I heard to be about 100,000.

Question. What is supposed to have been the distribution of that force after its abandonment of Corinth?

I have very limited means of information on that point. I heard that the main body retreated southward, and that a portion of it was thrown, by rail most of the way, into the vicinity of Chattanooga, and thought there would be a race between the two armies for that point.

Question. Of what detached armies or large bodies of troops that have been generally recognized as taking part in the military operations of the rebels was that army composed?

I do not know that I could mention them all. The army that retreated before us from Shiloh, commanded first by Sidney Johnston and then by Beauregard, constituted one portion of it, and I understood the armies of Price and Van Dorn were present at Corinth. It was also understood that Bragg's force had arrived from Mobile.

Question. Can you name the principal commanders belonging to that consolidated force that had previously exercised independent commands?

Price, Van Dorn, Bragg, Polk, Beauregard, who commanded that army proper, and was then understood to be in command of the whole force. There might have been others, but those names were most frequently mentioned in the information that we received from within the rebel lines.

Question. Do you consider that the presence of certain high commanders would generally indicate the organization of any particular army; that is, would it generally indicate that the force to which they have habitually belonged will form part of that particular army?

I think their presence would indicate the presence also of commands appropriate to their rank. Whether the particular commands to which they have been attached previously would be supposed to be present I think would depend upon the relative positions of the consolidated army and their independent commands. If the independent commands were very distant, it is hardly to be presumed that they would form a part of the concentration, though they might.

Question. Suppose, in the distribution of a large force like that which the rebels had at Corinth, you should find in the several detachments general officers belonging to that force, would you usually expect to find in the detachments the commands to which they had been attached in the consolidated army?

I would.

Question. Do you know what part of that force remained in front of Corinth after other parts of it had been sent to other quarters?

I do not. I only know that the names of Price and Van Dorn were mentioned in connection with that force constantly for some time after the evacuation.

Question. Is it generally understood that the force that remained under Price and Van Dorn was identically the same as that they brought there, with the exception of re-enforcements of new regiments and conscripts; and have you ever heard of any officers or any body of troops belonging to that force which had previously belonged to the other principal armies or bodies of troops with which the rebels were operating?

I do not know what the understanding was with regard to that force. I was so situated as not to be brought into contact with the information that may have reached the headquarters of my superiors. All the information I had was derived from conversations with officers who were passing from Corinth along the line of railway on which I was occupied and from newspapers.

Question. Can you recognize in the organization of the rebel force that invaded Kentucky last summer the general officers that belonged to the army of Sidney Johnston, the army that occupied Columbus and West Tennessee, the force that came from Pensacola and Mobile, and the force that occupied East Tennessee?

I can most of them, as far as they were known to me.

Question. Can you mention any officer that belonged to either of those several commands that was to be found in any other command about the time of the invasion of Kentucky by Bragg?

Hindman is the only one I can think of. I supposed he was beyond the Mississippi. He had had command in Sidney Johnston's army, a brigade or division—I do not know.

Question. Was he in the consolidated army at Corinth, do you know?

I do not know. I know he was present at Shiloh; at least I was told so by the rebel prisoners.

Question. Do you know whether he was supposed to have taken any portion of the force from the consolidated army when he went to Arkansas; and, if so, what portion of it?

I do not know, sir, whether the supposition was that he took a force from the east or the west side of the Mississippi, or whether he was supposed to have raised a new force in Arkansas.

Question. Do you know what force he is supposed to have had since, according to the best information?

I have heard his force estimated at 15,000 men.

Question. What, according to the best information, is the force that Price and Van Dorn are supposed to have had after the evacuation of Corinth and the distribution of the consolidated force that was there?

I have heard their force estimated at from 30,000 to 40,000. I have no very reliable means of judging. This estimate, I think, was made subsequent to the time at which it was understood that Lovell's force had arrived to re-enforce them. I understood that Price and Van Dorn left Corinth each in command of a division.

Question. Where was the rebel army at the time of the distribution of the consolidated army of the Government [?] of Corinth?

I supposed it to be undergoing redistribution as well as our own; a portion of it retreated south and a portion of it being thrown around toward Chattanooga and perhaps a portion thrown over to the Mississippi and possibly beyond it.

Question. Supposing in this distribution of the opposing armies that the portion which went from each in the direction of East Tennessee had undertaken to proceed by land marches to their destination; supposing Chattanooga to be that point, how much farther would the rebel fraction have had to march to reach its destination than the fraction of the Government army?

The difference of distance would have been very greatly in our favor, but just what the difference would have been I cannot say; but I suppose any practicable line of march for the rebels from Corinth to Chattanooga to be from 150 to 200 miles longer than the direct line which was in our possession. The difference may be even greater than that.

Question. Do you know that the rebel army could have marched across from Okalona or Tupelo, or any point near there, to Chattanooga by a direct line?

I do not know that there was any direct line practicable for the march of a large army from either of the points named to Chattanooga, and if there should be a line, from Corinth to Chattanooga would still be very much shorter than the one by Okalona or Tupelo to Chattanooga.

Question. Was the rebel army supposed to be at Tupelo or in that vicinity when the Army of the Ohio was ordered from Corinth into North Alabama and in the direction of Chattanooga?

I do not know that it was understood to be there. Our forces, I understood, had advanced to a short distance, say 15 or 20 miles, from Corinth southward when I left Corinth to repair the railroad from that point to Decatur.

Question. I beg you to refer to the map, general, and verify your information in regard to the distance from Tupelo to Chattanooga and from Corinth to Chattanooga.

The difference in distance from Corinth to Chattanooga and from Okalona to Chattanooga on air lines, according to the map, is about 30 miles; the distance from Corinth to Okalona according to the same map, is about 60 miles; this added to the difference would make the distance to Chattanooga by way of Okalona greater than the direct line from Corinth to Chattanooga by 90 miles.

Question. Is it a fact that part of the rebel army actually marched from Okalona by way of Tuscaloosa and Elyton to Chattanooga after the distribution of the rebel force in front of Corinth?

I do not know.

Question. How long do you suppose it would take to prepare ferry-boats or bridges, whichever would be most expeditious, and cross the Army of the Ohio, as it marched from Corinth, over the Tennessee River twice, first between Corinth and Decatur and again at some point east of Huntsville, in order to reach Chattanooga?

I should say that each crossing would require three weeks.

Question. Can you state the time that was actually employed in preparing boats and crossing a portion of the army at Florence?

I cannot state the precise time, but I think it required from ten days to two weeks to cross McCook's and Crittenden's divisions after the arrival of the steamboats and barges that were used for that purpose.

Question. Did Nelson's division also cross at that time and place?

I believe it did, and I should have included that in the estimate of time given in the previous answer.

Question. Had the rebels opened communication by the railroad between Tupelo and Chattanooga at that time?

We had various accounts on that point, some to the effect that the railroad communications between those points was completed; others that it was not quite finished, but that there was a gap of a few miles.

Question. Do you refer now to the railroad from Meridian to Montgomery?

I do. There was, of course, railroad communication by way of Mobile before the completion of the road from Meridian to Montgomery.

Question. You say you know nothing of the wagon road from Okalona to Chattanooga through Tuscaloosa and Elyton?

THE JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It is with reluctance, Mr. President, that I rise to object to this mode of examination. A very wide latitude has been given the defense, but it seems to increase every day. Here is a witness who has been examined in chief, cross-examined by the judge-advocate, examined at length by the Commission, and then taken up again by General Buell upon new matter entirely. The way the investigation is proceeding we shall never come to a termination. I shall object to any mode of proceeding which is not legal and proper before a tribunal of this character.

General BUELL. I desire to say that this is a very singular time to commence the application of strict rules to an investigation of this kind. I desire also to say that I am not questioning the witness upon new matter at all, but with reference to matter which was introduced in the cross-examination; that is, with reference to the rapid movements of the Army of the Ohio from Corinth to Chattanooga. That is all I desire to say in reference to the objection of the judge-advocate.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The latitude that has been allowed has been for the benefit of General Buell. I never asked it for myself, and as far as I am aware have never exercised it. I have permitted General Buell to proceed in his own way, but I think the proceedings should be as brief as possible, for the purpose of carrying on the investigation without unnecessary delay. With regard to this new matter introduced by General Buell, I remember nothing that was brought out in the cross-examination that would justify this part of it. I may be mistaken about it, and if I am General Buell has a right to go on.

General BUELL. Perhaps. I can save the Commission the trouble of an examination of the record by calling their attention to the questions put by General Tyler, or by General Schoepf with reference to a rapid movement of the Army of the Ohio upon Chattanooga from Corinth. The object of that examination is to compare the relative facilities of the two armies for such a movement upon that point.

General SCHOEPF. I desire, Mr. President, in order that this examination may be conducted more intelligently, that General Buell be asked for the orders he received from General Halleck. I have asked for that letter several times and have not been able to get it, and I think the Commission should order General Buell to produce the letter or orders of General Halleck.

The PRESIDENT. I have not heard, for my part, that there is any such letter in existence.

General DANA. The record shows that if there is such a letter the judge-advocate be instructed to produce it in court. I suppose it could be got from Washington.

General BUELL. In order that I may not appear in the light of withholding anything from the Commission I will state here that my impression is that General Halleck's instructions to me in the first place were oral. I remember, however, one dispatch which had reference to the route which he deemed it best that I should pursue. As far as I am concerned I would just as lief present any instructions I have from General Halleck now as at any other time, though I had designed to bring them in with my documentary evidence, and if such instructions are not found upon the books that I have submitted to the Commission I do not believe that they can be found.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Will you let us have all the books you have?

General BUELL. I have given them to you.

The PRESIDENT. No reference has been made, so far as I know, to any letter from General Halleck to General Buell.

General SCHOEPF. Here is a letter (referring to General Buell's letter-book) showing just the contrary, and I would like the letter of General Halleck to be produced.

General BUELL. I did not understand that the remarks of General Schoepf were with reference to instructions as to repairing the railroad. I thought they had reference to the instructions on which I moved from Corinth to East Tennessee. The dispatches are recorded in the books that are here under your inspection.

Commission adjourned to meet February 10, 1863.

CINCINNATI, February 10, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General W. S. SMITH'S examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. With the amount of rolling stock the rebels are understood to have on all their railroad communications how long ought it to take to transfer 25,000 men from Tupelo to Chattanooga?

I should think it would have taken from ten days to two weeks.

Question. Is the possession of East Tennessee and the line of railroad running through from Virginia to Georgia admitted to be of very great importance to the rebel authorities?

I think that it is.

Question. Considering the importance of that possession to them, and the superior facilities they possessed for transferring troops from the vicinity of Corinth to Chattanooga and other points in East Tennessee, what reasonable probability was there of being able to march the United States forces from Corinth to Chattanooga before such a movement would be anticipated and guarded against by all the means they could use for that purpose?

Without a more accurate knowledge than I possess of their facilities for rapid movement of troops, and also the necessities that existed for the presence of their forces at other points, it would be exceedingly difficult for me to say just what such a probability would be. I think, however, the advantages in the race for any point on that line of communication between the rebel forces and the Government forces would have been decidedly in favor of the rebels; and considering the immense importance of that line of communication to them, I think it is but reasonable to suppose that they would have exerted themselves to the utmost to have thrown upon it the forces necessary for its protection.

Question. Are you aware that General Thomas' division did not arrive in North Alabama from Corinth until the last of July?

I do not know at what time it arrived there.

Question. Did you know that that division was considerably in rear of the rest of the Army of the Ohio that marched from Corinth?

I was advised of it, but do not know.

Question. In speaking of the strength of the Army of the Ohio in Middle Tennessee and North Alabama and setting it at 50,000, did you mean to give that only as an approximate estimate founded on your opinion or as an accurate statement?

I think it was a very near approximation, but I did not give it as an accurate statement. It was based upon what I supposed to be the average strength of the several divisions composing it.

Question. In the cross-examination by the court this question was put to you by General Schoepf: "Suppose General Buell had marched his army directly to and occupied Chattanooga and Knoxville, with Cumberland Gap in our possession and East Tennessee loyal to the Union, what would have been the strategic and moral effect?" Your answer to that question is: "The occupancy of those positions by our troops would have been an advantage scarcely to be estimated." In that answer do you mean to express an opinion as to the practicability of doing that thing any more than though Richmond and Gordonsville had been substituted for Chattanooga and Knoxville, Washington for Cumberland Gap, and Virginia for East Tennessee?

I did not mean to express any opinion as to the practicability of taking possession of the points named. A supposed case was presented. I simply took the hypothesis as granted, and answered, as I was asked, what the strategic and moral effect would have been in my opinion.

Question. In the examination by the court you expressed the opinion that Chattanooga could be held by 25,000 against 50,000. You also expressed the opinion that 25,000 men would be sufficient to defend Nashville, which, supposing the force in Middle Tennessee to be 50,000, would leave 25,000 for other service. What force now do you suppose would be sufficient to hold Chattanooga against those 25,000, supposing them to have been directed against that point?

I think 12,000 men could resist and prevent the crossing of 25,000 over the Tennessee River at any point in the vicinity of Chattanooga, and if Chattanooga itself were intrenched with reference to a defense of the place by 10,000 men they could hold it against an attack of 25,000.

Question. In the examination by the court this question was put by General Schoepf: "You stated in your reply that you could have held Chattanooga with 25,000 men; would not the remaining 25,000 have been sufficient to defend Nashville?" and you answered, "Supposing General Grant's army to occupy the positions then held by it and the position already named taken by the troops of the Army of the Ohio, Nashville would have been in a very retired position and I think safe without any considerable garrison. The remainder of the troops of the Army of the Ohio would have been more than sufficient for that purpose." In your answer did you mean to be understood as expressing the opinion that 25,000 men would be sufficient to occupy and hold East Tennessee and the railroad communication between Georgia and Virginia to East Tennessee?

I did not mean to express the opinion that 25,000 men would have been sufficient, on the supposition made, to hold Chattanooga and the line of communication through

East Tennessee. I meant simply to express the opinion that 25,000 men might have held Chattanooga against a force equal to the estimated strength of the Army of the Ohio, the other positions named being securely held by a sufficient force of Union troops. In the word "remainder," contained in the answer to question, I referred to the number 25,000 stated in the question as being more than sufficient to garrison Nashville under the circumstances presented.

Question. Are we then to understand your answer in this way: that Chattanooga and other points in East Tennessee and on the line of railroad through East Tennessee held by a sufficient force—whatever that might be—and General Grant occupying the position which he held, then 25,000 would be sufficient to make Nashville and other points in the rear of the army secure?

The idea I intended to convey was that the line from Memphis to Decatur being held by General Grant's army after the march of the Army of the Ohio to the north side of the Tennessee River and Chattanooga and the other points mentioned in East Tennessee being held by a sufficient force of Union troops 25,000 men would have been more than sufficient for the garrison of Nashville. I did not refer to the detachments that might have been necessary for guarding the various lines of communication to the rear of the line occupied by our troops.

Question. While you were stationed at Decherd and other points on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad were you exercising an independent command?

I had been placed in command of all the troops stationed to guard that line; likewise the line from Stevenson to Decatur and Decatur to Nashville.

Question. Would this independent command have made it more your duty and have afforded you greater facilities to obtain information of the strength of the enemy than a colonel commanding a regiment or a brigadier-general commanding a brigade under the command of a senior?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I desire, Mr. President, to call your attention to this mode of examination as being very objectionable. A leading question is asked by General Buell that I did not object to at all, "Had you an independent command?" and General Smith answers it in such a manner as to leave us in doubt whether his was an independent command or not. General Buell assumes it was an independent command, and then proceeds with the examination. It is very easy for an intelligent witness like General Smith to give a direct answer—yes or no.

General BUELL. I was satisfied, because I thought the explanation of his command implied its independence. I wish him to be as definite as possible, and I will thank the witness to make it more definite if he can.

It was an independent command.

By General BUELL:

Question. It will be permissible now, I suppose, for the witness to answer the last question.

It would, unless such colonel or brigadier-general should be thrown to the front and so detached, in which case his facilities might have been as great as my own for procuring information such as that referred to.

Question. Suppose when the army concentrated at Murfreesborough the rebel army had thrown itself down upon the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, would that railroad, in working order, have been of advantage to the rebel force?

It would, the moment they could either transfer the rolling stock from the other side of the river or build any temporary crossing over the river, which would have enabled them to run through from Chattanooga; otherwise it would not have been used by them, as we were careful to move the rolling stock that was in our possession from that portion of the road.

Question. Did the rebels actually repair that road subsequent to the withdrawal of the Army of the Ohio from it?

They did. I was informed by scouts sent through Murfreesborough and in that vicinity that trains were constantly running through from Bridgeport to Murfreesborough. Deserters from the rebel army also gave me the same information, and stated that a bridge of some kind had been built over the Tennessee River, over which they were crossing their trains.

Question. Is it or is it not a notorious fact that that road was used by the rebels while they were at Murfreesborough?

It is.

General SCHOEPP. Suppose General Morgan at Cumberland Gap had been ordered to destroy the railroad, and had done so as effectively as General Carter did, do you think that under those circumstances the rebels would have anticipated General Buell's army at Chattanooga from Richmond?

I do not know the extent of the damages done to that railroad line by General Carter. If but a single bridge were destroyed, or if two or more bridges within a short distance from each other were destroyed, and a practicable country road connecting the two extremes of the road were perfect, the detention would not have been serious if the rebels had rolling stock abundant on both sides of the break. The detention depending so much upon these circumstances, it would be impossible for me to say what the probabilities in the case presented would have been.

General BUELL. If it is not too late I would object to that question, for the purpose of avoiding a protraction of your investigation. It amounts in reality to the introduction of new matter, upon which, I suppose, beyond all doubt, I should be privileged to cross-examine again, whether it is introduced by the judge-advocate or any member of the Commission. The practicability of destroying this road by the force at Cumberland Gap would depend upon what rebel force was opposed to it in East Tennessee, and it would be necessary to elucidate that question in order that you may understand the matter well.

General SCHOEPP. The privilege was given yesterday to General Buell to cross-examine General Smith as much as he pleased. I do not consider that it is introducing new matter. No military man would consider that the occupation of Chattanooga and Knoxville would have left the railroad uninjured.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. By the rules governing a tribunal of this sort the court has a right to ask any question it may see fit, and such questions do not form grounds for cross-examination either for the Government or defense. That, I believe, is the rule, whether it be enforced by the Commission or not. But General Buell is under a misapprehension in supposing that any question put by a member of the Commission would form any ground for cross-examination.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate is right as far as concerns questions that have for their object to throw additional light upon matter that has been the subject of investigation either by the prosecution or defense, but he is not right where entirely new matter is introduced the object or tendency of which is to fix responsibility or blame upon the party who is virtually upon his defense before the Commission or before any other tribunal.

General SCHOEPP. There is no new matter introduced.

General BUELL. It is new matter distinctly. It distinctly proposes a new operation, which has not been the subject of investigation before the Commission, and depends upon the conditions I have explained to you. The question assumes that there was nothing for the force at Cumberland Gap to do but to move down to the railroad and destroy it. That depends upon the force that was opposed to it.

General DANA. I wish emphatically to deny the right of the court to introduce new matter (after the examination-in-chief). I wish to make the assertion that the court has no right to question on any new matter and at the same time to shut off the judge-advocate or the other party interested before the court from cross-questioning on such new matter.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would suggest to General Dana that the court cannot put itself in antagonism to the defense, and it is supposed that all the questions it asks is for the purpose of enlightening itself; that is all. The word "cross-examination" is a term that places it in the position of being a prosecutor and against the defense. It is not supposed that a question would be asked introducing entirely new matter without that question having been written out and handed to the prosecutor, so as to give the defense an opportunity to examine upon it. If the rule is strictly followed it is simply this: that the court or commission has a right at any stage of the proceedings to ask any question it may see fit for the purpose of enlightening itself, and that does not form the ground for cross-examination.

General BUELL. I should like to say, with reference to the remarks of the judge-advocate, Mr. President, that he is right in assuming that the position of any member of this Commission or any other court implies impartiality; but the position does not screen a member of this Commission or any other court from the responsibility or fact of assuming the function of a prosecutor. If he pursues a course by his examination which is virtually a prosecution he is a prosecutor. The matter, whatever it may be, is something that the defendant has a right to defend himself against, whether it be introduced by the judge-advocate or any other accuser. The question which General Schoepf has put, as I have stated before, distinctly introduces new matter. The tendency of it is to throw blame on some person who had control of the forces at Cumberland Gap, and I am that person, for not doing a certain thing. That will involve the propriety and the right to explain why that certain thing was not done, and from that will flow the further investigation which I have intimated.

General SCHOEPF. We are not here to pronounce sentence upon General Buell. It is not a prosecution. It is for the purpose of investigating the facts connected with the Army of the Ohio in its Kentucky and Tennessee campaign, and all the facts we can educe we are bound to obtain in justice to General Buell as well as to the Commission. It is no prosecution.

The PRESIDENT. I understand the question is withdrawn.

General SCHOEPF. The question is answered.

The PRESIDENT. Do you (General Schoepf) withdraw your question?

General SCHOEPF. It is no use.

The PRESIDENT. I do not understand that under the rule adopted any member of this Commission by asking a question, whether based upon the examination-in-chief or upon the cross-examination, puts himself in the attitude of an accuser, and for the reason, as I understand, that we are not engaged in the investigation of any specific charges against any officer of the Army, but in the investigation of certain general operations of the army in the Kentucky and Tennessee campaign. That investigation is a duty imposed upon us by order of the President, and if the judge-advocate or General Buell should omit to ask a question in their examination proper or in the cross-examination touching any point that any member of this Commission should feel it his duty to inquire into, I think that is a question asked by him simply in the line of his duty, no more and no less, and that he has a right to ask such question at any time in this examination. If I should see fit and proper to ask a question on a subject not referred to by the judge-advocate or General Buell, I hold that I do not put myself by so doing in the attitude of an accuser; by no means.

General BUELL. I wish to be distinctly understood as not denying the right of any member of the Commission to cross-examination. I wish to be distinctly understood as not meaning to charge that the exercise of this right by any member of this commission, which is undoubted, puts him in the attitude of an accuser or anything of the sort. It is perfectly in accordance with the rules practiced in courts-martial or courts of inquiry, and I do not deny it at all. It is simply the manner or matter of investigation which determines whether it is in the nature of a prosecution or accusation, and whether the questioner puts himself in the attitude of an accuser or prosecutor.

General SCHOEPP. That statement is not in accordance with General Buell's practice. He stated that a member of the Commission had placed himself in the attitude of an accuser and now he states directly the opposite.

The court being cleared, the Commission decided that General Buell's objection be sustained and that the objection to the question was not too late.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You stated in your testimony that after the battle of Corinth a portion of the enemy's army was sent by rail to the vicinity of Chattanooga. Please state by what railroad and how you came by this information.

I stated that it was supposed that a portion of the rebel force had been so moved, the supposition being that they went by way of Mobile; that a portion of them were also marched across the gap, if any existed, in the road from Meridian to Selma (I think that is the name of the other terminus), and were transported around from that point to Chattanooga. Those reports I got from officers with whom I conversed. I had no other sources of information.

Question. What officers were these?

I talked frequently with Colonel Fry, chief of staff to General Buell, and with a great many officers of the Army of the Ohio whom I met from day to day.

Question. Has not your experience in the army since this war began taught you that, taking the best information that you could obtain as to the enemy's force, you had to make an allowance of a very heavy percentage as to their number?

It has; and such an allowance I have made in all the estimates I have given of the enemy's supposed strength.

Question. What were your means of obtaining information when you had an independent command?

I had the reports made to me by scouts that I sent as far to the front as possible; I also heard the reports of scouts made to General Buell at his headquarters while I was in camp near him at Decherd. I also received information from refugees that were constantly arriving from within rebel lines.

Question. State, as nearly as your memory will permit, the names of such scouts and refugees as gave you information upon which you relied.

There was Mr. Flemming, whom I employed frequently as a scout, and now a captain in the First Tennessee Cavalry. There was also an old man who lived in Wartrace, whose name I do not remember, and who rendered very valuable service to me as a scout. I have not treasured the names of several other scouts who served me or of the refugees who arrived. I could, however, ascertain by reference to the account of what I paid them for their services.

Question. Have you any written reports or memoranda made at that time—made by those scouts and refugees?

I think I have among my papers copies of dispatches that I sent to General Buell embodying the information that I received before his arrival at Decherd and also while I was in command at Manchester.

Question. Am I to understand from your statement with reference to the force being sent from Corinth that up to the evacuation of Corinth Chattanooga had been left undefended by the rebels?

I do not suppose that it had been left entirely so, but suppose that it was held by but a small force of the enemy.

Question. With Chattanooga naturally so strong that 25,000 men could hold it against 50,000 men and the rebels at Richmond in distress for lack of troops which place would your better judgment dictate the troops went to from Corinth?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President, because I think it opens a wide latitude to the investigation.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I withdraw the question.

General BUELL. It assumes certain conditions that might be answered very well, but it is impossible for the witness to know that there was greater necessity for the troops at Chattanooga than at Richmond.

By General TYLER:

Question. You said you could move 25,000 men from Tupelo to Chattanooga in ten days or two weeks. By what railroad route could they have been moved?

A portion of them I should have moved by way of Tupelo to Mobile and from Mobile up the road to Atlanta and from Atlanta to Chattanooga, and a portion I should have moved across from Meridian to Selma, marching across any gap that might have existed in the railroad line between those two points, which was understood to be very inconsiderable if there was any at all, and from Selma on to Chattanooga by railroad, which intersects the same road as the one leading from Mobile up to Atlanta. I know that railroad connection exists between Selma and Chattanooga.

Question. What is the distance from Tupelo to Chattanooga by way of Mobile, Montgomery, and Atlanta?

I should think from 700 to 800 miles.

General BUELL. I request that the general may refer to the maps.

General TYLER. It is 714 by the railroad map. The general is right. You mean, of course, 25,000 men, with their artillery, baggage, provisions, and including the baggage train?

I would not include a baggage train.

By General TYLER:

Question. Would you consider an army in the field efficient without a baggage train?

That would depend upon the extent of its field of operations. In the case supposed I would consider it perfectly efficient for the garrisoning of Chattanooga without its baggage train and for any operations in that immediate vicinity.

Question. To move this army in two weeks would be about 2,000 men a day. How many cars and engines would you require to move 2,000 men, with their baggage, &c., in a single day?

I would require from 60 to 80 cars and from 8 to 12 engines.

Question. And with that amount of rolling stock you would require every day for ten days to two weeks to move an army of 25,000 men?

I would require double that amount of rolling stock—perhaps treble—to keep trains running simultaneously.

Question. How many cars and engines do you estimate would be needed to take 25,000 men over a line of 700 to 800 miles in length?

Allowing for all accidents and contingencies, I estimate that each train would make two trips within the time stated. The trains necessary to transport half the number would consist of about 360 cars and from 16 to 20 engines, and that rolling stock could be passed over the round trip twice. I should deem that sufficient for the entire work. The estimate that I made in my first answer was upon a different basis from this. I find that upon further consideration of the subject, making the estimate as I have in my last answer, it would require more rolling stock—more than double or treble the amount named in the answer to the previous question.

Question. Taking baggage, men, artillery, and the necessary forage and provisions, how many men on the average would you apportion to each car?

I would make my average about 30.

Question. Have you ever seen any trains with troops, carrying the necessary provisions, baggage, horses, &c., with 20 men to a car?

I have frequently moved troops that would average 60, 70, and even 80 men, with their baggage, to each car—loading them inside and outside. I think 30 to a car a very low and perfectly safe estimate.

Question. Have you ever seen men moved 800 miles with 60 to 80 men in a car?

I have not seen troops moved that distance with that number to a car.

Commission adjourned to meet February 11, 1863.

CINCINNATI, February 11, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General W. S. SMITH'S examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Do you perceive any similitude between the circumstances of the occupation of Cumberland Gap by General Morgan's forces, previous to its withdrawal from that point in the months of June and July last, and the recent expedition of General Carter against the East Tennessee Railroad?

I do not. The mere occupation of a position could scarcely resemble in any respect an expedition of a force that should make a march of some hundreds of miles.

Question. Do you know anything about the particulars of Carter's expedition except what you have derived from his official report and the newspaper accounts?

I do not.

Question. According to those sources of information about what force was there in the range of his expedition to oppose the expedition of General Carter?

I have not even an approximate idea of that force. The understanding that I have gained in the accounts of the expedition I have read is that General Carter encountered but little resistance and met with but few rebel troops.

Question. Was the force which invaded Kentucky under Kirby Smith virtually the same as that which occupied East Tennessee and was opposed to our troops at Cumberland Gap last summer ?

I have always supposed that the troops that Kirby Smith brought into Kentucky with him constituted a portion of the command that had been in front of General Morgan at Cumberland Gap, but supposed that other troops were still left there after Kirby Smith's departure on his Kentucky expedition.

Question. Do you know, in general terms, about the relative strength of that force and the force which occupied Cumberland Gap under General Morgan ?

I have always estimated General Morgan's command at Cumberland Gap at about 10,000 men. I supposed that East Tennessee was held by about 20,000 rebel troops, and about 15,000 of that force I supposed Kirby Smith brought with him into Kentucky.

Question. Have you given any evidence before this Commission which implies that the security of the rebels' hold upon East Tennessee against any advance of the Army of the Ohio would have depended upon reinforcements from Richmond ?

I have not intended to convey any such idea. I do not believe that they were dependent on re-enforcements from Richmond at any time to hold East Tennessee.

General BUELL. I desire to ask the judge-advocate whether the additional testimony he proposes to introduce is to be confined to rebutting the evidence I introduced or to strengthening the evidence that he has introduced in the prosecution ? I conceive there is a decided difference.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The Government having rested in this investigation, the evidence introduced on the part of the judge-advocate can be only of a rebutting character. What the effect of that may be I do not pretend to say ; it may strengthen my case or it may not ; but it is purely within the rule of the law governing evidence introduced in that way.

General BUELL. I now inquire of the judge-advocate what information he has of the various witnesses that have been summoned from different places to appear before this Commission on the part of the defense ? I remember Captain Merrill and Lieutenant Sheridan, of the signal corps, who are now in the Army of the Cumberland ; Major Cotter, of some Ohio regiment, who is also with that army ; Captain Bingham, assistant quartermaster, who is also with that army ; Colonel Ralston, a citizen of Tennessee ; Mr. Carter and Mr. Smith, who are also citizens of Tennessee. There may be others whose names I do not remember at this time.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I had a dispatch from General Rosecrans, informing me that those gentlemen connected with the signal corps could not be spared from the active operations of the army, and suggesting that queries be put to them in writing, to be asked under oath, by the judge-advocate of the army, Major Skinner, which I submitted to General Buell yesterday, and I understood that that course could be pursued in reference to them. It is the first information I received in response to my summons for those gentlemen to appear before the Commission. This morning I received the following communication :

CAMP NEAR LA VERGNE, December 28, 1862—9 p. m.

(Post-marked Nashville, December 30, and signed by the late Colonel Garesché.)

MAJOR: We have just returned from a ride to the front and found your letter enclosing the summons for Lieutenant-Colonel Wood and Major Cotter. I laid it before the general for his orders, but he says he cannot spare either of them at this time. He regrets to disappoint the Commission, but deems it his duty to retain these officers with their command.

JULIUS P. GARESCHÉ.

Captain Bingham was summoned at the same time Captain Macfeely was, but seems to have paid no attention to the summons. Colonel Ralston was summoned at Nashville to appear before the Commission at Nashville, and when the Commission adjourned to Louisville received an order to accompany the Commission, which I reiterated at Bowling Green, to none of which he paid any attention or indeed made any response in any shape. Mr. Carter and Mr. Smith, citizens of Tennessee were not found.

General BUELL. Is Captain Jones expected to appear here?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I submitted his report to the Commission, and supposed from that that his written report would be as clear as his oral evidence would be. If you wish him to appear he shall be summoned.

General BUELL. I wish him to appear. I should like to know whether the judge-advocate took any measure to secure the attendance of Mr. Miller.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir; I did not.

General BUELL. Was he at Nashville at the time the Commission was there?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir; I issued a summons for him to appear while we were at Nashville.

General BUELL. I have seen a letter purporting to have been written by the father of Major-General McCook. I do not know but that I may desire to bring forward some testimony with reference to that letter, Mr. President. I have not determined about it. I noticed in yesterday's papers that Colonel Lytle, who is spoken of in that letter, is about to start this morning.

The PRESIDENT. He left this morning.

General BUELL. I should like to have him summoned.

(The judge-advocate directs that Colonel Lytle be summoned.)

General TYLER. The judge-advocate is the proper person to close this investigation. We have no right to say when it shall close, unless we take upon ourselves the duty of prosecuting; and as far as I am concerned I am not going to take that responsibility.

The PRESIDENT. After the conversation that took place yesterday before the Commission I am of opinion that General Buell might consider any such interference at this time, after the notice we have given him, as a manifestation of the spirit of a prosecutor.

General DANA. I objected to it all the time.

The PRESIDENT. For my part I think we have a duty to perform, and on the other hand the judge-advocate has his duty to perform. We look for him to summon all witnesses and to conduct the examination; that is a part of his business; but if he tells us he will have a witness before us, it is for him to judge as to what time it would be most proper to have that witness introduced. If he desires to have General Wright, it is a duty we owe to the judge-advocate to allow him to use his own judgment in this matter, inasmuch as General Wright is his witness.

General DANA. Supposing we want General Wright on new matter.

General BUELL. I repeat my wish that the judge-advocate should proceed with the testimony, either oral or documentary. The inconvenience to the public service in delaying the Commission and the injury to myself which results from this sort of proceeding in the mixing up of witnesses on different sides is apparent to me, if not to the Commission. A good deal of matter in the course of subsequent examination of witnesses by the judge-advocate has appeared which I should have desired to explain or elucidate by witnesses which I have been required to call up in the intervals between these witnesses. I can hardly undertake to do that now; it would perhaps take as much time as you have occupied in the whole investigation. It therefore works injuriously to me and perhaps more so to the public interest.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have said before that the Government rests where we are. I have no other evidence to introduce and no new matter to bring before the Commission. So far as documentary evidence is concerned, I have laid it before the Commission as far as I have it. I wish all the books of the Department of the Ohio to be brought before the Commission. There is scarcely a telegram or a letter but has some bearing upon the case. I have some 80 to 100 pages copied for the purpose of throwing light upon the campaign of Kentucky and Tennessee, and as soon as possible will proceed to arrange them to be read before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. As we are required to make up our opinion as to what is evidence before the court, it might be contended, and some members of the court might with great plausibility, if not with truth, contend, that if a document was not read before this Commission—whatever its importance might be—it ought not to be received as testimony. It should be read for another reason, and that is in justice to General Buell—it should be read with a view to notify him that such a document was considered as evidence. He might object to it, and it might become of importance to offer some explanations concerning it. I call to mind a letter addressed to General Nelson while he was in command at Louisville, the purport of which was, as I understood, to evacuate the city of Louisville, dropping down and taking a position the other side of Salt River. I regard that letter as of considerable importance, and if General Buell ordered it he may wish to explain it, and I should be much gratified to hear it.

General TYLER. In looking over the books submitted to the Commission I cannot find even the order on which General Buell acted in the campaign of Kentucky and Tennessee.

General BUELL. I think I have explained to the Commission that the instructions that were originally given to me were given orally by General Halleck.

The PRESIDENT. If that is the case it may become necessary for us to have General Halleck before us, inasmuch as under the present arrangement General Buell is not himself a witness.

General BUELL. The meaning and intent of those instructions were that my army should advance into East Tennessee, occupy first Chattanooga, and prospectively other points. I proposed to General Halleck that I should have the privilege of directing those operations by whichever route I might think proper. General Halleck first assented to that, but he subsequently notified me by telegraphic dispatch that upon further consideration he thought the best plan would be to proceed directly to Chattanooga, and I believe that dispatch is the only documentary evidence of those instructions I have.

The PRESIDENT. Is that on the record?

General BUELL. I think it is. The tendency and object of those instructions were to direct my army against Chattanooga, that being deemed the first important point.

The PRESIDENT. Before it is settled by the Commission that the Government rests its case I beg the judge-advocate to examine the books introduced by General Buell, and take therefrom such letters, dispatches, &c., as he thinks necessary and important for the elucidation.

tion of any question before the court and submit them to the court by a reading.

General BUELL. I wish to urge the propriety and justice of the introduction by the judge-advocate and the reading to the Commission of everything in the shape of documentary evidence that he proposes to introduce at all, and for the reasons I have given you, that it may be as important to me as the evidence of witnesses examined here. There is one other matter which I desire to bring formally to the notice of the Commission. I believe it is necessary for the interest of the Government and is due to myself that Governor Johnson should appear before this Commission, and that he should be introduced by the judge-advocate and not by myself. I think it is due also that General Wright should be introduced in the same way. As the object of this investigation is to give to the Government information and do justice everywhere, I can see no objection to the introduction of these gentlemen for the prosecution. I cannot insist upon it except as a matter of justice, and I believe that the ends of justice would be answered by it.

(General Buell desired the judge-advocate to detain General W. S. Smith, as further testimony might be required of him.)

Commission adjourned to meet February 13.

CINCINNATI, February 13, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

(Reading documentary evidence.)

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Mr. President, in accordance with the resolution passed, by the Commission some weeks ago I addressed a note to General Buell calling upon him for all books, papers, telegrams, letters, and orders sent and received in his department having any bearing on this investigation, for the purpose of using the same before the Commission. In response to that General Buell furnishes me with all the evidence connected with the department that has a bearing upon the investigation. In accordance with the instructions given me at Nashville it was agreed that an authentication should be dispensed with where General Buell and myself concurred. I now introduce these books before the Commission as so much evidence. I have also, in accordance with the resolution passed yesterday, made an abstract of the letters, telegrams, returns, &c., that I propose to use in this investigation. I will submit them to General Buell, and if he has no objection they will be considered as before the Commission.

General DANA. I move that the resolution referred to in the remarks of the judge-advocate as passed at Nashville be read to the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have not been able to find it; it does not appear to have been entered upon the minutes. The instructions were a matter of course, because when the Government and General Buell agree upon a document further authentication is unnecessary. The question that agitates the Commission is as to the mode of authentication; that is, whether these documents are before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. I understand there is no such question agitating this Commission, because there is a positive direction to the judge-advocate to introduce such documentary evidence and read it to the Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I am ready at any moment to proceed to read what I propose to use.

General BUELL. There has been no consultation between the judge-advocate and myself as to what should or should not be admitted as evidence before the Commission. I presented the records that I had to him for his inspection and any use he might choose to make of them, and to anything he chooses to present I have no objection to offer now; the proper time will be when it is read to the Commission, and I shall not object to anything that has any bearing upon the matter under investigation.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have made selections from this evidence and will proceed to read them if the Commission so desire. It will be necessary to read all the documentary evidence I propose to introduce.

(Telegrams read by judge-advocate.)

General BUELL. I should like to inquire what interpretation the judge-advocate proposes to put upon the statements that are made in this documentary evidence as to the strength of the enemy; for instance, whether he expects that it would be admitted as evidence of that strength or only showing what it really expresses, namely, the rumored or reported strength of the enemy? What I wish to know is what effect the judge-advocate means that statements of this kind in documentary evidence, as to the strength of the enemy, for example, shall have; whether it is to be recognized as conclusive as to the strength of the enemy or only as setting forth the information that was received from time to time?

The PRESIDENT. Allow me to ask you, general, that it may be clearly understood, if you hold the position that it is your right to hear the construction which the judge-advocate puts upon these documents submitted to the Commission, and also to have him to distinctly avow for what purposes he proposes to use them—not merely those relating to the strength of the enemy, but all others he may submit to the Commission?

General BUELL. That is the substance of my wish.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I cannot perceive why I should be called upon to put a construction upon these telegrams or letters any more than that I should put a construction upon the evidence of General McCook or state in advance what I expect to prove by the evidence of General McCook. I think I have proved enough when I have introduced his testimony. There are facts bearing upon this investigation which must carry simply what appears upon the face of them and no more. I do not propose to make arguments or draw conclusions from these documents; that is the business of the members of the Commission, not mine. If General Buell finds anything introduced that has no bearing upon the conduct of the Army of the Ohio in this investigation, he has, of course, a right to make objection to it; but so long as the Commission finds it has a bearing it will be presented, and I have no construction to put upon the evidence. When facts are introduced, argument will be left to the proper time for argument to be made.

General BUELL. Perhaps it may be well to state what are my views as to what should be the rule with reference to evidence introduced before this Commission. The instructions of the Secretary of War specify certain distinct matters which are to be the subject of investigation. All these specifications are distinct except the last, which is somewhat general, and is in these words: "And also to inquire and report upon such other matters touching the military operations aforesaid as in the judgment of the Commission shall be beneficial to the service." It appears to me now that under this last and general specification the investigation should be with reference to the propriety or impropriety of some of my official acts. If anything is presented as evidence which shows upon its face something that requires explanation or investigation, that may be sufficient with reference to that; but with reference to evidence, documentary or otherwise, which may set forth official acts that may be proper or improper according to the interpretation that is put upon them, the judge-advocate should be required to state what bearing he understands this evidence to have upon some particular question as to the propriety or impropriety of my official acts. For example, if the propriety or expediency of some arrangement of troops for some particular object should be in question, the judge-advocate would properly introduce as evidence anything bearing upon that general arrangement. But if he should introduce a document that merely sets forth that I ordered a division or brigade or a regiment to a particular place, without having set forth the general purpose of his investigation, I hold that he should state distinctly the object he has in view in introducing that particular document. I hold that it is proper he should explain what he means to show by this particular document that is introduced, and whether he claims that there was any fault in the official act which it sets forth or not; and, if so, what that fault is.

The court was cleared for deliberation, when, after discussion, the following was resolved upon as the opinion of the court:

"That the document is to go on record as it stands, without explanation from the judge-advocate, and it is for General Buell to treat and explain it in his defense as he may think proper."

General BUELL. Is this a general rule or a rule having reference to this particular document? The first question I submitted to the Commission is not answered in that resolution; that is, as to whether the statements there as to the strength of the rebel force is to be considered as evidence of that strength or whether it only stands there as one of the various reports or rumors current in regard to that subject. I believe that question is before you, sir.

The PRESIDENT. I think, general, the resolution covers that point.

General BUELL. I think not, sir.

The PRESIDENT. I will, with your permission, general, take the sense of the Commission upon it.

The court was cleared, when, after discussion, it was resolved—

"That the above rule should be considered as applicable to all documentary evidence introduced."

General BUELL. That there may be no misunderstanding in reference to this, I wish it understood that if I make any exception to a document it is not that I object to the document as it actually is. It will require the authentication of my staff officers to secure my final assent to it as evidence before the Commission. I make this explanation because it is very possible there may be verbal errors that can be corrected by referring to the original papers, and I wish it therefore understood that my assenting to a document that is read here does not imply that I assent to it as it is read, but to the document as it ought to be.

General SCHOEPF. I move that all the documentary evidence that is to be introduced be read by General Buell before it is read to the Commission and that he then certify to its correctness.

General BUELL. That is what I propose to do with reference to the documentary evidence I introduce myself and that I think it will be best to do in all cases.

The PRESIDENT. My opinion on that matter is that any written papers or documents presented to this Commission and appearing as from the official records of General Buell, properly dated, sent by him or to him when he was in command of the Department of the Ohio, would be, prima facie, correct, and if not correct it would be for General Buell to point out the errors and that it would not be for the judge-advocate in any manner to correct them, and to amend them the original papers would have to be produced in court and all corrections made upon the face of the documents from the originals. Prima facie the documents that appear in the official books of the general commanding the Department of the Ohio would be received, in my judgment, as correct, though unsigned by the chief of the staff or the assistant adjutant-general.

General BUELL. I do not object to the rule; I simply made the remark so that I might not be understood as assenting to what might upon its face appear to be correct.

(Telegrams read by judge-advocate.)

General BUELL. You have read enough already to show the necessity and propriety of a proper examination of these official papers and of a proper authentication of them. These records were made out for my own use, and, as you see, have never been carefully examined and authenticated, and were written, as is apparent, by a careless clerk. The originals are on file; and time would be saved by a proper authentication before the papers are presented to the Commission. The rule the president has stated is a sufficient protection for me and I have no objection to proceed in that way, but it will involve a re-examination of all these papers and a comparison of them with the originals.

The PRESIDENT. There is no objection to General Buell correcting any errors in these records by a reference to the originals.

(Telegrams read by judge-advocate.)

Commission adjourned to meet February 14.

CINCINNATI, February 14, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

(Telegrams read by judge-advocate.)

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Mr. President, I now introduce the consolidated reports exhibiting the strength of the Army of the Ohio for June 1,* June 10,* July 20,* August 1, and September 1,* 1862. I believe these exhibit the entire force of the army at those several periods, with the exception of two divisions (General Mitchell's and General Paine's, I think) that were subsequently or pending that time added to the Army of the Ohio.

(Telegrams read by judge-advocate.)

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I find among the telegrams an estimate of the army at Chattanooga without date or signature. I think, however, it is in the handwriting of General McCook; but till it is authenticated it should not be accepted by the Commission. I submit it for what it is worth. I have now presented all the documentary evidence that I have to submit to the Commission.

* Not found.

General ORD. I do not object to this paper being submitted as testimony, though I object to its being read, because before anything is brought before the Commission it should be considered whether it is valid or not.

General TYLER. Has General Thomas responded to the request of the judge-advocate for his papers?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir.

General SCHOEPF. These consolidated reports are not correct. The First Division, my own division, is not entered on either of the reports.

General BUELL. (To the judge-advocate.) Do you propose to present this memorandum?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir.

General BUELL. It is, I believe, a memorandum submitted by Colonel Wilder when he was giving his testimony, and it became mixed up in the papers presented by him. I think you will have all the benefit from it that you desire in his testimony.

Commission adjourned to meet February 16, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, February 16, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General TYLER. Mr. President, I have a resolution to offer on which I wish to make a few remarks and request that both may go on the record.

So far as I recollect, the judge-advocate has never retained a witness before the court after his examination was finished nor has a single witness as yet been recalled by the judge-advocate. By referring to our record it will be seen that General Smith and Captain Jones, after occupying the court four or six days in giving testimony, are now retained from their appropriate duties—General Smith being under orders to report to General Grant, now conducting the most important operations of the army—notwithstanding the order of the court passed on Tuesday, the 9th instant, which seems to me to preclude either the Government or the defense from recalling a witness. I now move that the judge-advocate and Major-General Buell both be instructed that after a witness has been once examined he cannot be recalled except for reasons stated and deemed satisfactory at the time, and that this Commission will not exercise its authority to retain any witness belonging to the Army of the United States whose examination has been concluded as per order of the 9th instant, and whose presence is undoubtedly required with his command.

General BUELL. I wish to enter my formal protest against this order. It comes in after the prosecution has been closed; it does not therefore affect the cause of the Government; it affects me seriously. A mass of documentary evidence has been introduced by the judge-advocate, the object of which he does not explain and the object of which I can only guess at myself. The witnesses that have been detained at my request have been detained in anticipation of what has occurred; that is, that matter would be introduced before the Commission which it would be necessary for me to explain by my witnesses, without knowing in advance what that matter was.

I object to the order, also, that it violates a rule of investigation before all tribunals, I believe, which gives either party the privilege of recalling any witness at any time while his side of the investigation is yet open. He may be dismissed for the occasion and called up again as if he had never been called to give evidence. I think the possible tendency of the resolution is to debar me from that justice I have a right to expect. The proceedings thus far have been conducted with that deliberation and in that manner which the judge-advocate has deemed best for himself and the Government, no restriction having been placed upon him in any way, and I do not understand why these cramps should be put upon the case upon the side of the defense. I will state that the object of this protest is to ask a reconsideration of the order and a revocation of it. I do not propose myself to subject the Government or the Commission to any greater inconvenience than may be absolutely necessary for the ends of justice.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I believe, as I have stated before, that it is customary in all tribunals to retain witnesses till the trial is through, that they may be recalled at any time. I have nothing to say upon the rule offered by the Commission except this: that having closed the case for the Government I cannot introduce any new matter, and therefore one reason why the witness should be retained for the purpose of questioning on anything that may be introduced on the part of the Government is removed. So far as the judge-advocate is concerned the line of inquiry to be pursued is marked out by the Government. We are called upon to investigate certain facts connected with the operations of the Army of the Ohio in Kentucky and Tennessee, and I do not consider it my duty, nor do I think it would be proper, nor have I, to introduce any witness with the preamble as to what I expected to prove by that witness, nor have I made any comments on the facts brought forward. That is for the Commission to weigh and determine for themselves. I have called witnesses who have been supposed to know something about the facts of the case, and most of these witnesses have been summoned upon a consultation with General Buell himself, and having called them I have permitted them to state what they knew about the matter. It will be further observed that in a majority of instances General Buell has made the witnesses his own by the introduction of new matter while cross-examining.

General ORD. I move that we reconsider the resolution.

The court was cleared, when, after discussion, it was resolved not to reconsider the resolution.

The court being opened—

The PRESIDENT. There being nothing in the rule to prevent the detention of General Smith upon a sufficient reason or necessity shown by General Buell I will ask the general to state to the Commission his reasons for desiring to recall him.

General BUELL. I do not wish to detain Captain Jones any longer. I wish General Smith to appear before the Commission upon matter which has been introduced in the documentary evidence submitted by the judge-advocate since General Smith's examination. Will you summon General Smith?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir.

General SCHOEPP. Is not General Smith in Cincinnati?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. No, sir; I gave him permission to leave, as he could be summoned by telegraph at any time and be here in a few hours.

The court was cleared, when, after discussion, the Commission decided that General Smith would not be recalled, as the Commission was of opinion that sufficient reason for his recall had not been given under this rule.

The court being opened—

General BUELL. I would like to inquire if some particular reason would be deemed sufficient?

The PRESIDENT. I endeavored to state to General Buell that if a satisfactory reason were given for the recall of General Smith the Commission would recall him.

General BUELL. What I remember now particularly is embraced in a dispatch from General Mitchel to me, setting forth the facilities for the movement of the army rapidly from Chattanooga, particularly the facilities for crossing the river. I wish to show by General Smith what those facilities really were and how far they fell short of what is claimed for them in the dispatches of General Mitchel.

The PRESIDENT. Upon this additional statement, general, I understand you to renew your request for General Smith to reappear?

General BUELL. Yes, sir.

The court was cleared, with an apology from the President to General Buell for the inconvenience to which he was put in again being requested to retire.

On the court being opened—

The PRESIDENT. It has been decided to be unnecessary to recall General Smith upon the point made by you, general.

Maj. Gen. GORDON GRANGER (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States, if you please.

Gordon Granger; captain in the Regular Army and major-general of Volunteers.

Question. Were you on duty in the Department of the Ohio in the months of September, October, and November last; if so, at what place and what command had you?

I arrived in the Department of the Ohio from Corinth, Miss., on or about September 13, 1862, the command then consisting of four regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and two batteries of light artillery. My first duty after my arrival was at Covington, where this command was augmented to some eight or nine regiments more. I remained there on duty until the siege of Cincinnati was raised, and then proceeded to Louisville with this command, and also took charge of about, I think, fifteen or sixteen or seventeen regiments—I do not remember more—of which I had the superintendence of the shipping by river and by rail. Arrived at Louisville I think about the 21st of September, and remained there on duty as second in command to General Nelson, afterward under General Buell, until about the 1st of October, when I was relieved and ordered to report to General Wright at this place. I was then assigned to the command of the troops about Covington and Newport, some twenty-six regiments, I believe. Under orders from General Wright I proceeded with this command to Lexington, Ky., where I arrived on the 25th of October; remained there in command of what is known as the Central District of Kentucky, with a force varying from 18,000 to 26,000. Was again relieved from that district on or about the 1st of February, 1863. I proceeded to Louisville and thence to the South with some 15,000 men.

Question. What was the cause of the transfer of your command from Covington to Louisville, as you have stated?

It was because of the approach of General Bragg's army, threatening that place—with a view to its defense.

Question. Did your official position during this period make it your duty to inform yourself in regard to the strength, effectiveness, and objects of the rebel forces which invaded Kentucky in August and September? If so, state what you know with reference to these several points. You may in this connection, if you please, state by what routes the enemy invaded Kentucky, and what points he occupied and what points he threatened.

My official position did require me to inform myself on the points enumerated, and in addition I received on one or two occasions verbal instructions from Major-General Wright to assist General Nelson by advice, counsel, head work, and hard work, and in fact everything I could do.

It would be better for me to state first that there was a rebel force already in Kentucky, under the command of Maj. Gen. Kirby Smith. That force entered Kentucky, from the best information that could be obtained, on or about the 20th of August, perhaps a little later, coming in from the south through the Big Creek Gap and Walker's Gap, about 40 miles west of Cumberland Gap, passing these two gaps with a force of about 18,000 strong. After clearing the gaps in this direction a rebel force under General Stevenson united with Kirby Smith's, of 6,000 strong. A portion of this force reached the city of Lexington, I think, about the 2d or 3d of September; remained in the State, occupying a position part of the time in front of Cincinnati, Cinthiana, Lexington, Mount Sterling, Frankfort, with some small posts, such as Nicholasville and Georgetown. The force which subsequently came into Kentucky, I learn, was under the command of General Bragg; it left some point on Battle Creek; the date I do not remember well enough to state, but my recollection is that it was about the 1st of September. It struck almost directly for the town of Glasgow; thence to Munfordville; from Munfordville it moved on to Bardstown. After leaving Munfordville General Nelson and myself were sending spies and obtaining information from all possible sources—from deserters that came in. The force by these parties was represented to be varying from 65,000 to 80,000; but from everything we could gather, the opinion of General Nelson, General Wright, and several others and myself, was that Bragg's force numbered from 50,000 to 55,000 men. That was the estimate put upon it by those best informed. I think I was the only one who put it at a little lower. My estimate was from 45,000 to 50,000. I have since learned that our estimate of 50,000 to 55,000 was very nearly correct.

These, then, were the two rebel forces in Kentucky on or about the 25th of September. Kirby Smith commenced about this time, or a few days previous, concentrating his forces at Frankfort, so that on or about the 25th of September Bragg was at Bardstown or near there—his main force was there—with some 55,000 men. Kirby Smith had lost by desertion and had left a great many sick (I found 1,500 at Lexington), which reduced his force to from 18,000 to 20,000 men. This was the strength and position of the two rebel armies from the best information we could get, and was the opinion of other general officers, about the 25th of September, 1862. Smith's army concentrated at Frankfort; it was lying about at Lexington. Some 6,000 or 7,000 came over under Heth (as near as I could ascertain) in front of Cincinnati.

THE PRESIDENT. You mean to say that Bragg was at Bardstown and Kirby Smith at Frankfort at the same date?

THE WITNESS. Yes, sir; about the same time. Bragg in person was at Frankfort, but the bulk of his force was at Bardstown. The objects of these forces, Bragg's and Smith's, in my opinion and that of others, as we supposed at the time, was a union and the attempted overthrow and defeat of General Buell's army at such a point as they could meet it with advantage. I learned that the object of Kirby Smith's advance was to get into Kentucky as early as possible in advance of Bragg, for the purpose of securing supplies of provisions, clothing, animals—in fact everything they stood in need of—and for establishing depots at convenient points for the use and benefit of Bragg's army on his arrival. Another object that I understood at the time, and have heard it a thousand times since, was that they expected a very large re-enforcement—that Kentucky would rise. I have heard officers assert that they expected a re-enforcement of about 50,000 men in Kentucky. With this they believed themselves enabled to defeat any force we had and then march to the Ohio. At the time it was my impression, from the best information I could get, that they meditated an attack upon Louisville, but I have since become satisfied that they regarded Louisville as of little or no importance to them.

By General BUELL:

Question. Was there in Louisville about this time a large amount of public and private property such as an army would require?

There was up to about the 25th of September, or perhaps a little earlier, a good deal of clothing and provisions, by which time most of it was removed to the opposite side of the river.

Question. What at this time were the limits of the Department of the Ohio and who was in command?

The southern limit was the southern boundary of Kentucky; southern and eastern limits the southern and eastern boundaries of Kentucky, embracing Western Virginia. The number of States in it I cannot mention distinctly. I know that Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin were in it. Whether Iowa was or not I do not know. I know that those mentioned were in it from the fact that a requisition was made upon the Governors of those States for troops and they came, and I saw orders addressed to those States. My impression is that Iowa was included, though I am not certain. The remainder of the boundary of the department was the western boundary of Kentucky adjacent to Tennessee. Maj. Gen. H. G. Wright was in command.

Question. Can you state the date of his entry upon command?

I believe it was about the 25th of August, but I am not positive.

Question. Considering the position and resources of Louisville, was it fair to presume that that was one main point the enemy aimed for?

That was my opinion at the time, as stated before; so much so, that every effort was made, by working night and day, to intrench and fortify and to make every species of defense to protect it. I furthermore judge so from some intercepted correspondence from General Beauregard to General Bragg which I had in my possession for some time.

Question. What United States forces were there at Louisville at the time of Bragg's invasion, prior to the arrival of the Army of the Ohio, and what was their effectiveness?

About two days previous to the arrival of the Army of the Ohio I was told by General Nelson that his whole organized force there was about 36,000 to 37,000. I made the circuit of the trenches (I had charge of a portion of them), and from what I saw I believe that statement was correct. In addition to this we had citizens, squirrel hunters, and people picked up for the occasion, which swelled this force to 41,000 or 42,000. All this force, with the exception of four regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and two batteries, I believe, was entirely new. The 36,000 or 37,000 mentioned were regularly organized into regiments, very well armed and very well equipped, but had had no instruction or drill. Four or five thousand of irregulars of every kind were but partially armed, some with shot-guns some without, some with ammunition and some without, but most of them with spades and picks.

Question. How much artillery was there and what was its effective condition?

To the best of my recollection there were seven batteries; two of them were good batteries, the others were of but very little account. I had something to do to get the guns and harness into condition, and the men were so ignorant that they did not know how to unlimber or limber up.

Question. Was there anything in the position and strength of the United States forces to prevent a junction between Bragg and Kirby Smith if they desired it or in the condition of the country and roads?

Nothing whatever that I am aware of. In fact I know there was nothing.

Question. What would probably have been the result of an engagement between these two rebel forces combined, or even of the main force under Bragg alone, and the United States force that was left at Louisville, supposing the latter not to have been strongly protected by intrenchments prior to the arrival of the Army of the Ohio?

The result, in my opinion, would have been an almost immediate defeat and utter rout. We were in hopes, in case we were attacked, to hold on to the trenches and suburbs if possible, to enable General Buell's army to come up and attack them in their rear, and it was seriously contemplated by General Nelson to burn the city as fast as they drove him from it. For the purpose of saving the army we constructed two pontoon bridges, one in front of the center of the city and one at the lower extremity of the city, in case of attack.

Question. Do you know the country and the roads by which the Army of the Ohio would advance to Louisville about the time of the advance of Bragg's army to Bardstown from Green River?

I have a geographical knowledge of it. I have studied it for my own interest in connection with the movements of the rebel army and your own, but I have never been over it.

Question. Do you know the road by which the Army of the Ohio did advance from Munfordville to Louisville?

Yes, sir; from Munfordville to Elizabethtown; thence to Salt River; thence to Louisville; this is the inner road, nearest to the bank of the river. I sent some cavalry to Elizabethtown, which caused me to inquire into the condition of the road and the nature of the country. I also had something to do with constructing a bridge or ferry, I do not remember which—perhaps both—at this point, to have it in readiness for the crossing of General Buell's army. The distance to Elizabethtown, as near as I remember, is from 45 to 50 miles from Louisville, because we were one day and one night making the march, and there must have been a halt. The cavalry complained of scarcity of water, of the hard road, and the terrible dust and drought. Elizabethtown is about half way between Munfordville and Louisville.

Question. If the strength of the United States force at Louisville and their condition as to effectiveness would have made their defeat almost certain or have very greatly jeopardized them in the event of an attack by the rebel army under Bragg what do you think would have been a judicious disposition of that force, considering that the Army of the Ohio was advancing toward Louisville by the road you have just described?

My advice to General Nelson, and therefore my opinion at the time, was to give an order early in the morning of the day we are speaking of for the evacuation of the place and the crossing of the river (we had on hand some 800 wagons—to load these down with provisions; we had already loaded some steamers to proceed to Brandenburg with a million and a half of rations), to have all the troops formed and the wagons drawn out at sunset, move down the river in the direction of the Portland pontoon bridge so as to reach in front of it a little after dark; then, instead of crossing the river, to make a forced march by West Point with these wagons and our entire force to Elizabethtown or to such a point as where we should meet the advance of the Army of the Ohio, there to unite with General Buell, distribute our rations to his army, fall upon the rear of Bragg in case he turned toward Louisville, and there destroy him; in case we should drive him up in the angle between the Ohio and Kentucky Rivers, defeat and capture him entirely if possible. That was my opinion and advice at the time, which I notified General Wright and General Buell of as soon as they arrived in Louisville. I believed it to be a certain movement and would have secured the entire rebel army.

Cross-examination by General TYLER:

Question. Was General Wright there at that time?

No, sir; I notified him that I had given this advice as soon as I saw him. I begged Nelson very hard by talking to him several hours and one time I felt sure he would do it. I felt the movement would be a successful one. The rebels had commenced their deviation in the direction of Bardstown. Our spies at Shepherdsville and in the direction of Lebanon Junction had informed us that they were striking off toward Bardstown. We had some considerable cavalry that I advised should be pushed out on the Shepherdsville and Bardstown roads as a curtain to cover our real movement. There would have been scarcely any hazard or risk and it would have been impossible for them to have reached us. I was in hopes by this movement to entice Bragg to move directly upon Louisville. Had he done so he would have found nothing in Louisville for his army. We had already shipped everything of value, and (the order not being understood by any one but myself and the commanding generals) he would have found nothing, for the families had all day to remove their valuables. I believe Bragg would have regarded the order as a bona-fide order to evacuate the place and cross the river. In that event I could see no good reason for his not approaching Louisville. At any rate it occurred to me that it would be some days before he would understand the movement and be enabled to develop it, and that would give us time to complete our junction and make such organization as might be necessary, move up by New Haven, and cut him off from any possible retreat in the direction of Harrodsburg or Danville. These are the dispositions and movements I should have made had I been in command. We had planted upon the opposite bank of the river some heavy guns. We also had some few gunboats, with two or four 11-inch guns, and with these the city could have been made perfectly untenable to any troops that attempted to occupy it.

Question. In anticipation of such a movement as you have described, or of a possible reverse, if it had been determined to await the attack of Bragg's army at Louisville, and considering that the Army of the Ohio was out of supplies, was it judicious or not to order supplies to Brandenburg for its use if necessary?

I deemed it of vital importance.

Question. Is or is not the country between the road which you would have followed from Louisville to the mouth of Salt River and the road on which the enemy was moving of such a character as would have enabled you to make that movement with perfect safety?

I deemed it so. The object of throwing the cavalry out was not to fight a battle or to head off a column, but to intercept information carried by spies, of which there were thousands in our midst giving information every hour. My order was to intercept everything they found going in any direction. I never deemed the enemy could reach us till we arrived in the vicinity of Elizabethtown, and then it would be a very hazardous movement for them, one that I would rather court; for General Buell could have taken them in flank and have cut them in two. The country is a rough, tumbled-up country. The spurs of Muldraugh's Hill run off and form cuts and ravines that are almost impassable.

Question. Is there any road at all by which an army could pass from Bardstown directly to the mouth of Salt River?

No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Before the adjournment General Granger expressed a wish that his examination before the Commission might be conducted with as little delay as possible, as the exigencies of the service in his department and the necessity for his presence made it very desirable that he should be with his command.

Commission adjourned to meet February 17.

CINCINNATI, February 17, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General GRANGER's examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Up to the 25th September last what progress had been made in fortifying the city of Louisville against an attack of the rebel army?

At that date very little had been done. The work was commenced, I think, the day previous, and was carried on till, I think, about the 28th, when the trenches were completed.

Question. Can you state about what portion of the front remained uncovered by intrenchments?

On our extreme right, between our intrenchments and the river, there was a space left open of about one mile. I did not measure it, but that is my recollection. I think General Robert [S.] Granger, who was standing on the ground, thought that was about the distance. There was an opening also in about the center, near where General Gilbert had his troops posted. What that was I do not know or whether trenches were thrown up afterward when he arrived there, but for two or three days I know there was nothing done there. Again, on the extreme left was an openspace of, I should think, half a mile, as near as I remember; it might have been a little more or a little less.

Question. You have stated the number of batteries that were at Louisville at this period; how many pieces would they embrace?

I think they were all six-gun batteries excepting one, which was a four rifled gun battery; that would make forty pieces.

Question. Do you know anything about the topography of the ground about Munfordville, whether as a military position it is very strong or otherwise?

I understand it to be a very strong position, particularly on this side of the stream.

Question. Do you recognize that in battles the strength of the position occupied by the army which acts on the defensive has a great deal to do with the result of the engagement?

Yes, sir; the army standing on the defensive and taking up its position of course must have many advantages over the one acting on the offensive, supposing their numbers anything like equal. The strength of the position may be such as to counterbalance the effect of the superior numbers making the attack.

Question. Is it recognized as a principle in military operations that, with equal prospects of success, circumstances may make it improper to risk a battle in one case when it would be advisable or even necessary to do so in another?

Yes, sir; I can suppose cases of that nature. In the first place it would be improper under those circumstances to risk a battle where you would jeopardize your communications, and again it would be wise to risk a battle where they were comparatively safe. It might also be wise to risk a battle if you had re-enforcements near at hand that could save you in case of a disaster, and very unwise and imprudent where there were no re-enforcements or assistance that could be brought to bear. A general might be forced to fight a battle under such circumstances perhaps to save his army from starving; it might be the last alternative. It might be imprudent again to fight a battle under those circumstances where in case of a defeat the whole country would be left open to the invading army, whereas by falling back they might defend themselves point by point until such dispositions might be made as to cope successfully in a better and stronger position and force the enemy to fight to disadvantage.

Question. Do you know anything about the condition of the Army of the Ohio as to supplies when it was following the rebel army toward Louisville and about the time that the rebel army was at Munfordville, in September?

Only by hearsay. I heard several general officers of that command in Louisville, previous to the arrival of the army there, and some that were with it, say that they had been for a portion of the time on half rations; that a part of the way they had been compelled to make forced marches on that account. Generals Crittenden, Wood, McCook, and Nelson, I know, told me they were very short of rations. I know that a requisition came from General Buell, for I saw it, that he wished four millions of rations to be sent by steamer to Brandenburg. The dispatch came when he was somewhere above Bowling Green.

Question. Do you know of supplies having been ordered to the mouth of Salt River to meet the army on its arrival there; and was it understood that that was necessary for the subsistence of the army?

Yes, sir. It had slipped my memory for the moment.

Question. With the supplies exhausted and the rebel army between it and its base what must have been the probable consequence of a repulse, or even a very serious check, of the Army of the Ohio in an attack upon the rebel army at Munfordville?

It must have produced a dissolution, breaking up, and capture of the Army of the Ohio.

Question. Suppose the Army of the Ohio to have been destroyed or disabled in this way, what would have been the consequence to the cause of the Government in Kentucky?

It would have been the loss of the State for six or twelve months to come; in fact it is hardly possible to foresee or foretell what would have been the real consequences. I do not see anything to have prevented the rebel army from crossing the Ohio River.

Question. With a small garrison at Munfordville, the Army of the Ohio at Bowling Green, and the rebel army equal, or nearly equal, between these two points, and within 10 miles of the only road between them, and supposing it possible to throw a portion of the Army of the Ohio into Munfordville for the purpose of strengthening the garrison there against an attack by the rebel army or any portion of it, would such a disposition have been judicious or injudicious?

Does it suppose that the rebel army is concentrated?

Question. Yes, sir; concentrated or with the means of concentrating within twenty-four hours.

I should have regarded the movement or attempt to have thrown a partial force there as extremely hazardous; it would be a violation of one of the great principles of war to separate one's forces, which I have always fought against since this war commenced. I hardly see how it would be possible, supposing the two forces to occupy the position described, to have thrown a force into Munfordville, the rebel army occupying the road from Glasgow which runs nearly parallel with the pike. It would have been exposed in flank and liable to capture or to be cut to pieces at any point of the road. To have thrown it in by a detour would have made the distance so great that the rebel force would have reached there before it could.

Question. With the force that was being thrown into Kentucky by the Government about the time of Bragg's invasion, which would have been the most judicious and advantageous arrangement for the commander of the Army of the Ohio, coming from Tennessee—to have forced the rebel army still farther into Kentucky or to have passed it and left it in possession of Middle Tennessee and Southern Kentucky?

I do not understand whether you intend to hold Nashville, Bowling Green, &c., or to give them up.

Question. I leave those points garrisoned, but only with such garrisons as could be spared and yet preserve the Army of the Ohio with such force that it would be able to cope with the opposing army.

My opinion would be to oppose this army and not drive it into Kentucky, where they could get supplies, stores, and recruits. We see the consequence of a portion of this army getting into Kentucky, where they destroyed the railroad bridges, took a great deal of property, got some recruits, and furnished themselves with stores and supplies to get out of the State again. Another reason for passing this force would be that unless it was done they would be between the Army of the Ohio and its base of supplies, and they must be driven from the base or it must be reached in some other way. The movement made by Bragg is one almost without a parallel. Cutting loose from his base of supplies and skedaddling all over the country is something to which history scarcely affords a parallel, and it might well puzzle a general wishing to attack him to ferret out his movements. The supposition was that when he was cut off from his base of supplies we had him; but it seems he never lived so well as he did after he arrived in Kentucky.

Question. Would or would not the rebel army be in greater jeopardy in Kentucky, opposed by the forces that were being concentrated there to meet it, than in Middle Tennessee, where it was only opposed by a portion of that force?

Yes, sir; it would. Yet such is the nature of the country, that if the rebel army did not choose to stay in Kentucky there were several routes by which it could extricate itself, notwithstanding the Army of the Ohio and the forces already concentrated; that is, if they did not choose to stand and give battle.

Question. Mention those routes, if you please.

In the first place, if Bragg had crossed the Kentucky River he could then have united with Kirby Smith and passed out of the State by Pound Gap with safety. There is another route by which he did go out, and that I have never yet seen any means of preventing, and that is by Cumberland, Big Creek, and Walker's Gaps. By maneuvering adroitly I believe it was possible for him to have passed out not far from Lebanon Junction, perhaps taking Saloma and Campbellsville. At that season of the year, although they are dirt roads, most of them are tolerably good. He might even have gone out by the New Haven turnpike, he occupying a central position, in case the Army of the Ohio had been thrown farther to the right flank into the mountains and hills to his rear and left. The best three roads in the country were then in his possession. Had he come into Kentucky, however, and made a stand I regarded his destruction as certain.

Question. Did the previous arrival of Kirby Smith in Kentucky very much simplify and facilitate the subsequent movement of the rebel army under Bragg into the State, giving him in fact the advantages of two bases, the one from which he started and the one at the point of destination?

Yes, sir; it facilitated him in more ways than one. In the first place, Kirby Smith held at bay all the forces that were concentrated here, preventing them from taking up a position on the verge of the blue-grass region or of uniting with or re-enforcing the Army of the Ohio. In the second place, Smith's army had already provided and placed in depot large supplies for Bragg's army on its arrival and was enabled to guard and keep them safe. The cavalry also of Smith's force destroyed and broke up a good deal of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad at the time of his entrance into the State. Had Smith's forces not preceded the advance of Bragg it would have been possible for us, with perhaps 35,000 to 45,000 men then concentrating in Kentucky, to have taken up a strong position below the fertile portions of the State, where supplies could be obtained, in a mountainous district, well adapted for defense, and might perhaps have held Bragg's advance till his forces were either half starved or till such time as General Buell could fall upon his rear. I do not believe that Bragg would have moved into Kentucky if Kirby Smith had not reached the State some weeks in advance. I do not think it would have been possible; at least it would have been one of the most fool-hardy and destructive movements he could have made. The movement of Smith, further, forced the evacuation of Cumberland Gap, making the route through it a safe one for his retreat.

Question. Have you studied the military topography of the country on either side of Dick's River and between Dick's River and the Kentucky River? And, if so, please describe the character of Dick's River and the Kentucky River and the ground on either side.

I have some knowledge of it, sir. Dick's River is a small river, running nearly north, emptying into the Kentucky River about 40 miles above Frankfort. The stream is much like a gash through the country, with ragged, rough, precipitous banks, and the country extending back from it from 1 to 1½ miles is almost of an impracticable nature. There are only three crossings over it that I recollect. The lower crossing is on a line of road running from Harrodsburg through Dicksville and Bryantsville, crossing this stream between Bryantsville and Dicksville. The next crossing, ascending it, is what is known as the Danville and Lancaster Crossing. There is a crossing a little higher up, the name of which I have forgotten. The country after crossing Dick's River at the Harrodsburg crossing, and between there and the Kentucky River, is very rough, hilly, and full of ravines. There is some plateau land where Camp Dick Robinson was located. The only water that I recollect there is at Bryantsville, where there is a well or spring, but it is bad water, and obtained from Dick's River, I believe.

Question. Does that stream afford very safe protection to one army against an opposing army on the opposite side?

Very strong on both sides; it is much stronger on the right bank than on the opposite side. It would be almost impossible to dislodge an army taking a position there, owing to the difficulty of crossing the stream. The bluffs and points where batteries could be planted would sweep the opposite approaches, and in high water it would be impassable. The river is subject to great rises during freshets of from 30 to 40 feet.

Question. With a stream like that of Dick's River, impassable except at very few points, as you have described it, and not requiring to be bridged on account of the water, is it in reality a hinderance to a retreating army or is it a protection and advantage to that army; that is, to an army in condition to maneuver and fight when necessary?

This stream, from the nature of its banks and crossings, would afford great facilities for a retreating army. It would only have to put out a strong rear guard to check the advance of the pursuing force, rush its artillery and train over, plant its batteries upon the most eligible points covering the crossings and approaches, move over its infantry and take position; it would be perfectly safe against three or four times its numbers. In a forward movement again it would be only necessary to leave a rear guard of moderate size to hold the crossing until the retreating army had made perhaps two or three days, while the pursuing one would be compelled to close up his troops, get them into position, and when his dispositions were completed the rear guard could pack up and move off safely, leaving the pursuing army two or three days' march in its rear. There is no point that I am aware of, either above or below for a long distance, where it would be possible to turn either flank of a retreating army.

Question. Suppose the rebel army at Camp Dick Robinson, and its retreat by either Somerset road or by the various roads through Lebanon and Glasgow cut off by the position of the Army of the Ohio at Danville and Perryville, what lines of retreat were then open to the rebel army?

There were two lines of retreat left open. From Camp Dick Robinson there is a good road leading first to Lancaster. From Lancaster there are two roads, one striking the Richmond and Cumberland Gap turnpike a little distance above Big Hill; the other struck this pike some 8 miles above that point, if I recollect aright. By taking this road to Bryantsville and availing themselves of the other two from this point it brings them on to the Richmond and Cumberland Gap turnpike. There is still another line left open: 8 miles, I think, in rear of Bryantsville is Hickman's Bridge, across the Kentucky River, a fine, large bridge. In low water there is a ford a few hundred yards from it where infantry can cross. This places them on the route then into Central Kentucky. On the Nicholasville and Bryantsville turnpike, after crossing the Kentucky River, they can pass out by Lexington, Winchester, Mount Sterling, Owensville, and West Liberty, and so on through Pound Gap, getting over the Kentucky River. They can also cross at Tait's Ferry and Clay's Ferry and avail themselves of all the crossings, and then converge toward Mount Sterling and Winchester. These are the only two roads that are left open of which the enemy could avail themselves from Camp Dick Robinson in retreating from the Federal forces as described.

Question. Having crossed to the north side of the Kentucky River, could they also throw themselves upon the Tait's Ferry road and the Lexington and Richmond road, and in that way get on to the Richmond and Cumberland Gap road?

Yes, sir.

Question. With Dick's River, such as you have described it, running between Danville and the road from Camp Dick Robinson to Lancaster and thence on to Cumberland Gap, would the position of the Army of the Ohio at Danville have prevented or very seriously interfered with the retreat of the rebel army from Camp Dick Robinson toward Cumberland Gap by the way of Lancaster, supposing it to be employed to the best advantage to prevent that movement?

I do not see how it could (such is the nature of this stream) very seriously interfere with it, and my memory is that an army obliquing across the country in the direction of Richmond and Camp Dick Robinson is confined to one road, while the rebel army from Bryantsville has two, and I think three, roads. This stream is a barrier and a protection of the right flank of the rebel army in its movement. There are but a few miles of country there suitable or available for operations. I think about 25 miles would strike the rugged mountainous districts, where pursuit would be almost useless, and the stream of Dick's River heads very near to these mountains. Furthermore, the bridge in the vicinity of Crab Orchard I know was burned previous to that time. It was burned by Morgan in his first raid.

Question. Supposing the retreat of the rebel army by the road from Camp Dick Robinson to Lancaster and thence on to Cumberland Gap was certain to have been foreseen, what point would it have been necessary to occupy with the Army of the Ohio to intercept the rebel army in its movement, the Army of the Ohio moving from Perryville?

I should have posted it at Stanford, or even in advance at Lancaster would have been better; but I regard that as an impossibility. I think it would have been possible to have intercepted it and cut it off had the Army of the Ohio been posted at Stanford or 2 miles in advance to the east, where there is some water.

Question. Could it not still have crossed over from the Lancaster to the Richmond and Cumberland Gap road?

It could. I do not know what communications there are between these roads or what means there are of getting on this road from Stanford; my recollection is that there is a country road only. Supposing there is a good road from Stanford to Big Hill or some point above it, I think the distance the two armies would have had to march about that time would have been about equal, and a battle must have ensued for the road. If, however, there is no communication such as an army could move on, the rebel army retreating directly on the pike would be safe. I doubt, however, if the Army of the Ohio had been at Stanford or in advance of it whether Bragg would have attempted to retreat in that direction.

Question. Supposing the Army of the Ohio had taken a position at Stamford, so as to intercept the rebel army in its retreat through Lancaster and thence on to Crab Orchard and so on to Cumberland Gap, what would it still be at the option of the rebel army to do?

Cut off its communications and isolate it from its base.

Question. Could it also have retreated by the route through Central Kentucky and on the Lexington and Richmond road?

Yes, sir. The routes were still open.

Question. Have you had occasion in your official position to study the problem of throwing a force into East Tennessee from Central Kentucky?

Yes, sir. It is a matter to which I have given a good deal of study and reflection and abandoned it as impracticable.

Question. In the course of your investigations what have you learned to be the character of the country and its agricultural resources between Somerset and East Tennessee directly across the mountains?

The character of the country is altogether mountainous.

By General TYLER:

Question. Do you speak from personal observation?

No, sir.

Question. You have no personal knowledge?

No, sir. I speak from such information as I have obtained from officers who have been there and citizens who have resided there and from such facts as I gather from the geographical maps furnished us by the War Department. I have not explored or reconnoitered it in person. I learn the nature of the country to be altogether mountainous, rugged, broken, and generally sterile, producing but little. My knowledge of the roads is that they are almost impracticable for an army, and altogether so for four or five months of the year, owing to the high water of the Cumberland and its tributaries and to the soft, miry, clayey soil. I had occasion to examine it and study it very closely, as it was General Wright's wish to push in a force of some 15,000 men after the cavalry raid was made, in case the winter was open and it was found possible. General Carter (after his return from East Tennessee), Major-General Wright, and myself examined the subject with great care, and without a dissenting voice the project was abandoned as not being feasible. The reasons were that it was impossible, even if we could reach there with a force, to subsist it, and it was deemed very hazardous to place it on the other side of the Tennessee and Kentucky Rivers at that season of the year, when those streams were swollen. I do not think there are any pikes between, say, the point in Tennessee about Clinton (I think this is the first point at which we strike anything like a pike, and that, I am told, is only a dirt road thrown up and drained on either side) from Somerset, Bar-boursville, Boston, and those points, which are starting points. There are no good wagon roads whatever at any season of the year. There are roads which wagons do travel, but the country is so very much cut up, so rocky and precipitous, as to render military operations there out of the question.

By General BUELL:

Question. Is personal observation usually considered essential for a knowledge of geography and are your sources of information those which are usually employed and considered satisfactory in the direction of military operations?

I have never heard or supposed that it was possible or necessary for a general commanding an army to make a personal observation of all the country his army might be called to pass over. The means employed are those I have mentioned, those that are laid down in military works, as obtained from maps, from residents, staff officers that may be sent upon such duties, spies &c. Such information by military men is considered—in fact it is the only information and is the best that can be obtained. I can imagine that upon a battle-field, or in selecting one, either for offense or defense, it is important for a general to see as much of the ground on which he has to place his troops as possible; but even then a commander has to rely upon the same sources of information I have referred to, and it is upon information obtained in this way that a general bases all his plans of march, campaign, and battle.

Question. Mention, if you please, all the general officers that belonged to the force that occupied Kentucky under Kirby Smith, as far as you have been enabled to learn?

I obtained a list from Dr. Irwin, medical director to General Nelson, who was taken prisoner at Richmond, and remained with our wounded some three weeks at Richmond and Lexington, but I have either lost or misplaced it. Those I can call to mind are Major-General Heth; McCown, brigadier; Cleburne, brigadier; Reynolds, brigadier; Gracie, brigadier; O'Bannon, brigadier; Boggs, brigadier; Morgan, brigadier; Marshall, brigadier; Buford, brigadier; Stevenson, I understand, is a major-general. I do not know that this list is complete. I think there were some four or five more, but these were those he met.

Question. Will the number of general officers, supposing it to be correctly ascertained, afford some criterion for judging of the minimum of the force; that is, the number of brigades and divisions?

Yes, sir; it should do so.

Question. Does it at all determine the maximum strength judging by the organization of our own forces? Are not brigades frequently commanded by colonels?

It would not be safe to base the maximum strength upon a calculation of that kind. In our own army, that I have served with, I suppose quite one-half of the brigades are commanded by colonels.

Question. I wish you, if you please, general, to make some calculation, upon certain established data, and place the result in evidence before the Commission. Suppose an army of 40,000 men, organized into seven divisions, each division with three brigades, and three batteries, averaging about five pieces to the battery, and each brigade containing four regiments of infantry—taking no account of cavalry at all—supposing each division to have a wagon train of 100 wagons, what length of road would it occupy in column, not on the march but in position to take up a march, and the intervals all closed—the smallest space that it can possibly occupy? Please answer the question in detail, general, giving the spaces occupied by a given number of men and the space occupied by the various kind of carriages and the space taken up by the prescribed intervals.

Commission adjourned to meet February 18.

CINCINNATI, February 18, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General GORDON GRANGER's examination continued.

To the concluding question on the record of Tuesday, February 17, General Granger replied as follows:

The question was as to the length of the column in marching order, consisting of 40,000 men, organized as follows: Seven divisions of infantry, twenty-one batteries, averaging five guns each, the divisions consisting of three brigades, each brigade consisting of four regiments, the number of men to each battery averaging 120; each division was to have 100 wagons. The total length of this column placed in marching order is 16 statute miles.

By General BUELL:

Question. Give, if you please, the data upon which you make this calculation.

The data upon which this calculation is made are these: Deducting first the number of artillerists gives the whole number of infantry. I have supposed that each man in his position preparatory to marching occupies a space of 22 inches; that each piece of artillery, with the artillery carriage, caissons, and forge, occupies a space of 14 yards; the same for each wagon; the intervals between regiments would be 22 paces, equal to yards; the intervals between batteries and battalions of infantry the same; the intervals between each piece about 2 yards. This is all reduced to yards and then converted into miles.

Question. Are these data prescribed by regulations and tactics in our service, and does the whole distance represent the smallest space upon which such a column could be formed for marching?

These are the exact data laid down, with one exception: the regulation fixes 20 inches; I have it 22, knowing that to be too small.

Question. Would it be possible for such a column to execute a march upon any ordinary road and preserve these intervals so as to occupy no more space in the aggregate than you have stated? If not, please state what would be the least average space that such a column in motion would occupy.

It would be impossible to move this column a half a mile preserving the intervals laid down as I stated. Upon an ordinary march and over an average road this column in the space of 10 miles would, in my opinion and with the best of troops, be extended from one-half to double its present length.

Question. What is the rate of travel per hour which results from the pace prescribed in tactics for infantry, and on a day's march what about will be the average rate of travel per hour of as large a column as we have under consideration?

The rate, as nearly as I recollect, laid down in tactics was 90 paces, consisting of 24 inches each, to the minute; the present rate is 110; also 160. At the rate of 90 steps a minute this will carry the soldier $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles per hour. At the rate of 110 it will carry him 3 miles per hour. With the movement of a column of 40,000 men, organized as the one we have under consideration, in my opinion it would require the best of management to move it at the rate of 2 miles per hour, and that with excellent roads. Over roads with breaks or ravines, where carriages might be detained, with so heavy a column, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles per hour for ten, or say eight hours, I should consider excellent marching.

Question. In the distribution of the 100 wagons per division I have supposed 3 to each regiment of infantry and 1 to each battery of artillery for hospital purposes (including ambulances); 2 to each regiment of infantry for ammunition, to make up, with what the soldier carries, 100 rounds per man. This makes 81 wagons to each division, leaving 19 wagons to each division for division, brigade, and regimental headquarters and for the troops. Would it be possible for troops to move upon the battle-field even with a less allowance?

This allowance occurs to me to be the very smallest limits the troops should move upon the battle-field with.

Question. Would it be proper ordinarily for an army of this size, in anticipation of battle, to move from its depots with as limited an allowance of ammunition as 100 rounds?

No, sir; my rule has been to move with 300; General Halleck required 500 in front of Corinth, and our orders were that everything should be left before the ammunition wagons. I do not know whether this extended through General Halleck's army; it extended through the Army of the Mississippi.

Question. Supposing an army to be moved even a distance of 30 or 40 miles from its depots, about how many days' rations should it have with it to guard against the ordinary interruptions in its communications by accident or the operations of the enemy?

I would answer not less than from ten to fifteen. There are so many considerations to enter into as to what should guide a commander under such circumstances that it is hardly possible to give an answer that would be definite, as the nature of the roads, the nature of the country, the exposed or not exposed position of your lines of communication; but under ordinary circumstances the estimate I have made would be the correct one. Again, an army may be moving through a country where there is beef and other supplies which the troops may obtain.

Question. Even supposing that the army is moving through a country from which it can supply itself with forage, will it ordinarily be necessary to carry a certain supply along on every day's march, or at least carry the transportation that will be necessary to bring it into camp at the termination of the march?

It is usual and necessary to carry always from one to three days' rations, inasmuch as it is impossible to tell where your camp may be. I always endeavor to carry two or three days'; it facilitates the march very much and enables you to encamp where you please; whereas if you have no forage you may be compelled to make half a march or a double one.

Question. Will or will not these various requirements unavoidably increase very considerably the train of the army beyond that which we have given in this supposed case?

Yes, sir; it will nearly or quite double it.

Question. But supposing this minimum allowance for a wagon train, that is, the allowance that an army would unavoidably carry with it upon the battle-field, and supposing the minimum increase in the space which the column will occupy on the march beyond that which results from theory, that is, an increase of one-half, making the length of the column on the march about 24 miles, how many hours would it take to move this column from one point to another point 12 miles distant; in other words, supposing the advance of the army to march at 5 o'clock in the morning, at what time will the rear of the column get into camp 12 miles distant? You may suppose also that the column moves at an average rate of 2 miles an hour.

Is it supposed that this column moves on one road?

Question. On one road.

My estimate must be an approximation; it is that the column would get into camp about eighteen hours after the advance started. I had occasion once to time a column, on a pretty good road and marching well, of 7,000 men. This column had no wagons, but had—

General TYLER. Mr. President, I object to the general's explanation, as he has already answered the question, and this explanation is an after-thought, commenced some two or three minutes after the question is answered.

General BUELL. I request that the witness be allowed to continue and give the result of his experience.

After some conversation General Buell continued: If the investigation is to be interrupted in this manner I must request that the objection be placed on the record. I will venture to say that the question as it is put is pertinent, and the answer which the witness proposes to give is one from which every one present may derive information, if not benefit. I have no hesitation in saying that it would be proper to refer to experience derived from campaigns in this country, to the Italian campaign, or any other if necessary. I can derive information from it, and I have no doubt General Tyler himself might also.

The PRESIDENT. The question and any objection made to it ought as a matter of course to be entered upon the record, but where the objection is withdrawn I see no necessity for it.

General ORD. I wish to call your attention to one fact, namely, that these frequent interruptions of the witness by calling upon the recorder to read what he has written takes up more time than the answer would. This question has been read over five times, three times at the request of General Tyler himself.

The PRESIDENT. Any remarks of this kind should be made in secret session.

(Some conversation here ensued as to the precise point at which General Tyler withdrew his objection, during which General Buell arose to retire, previous to which he remarked:)

General BUELL. General Tyler objected to the testimony that General Granger was giving, when I requested, as I have stated, that he might be allowed to proceed and state to the Commission the results of his experience, but General Tyler continued his objection, and said that we might as well investigate the campaign of Italy and he may have referred to other campaigns. I then made the remarks that are on the record, but the general persisted in his objection. If these interruptions are continued I will ask the gentlemen of the Commission to say whether I have stated the matter correctly or not.

The court was cleared, and a discussion having ensued, it was finally decided that—

“The record following the answer of the witness is confused, owing to the recorder not having taken all the conversations which occurred, and the Commission is unable to agree on the words that were spoken, and therefore leave the record unexplained as it stands.”

On the court being opened General BUELL said: Mr. President; I regret very much to delay your proceedings with personal matters, but they have not been of my seeking on this occasion; indeed, they are not on any occasion. In the explanation which I made to you before the court was cleared I made a statement of what occurred in connection with the objection of General Tyler to the answer which the witness was giving. I stated that General Tyler had objected to anything more than a categorical answer to the question which was put. I stated then that I gave reasons why the answer which the witness was giving was pertinent and proper. I stated then that I requested that the witness might be allowed to continue his answer. I stated also that General Tyler continued his objection to the answer. General Tyler then contradicted positively my statement that he had continued his objection. I believe he used the words "It is not true." I submit to you, sir, that it is not becoming the dignity of this Commission or of any member of this Commission that such scenes should occur, and I request that your record may be made distinct and positive on this point. I request that you may inquire whether my statement was correct; that you may consider among yourselves, and if you cannot agree, then that you may take the evidence of persons who were present as to whether the statement I made was correct or not. I am aware that this investigation is a tedious one; I am satisfied it is wearisome to every member of the Commission; it is unavoidably so to all of us. I have no desire to make it more so than is necessary. I consider the testimony which the witness was giving was proper and necessary in this investigation, and I have desired to bring nothing upon your record which I did not think proper and necessary.

General TYLER. I made the objection to the further answering of that question put by General Buell to General Granger, and the objection was noted, I believe, on the record. After General Buell made some observations to the court explaining the reason why he thought the question was a proper and pertinent one——

General BUELL. Allow me to interrupt. I do not desire any discussion between General Tyler and myself.

The PRESIDENT. (To General Tyler.) General, I must be allowed to say that, the record having been read before the Commission and fully canvassed in secret session, any remarks upon it are improper. If General Buell, to whom we are willing to extend the utmost courtesy, has been allowed to make a speech, if it may be so called, it is nothing but fair that General Tyler be allowed to make a reply; but for my own part I would suggest that at this point the court may be cleared, that it may decide on the question raised by the remarks of General Buell.

General BUELL. I would suggest that this is the proper course. If there are any remarks to be made by General Tyler I do not wish to hear them.

The PRESIDENT. If these remarks are to stand upon the record General Tyler has certainly a right to reply in open court.

General Buell here retired, and the court being cleared, General Tyler continued his remarks.

General TYLER. I withdrew my objection. General Buell, as I understood, subsequently asserted that I continued my objection after I had withdrawn it.

The following resolution was then adopted:

"The Commission are of opinion that the particular investigations requested by General Buell are foreign to the subjects legitimately before it.

"The examination of Major-General Granger will therefore continue."

On the court being opened——

General BUELL. I should like to hear all the record on this subject read from the time the witness was interrupted in his answer to the last question.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission have ordered that the examination should continue without further comment.

General BUELL. I wish nothing more than to verify the record of the remarks made by myself.

The PRESIDENT. At this time the object of the Commission is to proceed without further comment upon what has taken place this morning, and with that view I beg that you will permit the examination to lie over till you read the record from your own copy.

General BUELL. I am unwilling to be committed to a record made in that way; but if it is the decision of the Commission I have nothing more to say.

The PRESIDENT. That is the decision of the Commission.

some twelve or fifteen ambulances and two four-gun batteries, and taking a position about 2 miles from camp there awaited the approach of the column. The time in passing from the front to the rear was exactly two hours. It is upon this that I have in a measure made my estimate. At this ratio I have allowed twelve hours for the infantry and batteries to pass and six hours with a train. This answer is not given as a practical answer; it is given as a deduction from theory, from the fact that as the column is increased in numbers and its train in proportion it becomes more unwieldy and difficult to move. I do not know that any relative proportion where you increase the numbers and the consequent delay owing to this increase could be properly and accurately established.

Question. The calculation upon the data given shows that the army would make the distance in exactly the time stated. Do armies under ordinary circumstances march in this order when they are in the presence of an enemy, and how do you explain that under some circumstances they do make much greater distance in the aggregate?

In the movement of a heavy column in the vicinity of an enemy, to facilitate it in procuring water, camping grounds, fuel, forage, and also to avoid roads that are cut up by excessive travel, a commander would avail himself of all the roads lying parallel or nearly so or converging toward some common point of destination. If there was but one road, for convenience to his troops, facilities for camping, &c., he would divide it into two, three, or four bodies, moving them perhaps upon consecutive days. Thus divided upon the different roads or upon the same road, it is usual for these diminished columns to make the same distance or even greater distance in a much shorter period of time. This dispersion of troops, however, in the near vicinity of an enemy would be very injudicious. It would be necessary to keep them concentrated to prevent the enemy from falling upon them and defeat them in detail.

Question. Supposing the position of the enemy to be known, how close could the head of the column or army, moving on one road as we have supposed, properly approach that position before closing up its rear and putting itself somewhat in order of battle?

It will be necessary for me to suppose a case in order to give an answer to the question. If the country affords no cover, such as mountains, forests, streams, to conceal the approach of the army, and, again, should the enemy be on the alert, which the commander is supposed to know, keeping their front well reconnoitered and picketed, it would be extremely hazardous to move this column in the order described to within a less distance than 8 or 10 miles. At a point in this proximity it would be necessary at once to close up this column, and as fast as closed to form in order of battle, or at least to take position for a strong resistance until such time as the commander can close up his troops and make the necessary dispositions for battle. The nature of the country, the strength of the adversary, and his vigilance must always guide a commander in approaching an enemy in position. If he is satisfied that they have taken up their line of defense or line of battle and intend to give battle at that point, he may bring the head of his columns much nearer before deploying them. Should the country afford facilities to enable him to amuse or divert them by a powerful advance guard, he might bring them up to about two or three miles, and there close up and make his final arrangements for battle. Another fact that has much to do with this is points where water can be procured for the purpose of filling the men's canteens before going into action. In some instances it may be necessary to go near the enemy before deploying. The nature of the streams or springs may be such that but few men can procure water at the same time. A thousand considerations must influence the commander in movements and dispositions of this kind.

Question. Would the absence of water in sufficient quantity to suffice for an army any considerable time, say two or three days, sometimes prevent a commander from taking up a position which might have great strategic advantages and occupying that position for considerable time, during which the enemy may at his option give or avoid battle at that point?

If water could only be found sufficient for the use of the army at a distance of, say, half a day's march, it would be almost impossible in hot, dry weather to bring the troops in position in front of the enemy in a condition to fight a battle successfully. The absence of water might derange and perhaps destroy the best matured plan for battle, and at the same time afford corresponding advantages to the enemy. The advantages spoken of are that we can either give or refuse battle to the enemy.

Question. Suppose the army which we have taken as an example move toward an enemy whose position is not certainly known, who may be within 15 or 30 or 40 miles, and who is supposed to be at all times ready for battle, would it or would it not ordinarily be proper or necessary to move the army by short marches and in the compact manner you have supposed in answering the previous question?

It would be necessary to keep the troops well massed and in hand, in order to be ready at any hour for any emergency. It would also be necessary to see that they were not exhausted or worn-out by long and fatiguing marches.

Question. Would or would not a march of 12 miles, continued for several days in this manner, be a very serious tax upon the physical endurance of the troops?

Very great indeed. The rear of the column, amounting to nearly one-half, would find but little time for rest or repose. In a march of this nature, with the number of men supposed, the advance of the column would be in camp several hours before the rear would have moved; this would bring it in late at night or next morning or some time next day, according to the nature of the road and the country. The result would be, for the rear of the column, that night would be turned into day, and in a very few days, with all the changes by alternating divisions, placing one in front one day and then another and then another, after a march of one week the commander would find it necessary and important for the rest of his troops to lay by from one to three days.

Question. State, if you please, if you have received a military education, and what experience you have had in military service, especially in the movement of large bodies of troops.

I am a graduate of West Point; graduated in 1845, and have been in the Army since that time; have been brigadier-general nearly twelve months and major-general about six months. Served through the campaign of General Scott in Vera Cruz and the termination of the Mexican war; had a command for the last year varying from 5,000 to 25,000; served with a large army at the siege of New Madrid and Island No. 10, with an army, I believe, of some 30,000, as near as I recollect, and commanded a division at that place. Was also at the siege of Corinth, under Major-General Halleck, with an army of about 120,000; subsequently commanded two divisions until I came to the Department of the Ohio; most of that time have commanded the forces in Kentucky of 18,000 to 26,000. During this service enumerated, with the exception of a few months in Kentucky, have been on active duty in presence of or near the enemy.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Would not the officers connected with the Army of the Ohio who accompanied that army from Chattanooga to Louisville have better opportunities for estimating the strength of Bragg's forces than the officers in Louisville?

Yes, sir; up to a certain time they would.

Question. If a majority of those officers having a better opportunity of making an estimate, some of them actually within the enemy's lines, fix that force at from 35,000 to 40,000, are your sources of information of such a character that you could venture to contradict them?

General BUELL. I object to the question, sir, for the reasons which I gave when a similar question was put to Brigadier-General Smith.

(The court was cleared; after discussion it was decided that the question be put.)

The WITNESS. I do not regard my estimate as to the strength of General Bragg's army as any contradiction whatever. Their opinions were based upon the best sources of information to be obtained; so are mine also. Instead of a contradiction it is but an honest difference of opinion.

Question. Were your sources of information such that you can inform the Commission what officers commanded Bragg's right wing at Munfordville?

I cannot now positively call to mind, though I knew at the time perfectly well; my recollection is that General Polk commanded, but I am not positive.

Question. Do you know or do you recollect the officers commanding his left wing?

I did know at the time. I suppose that with a little thought it will all come back to me. It is a question of memory upon names which I am unable to recall.

Question. Were Hardee, Buckner, Anderson, Johnson, Polk, Cheat-ham, Withers, and Jones the officers having command under Bragg?

I recollect Hardee being mentioned as commanding one of the wings, I think the right; but, as I said before, I cannot be positive. I recollect the names of Polk, Buckner, and Cheatham very well, but as to Jones and Anderson being in connection with this army I am not so positive.

Question. Supposing the general officers under Bragg should number eight, what number would you estimate Bragg's army at upon the same principle that you fixed the number of Kirby Smith's in your examination-in-chief?

I do not think I enunciated any principle with respect to Kirby Smith's force. The question arose about general officers who were there. I think I stated distinctly that my information came from prisoners, officers, soldiers, and citizens. I also obtained that information from officers of General George [W.] Morgan at Cumberland Gap about that time. With reference to the strength of Bragg's forces, it was obtained in the same way, and in addition to this from men who were captured belonging to different regiments. We had in our possession prisoners and sick from one hundred and seventy-seven regiments of infantry; the number of cavalry I do not recollect, but it was a large cavalry force. I also had information from that army from very intelligent deserters—officers who had deserted. Putting all those things together, you have the data upon which my answer is founded.

Question. If you had representatives from one hundred and seventy-seven regiments of Bragg's army, upon what principle did you fix that number at 55,000?

That does not necessarily fix the number at 55,000; it is only corroborative, as I regard it, of my estimated strength, after having it enumerated by those and by others who had opportunities of judging. And again it strengthens my assertion of my estimate very much; having representatives from so many regiments, it is almost positive proof that they had that number of regiments or skeletons of them; they were represented in his force.

Question. With that fact alone, of your having representatives from one hundred and seventy-seven regiments, what estimate could you make of the force under Bragg?

A very fair way to arrive at it would be to ascertain how long, or about how long, these regiments had been in service, their strength at the time of entering into service, and my own experience of the decimation of the original number, of what it would be up to a certain date, taking always our own forces as a standard, in the way they are thinned out by battle, sickness, disease, &c. Those who are experienced in the military service are capable of forming something like an approximate estimate not varying very materially from the truth.

Question. In making that estimate you calculate upon the fact that you have representatives from every regiment in Bragg's army?

No, sir; not necessarily. We may have prisoners from one quarter, one-half, or four-fifths; it is fair to suppose that we would have representatives from nearly all. After their hard marching, the battle of Perryville, and the haste with which they got out of the country, more or less men would be left behind, broken down and sick, perhaps from every regiment.

Question. Were those representatives of the regiments taken previous to or subsequent to the battle of Perryville?

Both previous to, subsequently, and at it.

Question. Your estimate, then, is of the entire force in Kentucky, and not that directly under Bragg between Bardstown and Chattanooga?

My estimate was of the force that Bragg entered Kentucky with and had in front of Louisville.

Question. What was the number of the Army of the Ohio at the time it was concentrated at Bowling Green?

I only know what I have been told by officers of that army, and my recollection of it at the time is it was about 42,000; but I have not thought of it or spoken of it since particularly.

Question. Can you understand why with the forces such as you state them General Bragg gave up so strong a position as Munfordville and hurried off to Bardstown?

The only reason I have ever heard given was that he was out of subsistence and none could be procured there; that he moved up to meet trains sent by Smith to supply him.

Question. Did he not meet these supplies at Bardstown?

I do not know; from the fact that he tarried there I gather that he did.

Question. Was it not as possible to get those supplies from Bardstown to Munfordville as to march the army from Munfordville to Bardstown?

It was not so safe to do it; in fact there was a force at Shepherdstown and also at Salt River; our cavalry was also scouting in that direction. He would have run great risk of their being cut off. The bulk of Smith's army, I think, was on the other side of Kentucky River; perhaps a small guard with those trains.

Commission adjourned to meet February 19.

CINCINNATI, February 19, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General G. GRANGER'S examination continued.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What was the number of regiments under Bragg at Munfordville and what did those regiments average?

I have already stated what I know in regard to the number of regiments; as to what they averaged it is impossible for me to tell. In order to do it I should have to know the number of batteries and the amount of cavalry he had. My recollection is that he had some thirty-eight regiments of cavalry.

Question. The regiments you spoke of were those of the combined forces of Kirby Smith and Bragg, were they not?

No, sir.

Question. Is the Commission then to understand from your statement that Bragg had one hundred and seventy-seven regiments?

I do not know that I could be clearer on that point. It may be necessary to explain in brief that I obtained this information from the provost-marshal at Louisville and from General Boyle and others; but whether they stated that they were Bragg's regiments exclusively or Bragg's and Kirby Smith's combined I do not remember at this time. It was spoken of in a rambling conversation, and it may have been that they meant so. I have heard others speak of it, but I do not know that that point was ever settled.

Question. Are not the rebel regiments as a general thing more reduced by sickness than our own?

I believe they are, sir. This is the experience of those I have seen, such as prisoners captured, &c. At Island No. 10, where we took about 7,000 prisoners, which I helped to load, I remember the regiments were very small in consequence of sickness, desertion, and other causes.

Question. In the extraordinary movement made by Bragg, cutting loose from his base of supplies and not only living upon the country he invaded but marching into that country in the face of a well-organized and efficient army, do you not recognize that an army of 30,000 would be still more efficient than an army of 60,000 for such a purpose; and if with 25,000 or 30,000 he could accomplish so daring a movement, would it not be impossible with twice that force?

The supposition of this question, to my mind, is clearly erroneous. In the first place Bragg had two bases. The best information that I have is that he left Chattanooga with twenty days' rations at or near Chattanooga. After leaving that base of supplies he marched with the evident intention of reaching his new base of supplies already established in Kentucky by Kirby Smith, where he had every reason to believe abundant supplies would be found on his arrival there. The greater the number of men Bragg moved with in the face of a well-appointed army the greater his security, the more audacious his movements and the more able he would be to harass and annoy this well-appointed force; and unless the Federal force was handled with great care he could keep it in constant jeopardy, while with this smaller force of 20,000 men he could be pushed before it in all directions either by the whole force or by a fraction of it. The larger force would enable him to offer battle and with fair prospects of success, while under but few, if any, circumstances would it be wise or judicious to risk a battle with one-third of the number supposed.

Question. In what respect does my supposition differ from that of yours in answer to a question put to you on the 17th, which reads as follows: "The movement made by Bragg is almost without a parallel. Cutting loose from his base of supplies and skedaddling all over the country is something of which history scarcely affords a parallel; and it might well puzzle a general wishing to attack him to ferret out his movements. The supposition was that when he was cut off from his base of supplies we had him, but it seems that he never lived so well as he did after his arrival in Kentucky"?

The difference that I observe is this: Bragg made no effort that I ever heard of to keep open the communications with his base at Battle Creek or Chattanooga; nevertheless that was only one of his bases, but he did not choose to lose it for the reason that he had supplies in advance. On arriving again in Kentucky this again became his new base, and after a time he cut loose from that, and in neither case did he attempt to keep his communications open.

Question. Where did you learn the fact that Bragg carried twenty days' supplies from Chattanooga?

I learned it from the statements of his own men, as well as from our own officers.

Question. What number of wagons did he allow to a brigade for the purpose of carrying provisions from Chattanooga?

I do not know that I ever heard. I heard General McCook say something about the length of their train, but about what it was has escaped my memory. The impression made upon my mind was that it was a train of considerable length, but that they moved with less transportation than ourselves. General Wood or General Rousseau told me of the hard time they had in getting their train over Barren River.

Question. Did Generals McCook, Thomas, Wood, or indeed any officers of the Army of the Ohio tell you that Bragg left Chattanooga with more than ten days' provisions?

I do not know that I have heard so from any one of those you have mentioned, but certainly a number of them told me so. I think in a conversation in General Buell's headquarters at Louisville, when, as near as I remember, General Thomas, General

Nelson, General Wright (I believe), also, I think, General Rousseau, Mr. James Guthrie, and several other gentlemen, also General Finnell, were there, it was stated by one or by all that he did leave Battle Creek, in front of Chattanooga. That conversation made more impression on me than any that I recall. From some surgeons of Bragg's army who were prisoners I have had the same statement; also from officers who were left behind. I asked them if they had full rations, and they replied that they had no coffee, and I think they said they had but half rations of flour and salt meat. They had some beef that they drove along, and the cavalry picked up some beef and sheep in the country. About their living better in Kentucky than they ever did before, that was their statement—that they had provisions in greater abundance and of better quality than they had found before or at any time during the war.

Question. General, I will ask you to tax your memory and state to the Commission precisely what General Thomas did say as to the amount of provisions taken from Chattanooga by Bragg.

It will be impossible. I cannot state that General Thomas said it. I am sure General Buell said it, and I judged it was the universal opinion, because there was no dissenting voice. It seemed a settled fact. It was one of those consultations or councils that occasionally took place, and where I took no notes as to what any individual said; it was one of those conversations, having only a momentary importance, where we were reviewing the history of the whole thing—the point started from, the length of time on the march, comparing the routes and about what distance the two armies had marched. It would be impossible to state whether General Thomas or General Rousseau said it, but this was the conversation in which the fact was stated. General Buell I am sure stated it on this occasion; how he obtained the knowledge I do not know. I suppose he obtained it as we all obtain such information. I had heard the same thing before.

Question. What time did Bragg take to march from Chattanooga to Sparta?

I do not recollect, sir.

Question. Did the officers of the Army of the Ohio inform you that he arrived at Sparta with his army very much distressed from fatiguing marches and lack of supplies?

Not that I recollect.

Question. Did they not inform you that from Sparta to Bardstown he lived upon the country he marched through?

Only so far as I have mentioned. They obtained only partial supplies—beef and mutton; and, further, I did not get that information from our own officers, but from Bragg's officers and men.

Question. Were your opportunities and means of obtaining information as to the force and position of Bragg's and Kirby Smith's army superior to those you had of obtaining information of the force and position of General Buell's army at that period of time?

At what period of time or between what periods of time?

Question. At the same time at which you are estimating the force and position of Bragg.

My facilities for ascertaining the number of Kirby Smith's force, I judge, must have been quite equal to if not better than those of General Buell up to his arrival at Louisville. I further judge that my means and facilities of information whereby to judge of the strength of Bragg's force after its arrival at Munfordville, or perhaps a little sooner, were about the same as his own. What information he had I believe he communicated to me freely; he had spies out, so had I, and sometimes I communicated with him two or three times a day and he with me. We had information from prisoners, spies, and deserters who were coming in; besides we had men in our employ who visited their camps, who would go and stay three or four days at a time. Previous to the arrival of Bragg's army of course General Buell's facilities must have been greater than those of any other officer, as he was in that immediate section of country. I will now add that I supposed I was the first officer that reported the movements of this army from the time it left Tupelo. I was then in position to know more, being at the time in command of the advance guard of the whole army of Corinth, from 25 to 40 miles in front of Corinth. Through spies and deserters, while at Booneville, Blackland, Rienzi, and Baldwyn, I was the first to learn that that army was moving in the direction of Chattanooga, and so reported it through General Roscerans to the commander-in-chief. I took great pains to ascertain the number of troops, dates of departure, composition of the army, and its destination. The movements of the rebel army and the approximate numbers I reported from day to day in the months of July and August last. These facts gave me more early data, and perhaps quite as reliable, as to the strength of the expeditionary force which left Tupelo for Kentucky. This furthermore led me to watch with great care this movement to Chattanooga and all its subsequent movements till it reached Kentucky.

Question. You fix the strength of Bragg's army at 52,000 to 55,000 and Kirby Smith's at 18,000, making in all about 73,000. At what do you fix the force General Buell had before its arrival at Louisville and what was its strength when it left Louisville to meet Bragg?

I think I stated yesterday that my recollection of General Buell's force when concentrated at Bowling Green, after he left Nashville, was 42,000. I asked Colonel Fry, his chief of staff, not long since about what force they left Louisville with. He replied he could only tell me in round numbers, in consequence of the hurry of organizing the new troops which were coming in, and which was proceeded with day and night. He put it in round numbers at 65,000 to 70,000—70,000 was my impression. He added further, as a reason why he did not know exactly, that before they got accurate returns the battle of Perryville had been fought, and that on their way a great many had straggled and broken down from hard marching and want of water, and never would be accounted for, owing perhaps to the officers being new and ignorant of the mode of making out returns. Colonel Fry's statement I judge to be most reliable, though I have heard it stated by others, who were officers of the line and not of the staff, that it was 90,000, and by some 100,000.

Question. Did you understand him to say that those 70,000 included Sill's division?

Yes, sir; the entire force.

Question. Would not the returns, under the circumstances you have mentioned, be very interesting in giving the full force of the Army of the Ohio in its march from Louisville to Perryville?

I have so stated. I will qualify it by saying that about the returns of the old troops there would be no difficulty; it was with the new re-enforcements, which had but just arrived.

Question. Are not the officers more numerous in the rebel army in proportion to the number of men than in ours?

I will state that as to their organization I am not sufficiently familiar with it to give a positive answer. From their own officers, and from intercepted orders, letters, &c., I judge their regimental and company organizations to be the same as our own, but I am satisfied they have more staff officers than we have—major-generals, lieutenant-generals, and generals. I have been told that by themselves, and it has been corroborated by orders and military communications of theirs I have picked up.

Question. As a general rising of the people was anticipated in Kentucky, might not the excess of officers that accompanied Kirby Smith be accounted for by the fact that they were sent to organize the new levies?

I think it reasonable to suppose that this might account for any surplus of officers, if there were any. Having been stationed in the midst of the people where they attempted to raise troops, I had opportunities of knowing something of the organizations that were attempted there. Such troops as were organized were officered as far up as the grade of brigadier by gentlemen who were found in Kentucky on their arrival there. I heard it stated that Buckner came in expecting to raise a division or more of Kentuckians during his stay there, and that Mr. William Preston was to have a command that was to be raised. The only brigade I know of their raising, and that was a very feeble one, was officered by General Buford, who was in Kentucky on the arrival of the Confederate forces. One of the difficulties they found in Kentucky, I have ascertained, was this; that Bragg wished to fill up his decimated regiments with recruits obtained in Kentucky rather than form any new organizations until that was done. This statement was made by people there and by those who started off and returned. It was set forth as one reason why there were not more joining them; they were willing to make up organizations of their own, but they were not willing to fill up regiments in the Confederate Army just where they were required.

Question. Do you know that the Army of the Ohio left 18,000 [?] wagons at Bowling Green, and was therefore unencumbered by trains?

I cannot answer as to Bowling Green. I heard it stated that General Buell had left his transportation; I think it was between Munfordville and Louisville; I am not certain as to the point. I think it was after Bragg had changed his course and deviated in the direction of Bardstown that a brigade or division was ordered to fetch it up. They were making a forced march, and thought it better to lose the transportation than not to head Bragg off for Louisville or reach there the time he did. I only remember it being stated that the transportation was left somewhere on the road, and that it came in some two or three days after the arrival of the army.

Question. Was a junction formed by Kirby Smith and Bragg; and, if so, where and on what day?

The best information I have is that Kirby Smith marched from Harrodsburg on October 9, and became the rear guard of Bragg's army about the time of its arrival at Camp Dick Robinson. About this junction I never have been able to ascertain; I have not seen any one who seemed to know. There appeared to be some bewilderment or doubt about it. It was said that a portion struck off by Somerset and another portion followed in the rear of Bragg. I have made a great many inquiries and made a great deal of investigation, but no one seemed to know exactly what day, and I came to the conclusion that on or about the 9th or 10th of October he moved from Harrodsburg in the direction of Bryantsville and Camp Dick Robinson, and my belief is (though I have never been able to solve the thing by sufficiently reliable information to say what he did or what he did not do) that about that time he became the rear guard of Bragg's army. My reason for believing that he formed the rear guard is from the complaints of the citizens along the route. I have seen a great many of these people along toward Cumberland Gap, Barbourville, and London. They said that he murdered a great many; there were sixteen Union men hung at Rockcastle River, which Smith has the credit of doing. They spoke of this as being so very different from his conduct when he entered Kentucky. Then he met the people with smiles and affability and gave them more protection than they wanted; but after he failed in being able to obtain recruits he turned his troops upon them through his disappointment at finding that he was to be driven from the State.

Question. Supposing your calculation in your examination-in-chief to be correct, that Bragg's and Smith's army consisted of 73,000 men, with their guns, wagons, ambulances, &c.; these armies combined commenced their retreat from Camp Dick Robinson on the morning after the battle of Perryville; how long would it be before the rear guard of the army would leave the camp and where would the advance be at that time?

As to that it is hardly possible to suppose they were combined.

Question. In making that supposition that there were 73,000 men, upon the best of your calculation what would your answer be to that question?

Do you want a mathematical calculation as to how long it would take 73,000 men to get out of Camp Dick Robinson?

Question. Yes, sir.

I gave eighteen hours as a theoretical deduction, which is as far from practical as one could possibly put it. I also stated that as you increase the force it becomes more unwieldy in a much larger proportion than the real increase of numbers. The head of such an army as that would reach Cumberland Gap before the rear would get out of Camp Dick Robinson. From Camp Dick Robinson to Cumberland Gap I believe is a distance of about 115 miles. In the forced marches they made it would take them forty-eight hours. They did not move, however, in that way. When Smith reached Camp Dick Robinson, Bragg's force was all out and on different roads.

Question. Did they separate on different roads before they reached Lancaster?

I am unable to answer that positively; the map does not show the country roads.

Their trail was 3 to 5 miles wide, through fields, country roads, and everything. The great object they had in view was to get into the mountains of Big Hill, where they would be safe from pursuit. The position they sought was very strong by nature. The appearance of the country and the statements of citizens who reside at Richmond and between there and Big Hill seem to show that they went off like a flock of sheep, every one on his own hook, but that the rear kept in good order.

Question. What roads did they take after leaving Lancaster?

I learned that they took the great pike to London; thence to Barbourville; thence to Cumberland Gap. It was possible after reaching Barbourville, perhaps, from London that a portion of them went through Big Creek Gap and Rogers' Gap. Those gaps are very good for infantry and light-loaded wagons and very bad for anything else. The main body, however, passed through Cumberland Gap, Question. Did not a portion of that army go through Lowell by Gum Spring and Valley and Big Hill?

I am unable to say. It is some time since this occurred, and I have had my head so full of other roads, streams, and other details that the particulars have escaped me. The supposition of yours that there were 73,000—my answer being on the record—it might be inferred that I considered there were 73,000; from this, however, we must deduct for loss from sickness, deserters, battle, and losses at Perryville, and from all I learn these could not be less than from 12,000 to 15,000 men. Kirby Smith left a good many sick in Frankfort and quite a number down on his march. This force, from the time of his entrance into Kentucky to his exit, instead of being augmented, was reduced several thousand. I sent off myself from sick alone some 3,000 or 4,000 that he left at different points.

Question. An army of, say, 60,000 men marching upon one road from Harrodsburg to Camp Dick Robinson, would Dick's River be no obstruction had that army been attacked by the Army of the Ohio while crossing?

If the army was attacked while crossing it certainly would be an obstruction, but had this army marching from Harrodsburg a few hours' start and its columns organized it would be a great advantage.

Question. General, please look at the copy of the letter marked A and state to the Commission if you know anything about it.

To the best of my recollection this is a copy of a letter shown me by General Nelson in Louisville some time about the 23d of September, the date of the letter.

(The letter is read to the Commission.)

Question. Was your advice to form a junction with the Army of the Ohio made previous to the reception of that letter or subsequently?

I am unable positively to state, but I think it was previous; what makes me think so was the little progress we had made in intrenching; we had done very little, and my advice was to drop it and call in the men. The intrenching was carried on very rapidly, but at the time I was advised to make this movement we had done very little. I urged as a further reason that by going on with the work we should only complete the trenches for the enemy's use against ourselves.

Question. Where was the Army of the Ohio, do you recollect, at the time you made your proposition?

I could not name the point. My calculation was this: leaving Louisville at dark, we would be enabled to reach Elizabethtown, by a forced march, some time late in the next day or night, and that General Buell on the advance of the Army of the Ohio would reach it at about the same time as we would. I do not remember, in fact I do not know, that I knew the names of the camping grounds; it was at such a distance that I deemed it possible and probable that both armies would come into Elizabethtown about the same time and form a junction there.

Question. Had your advice been acted upon, what would have prevented Bragg taking our army in detail, taking your raw recruits first?

The relative position of the three armies—the Army of the Ohio, the Army of Louisville, and Bragg's army—was such as to render it almost impossible, owing to the nature of the country. It would have been necessary for Bragg to have passed directly across General Buell's front in order to place his army upon our line of march, or to make so large a detour around by Bardstown pike as to give us more than ample time to form a junction. Had Bragg attempted this he would have been directly between the two armies and in the angle formed by Salt River and the Ohio, and from this position it would have been impossible to extricate himself. There are no roads suitable for movements of an army between the Salt River and the Bardstown pike, after leaving Louisville a few miles, till you approach the neighborhood of Elizabethtown.

Question. Had this junction been attempted what would have prevented Kirby Smith occupying Louisville and destroying the canal, &c.?

Nothing particular; that is just what I should have wanted him to have done had he come to Louisville; that means we would have forced him to a junction. We were afraid that Smith would try to keep open the route to Frankfort, in order to make his own escape. Had Smith moved on Louisville and had the junction of our forces been completed the entire rebel army, including Bragg's and Smith's, would certainly have been bagged in the angle formed by the Kentucky and the Ohio. By Smith's remaining in Central Kentucky he could have escaped at any time either by Pound Gap or Cumberland Gap, or as Bragg moved up he would have passed out of the State at New Haven.

Question. Bragg, you say, left Battle Creek direct for Glasgow; what object had he in view in making that march?

Well, sir, he had two objects. In the first place, there were two objective points, which he undoubtedly amply considered, and one of the great objects he was in hopes of accomplishing. The objective point was the city of Nashville and the second Kentucky. By this flank march of his he evidently intended, if possible, to force the evacuation of Nashville. Should he not succeed in this, however, he would move directly for Kentucky, thereby drawing the great bulk of our forces in that direction. Had General Buell been forced to evacuate Nashville for want of subsistence and supplies the first objective point was carried, the result being to relieve Tennessee of the possession of the Federal troops. Fortunately, however, we had both rations and force sufficient to hold Nashville and at the same time take care of Bragg. Had General Buell remained at Nashville with his entire force, supposing that he had subsistence, Bragg would have moved on his communications into Kentucky and taken Louisville and Cincinnati, the consequence of which you can all judge.

Question. Had Bragg made a successful stand at Munfordville would he not have accomplished both objects?

For him to have made a successful stand at Munfordville it would have been necessary for General Buell to have offered him battle. I believe I stated previously that it would not have been judicious for him to have done so, but to have passed Bragg and drawn him from his stronghold rather than to fight an unequal battle. Had Bragg overthrown General Buell or held him in check it certainly must have caused the destruction of his army. As to whether he had force sufficient to return and besiege Nashville and at the same time carry on operations in Kentucky is very doubtful. Under those circumstances General Buell would have been forced to have passed him, which had he done or attempted to do Bragg would have been forced to move. At the time General Buell got in his rear the order of things would have been reversed and Bragg's army would have been destroyed.

Question. You say it is contrary to the maxim and science of war to divide your force. Which was better, to leave 20,000 in Nashville or to throw 10,000 into Munfordville?

You must develop that question. I must say it is not clear.

Question. Which would be better, to divide the Army of the Ohio between Bowling Green and Nashville or between Bowling Green and Munfordville?

Well, with Nashville in General Buell's rear and Bragg on his flank and rather in advance, certainly it would be much safer to leave a force in Nashville than it would to send forward a force of 10,000 men to Munfordville, when Bragg's army was much nearer to it than he was himself with his main body. In my judgment 20,000 men are better anywhere than 10,000.

Question. Suppose General Buell had promptly massed his army at Lebanon or Gallatin directly after Bragg passed out of the Sequatchie Valley at or near Sparta, would he not have covered Nashville and blocked Bragg's progress into Kentucky by way of Munfordville?

It occurs to me that this is supposing an impossibility. The supplies of the Army of the Ohio were in Nashville, it being its base. Bragg occupying the road spoken of, could it have been possible for him to have massed them there? I should say yes, though I do not see myself how it could have been done. To march on a road to a certain point it is very necessary to get possession of it before the enemy does. Whether that was possible, not being there at the time, I am unprepared to say. I have heard it stated, though, by officers of the Army of the Ohio that the Army of the Ohio was forced by the Nashville route for two reasons: first, for supplies, and, second, to place it in a defensive condition, as it was not their object to give it up if it could possibly be avoided. Furthermore, those routes are as follows: The direct route, the one that Bragg took, was a chord of a circle, while the route via Nashville was the circle itself, the latter much longer.

Question. Do you recollect the names of those officers of the Army of the Ohio who gave you that information?

Colonel Fry I know was one, and I think General Crittenden; but it is almost impossible for me to call names. I have talked with the general officers upon this campaign and subject a great deal, but I cannot say positively whether with this or that one. I talked a great deal with Colonel Fry, because he knew as much, perhaps more, than most of them.

Question. Allowing Generals Thomas, McCook, Negley, Wood, and other general officers who participated on the field and in all movements of the army to be equally proficient with yourself in the science of war, would not those officers be better able to explain the movements, plans, &c., of the campaign in Kentucky and Tennessee than yourself?

I must say that I do not see the advantages on either side particularly. They should be quite as much so, but I do not know particularly that they should be any more so. It does not follow, Mr. Judge-Advocate, neither is it important or necessary for an officer to tread over every acre of ground or to be there on the spot with an army to comprehend the plans of the campaign, the movements, or the reasons for those movements. Some of the worst descriptions of battles and campaigns I have received were from persons who were all through them. It depends a great deal upon the commander. Some commanders are always calling councils of war; others act upon their own judgment, give their orders, and hold themselves responsible for them. General McCook told me on one occasion that he never knew what General Buell was going to do. Again, the duties of a commander on the field with the troops are very arduous, or should be, if he takes good care of them.

Question. Are not the actual circumstances attending a campaign so varied and expanded and the maxims of war so numerous that a supposable case gives little or no light?

The rules and maxims of war, combined with experience such as a commander should have, may be fixed and infallible, and all the great disasters that have happened to armies have originated in nineteen cases out of twenty, I will venture to say, by deviating from them. When a general knows his front of operations, the configuration of the country, the strength of the enemy, and his capacity as a commander, the strength and quality of his troops, he is almost perfectly prepared to foresee and anticipate everything material that should take place. Those circumstances which appear to the casual observer or unprofessional soldier to be accidental are but the incidents and circumstances brought about by the different movements, such as feints, threats, marches, counter-marches, and many of the ways which are at the disposal of the contestants.

Question. Was not Bragg's extraordinary march in and out of Kentucky in violation of the more important maxims of war; and was not the attempt to meet him by the strict adherence to such maxims of war a hinderance to our success?

The march of Bragg was certainly a very extraordinary one. After he found he could not force the evacuation of Nashville he certainly did violate, to a certain extent, some of the fundamental rules of war; but he had in justification the fact of his newly established base in Kentucky. As to the adherence to the rules of war by the Army of the Ohio, it was certainly the only thing that saved it. If General Buell had pursued directly after Bragg he would have found himself in a short time many miles from any supplies, following in the wake of an army that had devastated and stripped the whole country in front of him. He would have lost Bowling Green for certain, perhaps Nashville, and perhaps his army. There is no doubt, although Bragg made a successful raid into Kentucky, that he certainly lost ten times more than he accomplished. He lost his reputation for one thing, and was removed from his command for a time; and I suppose the round trip cost him not less than 20,000 men, besides the wear and tear and destruction of his material of war. It is true, at the same time, it put us to a great deal of inconvenience and set us back in our operations, but I do not see how it advanced him. I think he would have done better to have remained in front of General Buell, kept in position there, and worried his communications, with a fair prospect of success in starving him out before the railroad could have been opened and kept open or before there was enough water in the Cumberland for transportation.

By General TYLER :

Question. When did Bragg's army leave Tupelo ?

To the best of my knowledge and recollection it commenced the movement on July 8.

Question. By what route did it move and to what point ?

The infantry, artillery, carriages, pieces, &c., moved down via Mobile by rail to Chattanooga; the cavalry, artillery, horses, and trains moved off across the country, passing through Tuscaloosa for one point; it then went direct to Rome, thence to Chattanooga.

Question. What time did the advance of Bragg's army arrive at Chattanooga ?

His first advance met with a detention of some kind on the railroad. My best recollection is that it was about July 18. The two engineers on the road told me when they left and the number of cars; this was one of the most reliable sources of information.

Question. What was the amount of force that left Tupelo in July ?

From information that I received from these men and the spy I had there, who was a railroad man, my estimate was 58,000 to 60,000. Everything was ordered to go away except the little force of Price and Van Dorn. I presume they did. Most of the cavalry force was left behind about that time. I think they sent over about 4,000 cavalry during the month of June. About this time they were very busy getting in conscripts to take the place of those troops, and for which they were holding meetings all over the country there. A small division of this force, under Breckinridge, was diverted subsequently; I think it went to Baton Rouge and Vicksburg; but that I understood was only some 7,000 or 8,000 men.

Question. Did I understand you to say that all the rebel forces that were at Corinth, with the exception of Van Dorn's and Price's divisions and this division of Breckinridge's, were sent to Chattanooga ?

So I understood.

Question. Were the divisions of Van Dorn and Price in Mississippi the same they had at the siege of Corinth ?

I understood all the Missourians remained behind, with a portion of the Texans and a portion of the Arkansians. The divisions were not the same; they took from them some Texas and Arkansas troops, but how many I am unable to say. The force at leaving (of which I had good opportunities of learning, for they were very careless about the camp) that Price and Van Dorn had was only from 16,000 to 18,000 men.

Question. I understand, general, from your testimony that all the troops that were at Corinth, the conscripts that were drawn in between the abandonment of Corinth and the time this army moved, with the exception of 23,000 men, were sent to Chattanooga ?

Yes; that was my information.

Question. If Bragg had occupied Louisville would he not have destroyed the canal at that point; and, if so, what would have been the effect upon the transportation above the Falls and on the military operations then and since in progress?

I presume he would have destroyed the canal. I do not know enough about the nature of the Falls and the canal there to give an intelligent opinion. I only saw it once in passing through it; but I know nothing about the depth of water at low or high water. I know Beauregard recommended it to be destroyed as a compensation for the sinking of stone ships in Charleston Harbor.

Question. Would not the destruction of that canal cause the entire cessation of all transportation except at high water?

From the fact that there is a canal there I presume it would.

Question. Were you stationed at Louisville any length of time?

About two weeks, I think.

Question. At what time?

I think from about the 16th or 17th of September till the 1st or 3d of October.

Question. You never considered the value of that canal in reference to the military operations of the country or the defense of Louisville?

I did not consider it in reference to the defense of Louisville nor as to the effect it would have upon military operations. We had more than we could do to organize our troops and get our intrenchments in order.

Question. Between the 16th or 17th of September and the 1st to the 3d of October did you receive or see any dispatches from General Buell proposing or asking any co-operation on the part of the forces in and about Louisville with his military operations then in progress?

No, sir; except the paper marked A, presented to me this morning, respecting the sending of rations as far as Brandenburg.

Question. General, do you know of your own knowledge that Kirby Smith's army ever passed through Harrodsburg?

No, sir.

Question. You state in your testimony that they did pass through. Please give the sources of your information.

I obtained it from spies, residents of the country, prisoners, and from wounded and sick left behind.

Question. You stated in your examination this morning that Kirby Smith's army you understood formed the rear of Bragg's as it retreated from Camp Dick Robinson, although you did not know that it made a junction. What inducement would they have had to pass through Harrodsburg?

Because the direct and best pike leads through Harrodsburg. I call to mind, however, that a small portion of it for some reason did pass down on the north side of Kentucky, but it is a roundabout road, and came over in the direction of Hickman Bridge, crossed the country, and came into Camp Dick Robinson; but the great mass of it moved as I have described.

Question. Do I understand you to say that the direct road from Camp Dick Robinson is by Harrodsburg?

Yes, sir; the best route. The pike goes down by Lawrenceburg; thence to Harrodsburg; thence to Dicksville; thence to Bryantsville. It is the great traveled road and the only one suitable for the army.

Question. Is not the point Salvisa, on the Harrodsburg road, the point where they would naturally attempt to reach Camp Dick Robinson by the shortest road, and is not Harrodsburg some miles in advance of Salvisa?

Some little distance. I do not remember the number of miles just now. I never heard and can see no reason why they should go there except to come back again on the main road; they would get into a road that was almost impracticable, steep, and rugged.

Question. Did or did not the greater part of Bragg's army pass over Dick's River by a pass in the neighborhood of Salvisa?

Yes, sir; they passed over the only crossing there is. It is the only place to cross from Harrodsburg through Dicksville direct to Bryantsville.

Question. Do you mean us to understand that there is no practicable road passing from Salvisa to the crossing that Bragg's army made over Dick's River except by the way of Harrodsburg?

It is the only crossing of Dick's River, and the best road is to go through Harrodsburg. If you are at Salvisa on the left or Danville on the right you strike the same place and come into the common road.

Question. Just look on the map and fix your eye on McMinville and Sparta. Suppose Bragg's army to be concentrated at Sparta and General Buell's at McMinville and the destination of both had been Glasgow, which would reach Glasgow first, supposing transportation, &c., to have been equal?

Taking the roads as they are, Bragg seems to be several miles nearer Glasgow than the troops at McMinville.

Question. Supposing General Buell's army had ten days' advantage, which should have reached there first?

Why, General Buell, of course.

Question. How did Bragg and Kirby Smith subsist their armies in Kentucky and Tennessee? Was it by voluntary contributions or by levies made on the citizens?

I understand Bragg's supplies and depots were at Columbus and Atlanta, just in his rear, on the line of railway; from these points he drew them, whatever the Confederate Government supplied. Whether they seized, impressed, or purchased them I am unable to say. Whenever I have been near them they took supplies and the people said did not pay for them. Kirby Smith's army, up to its departure for Kentucky, was supplied from the same depots. He carried enough to last him till he struck the blue-grass region of Kentucky; there he had his subsistence and paid for it in Confederate money. From Union people he took at his own price and in his own way.

Commission adjourned to meet February 20, 1863.

CINCINNATI, February 20, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

JAMES B. BECK (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name, if you please, and place of residence.

James B. Beck; Lexington, Ky.

Question. State, if you please, what information you have of the movements of the rebel force under the command of General Breckinridge in October last, and what reasons you have for believing that that force was expected in Kentucky about the time of the battle of Perryville or soon after.

I have no information from General Breckinridge personally; my information is all from his wife and friends, who purported to have information as to his arrival there. From their statements to me he was confidently expected with his force about the time of the battle of Perryville. I went to Richmond, Ky., with his wife, upon what she believed to be reliable information that he would meet her there on the Saturday or Sunday after the battle. He did not meet her, and I returned to Lexington. She went South with a friend.

Question. Were your former relations with General Breckinridge and his family such as to give you peculiar facilities for obtaining information upon a subject of that kind?

They were. I had been his law partner for a number of years. His wife visited my house frequently and seemed to rely upon me to advise her as to her husband's movements, and I supposed he would have communicated with me in relation to his family at least. Mr. Keene Richards, one of his aides, as I understood, called to see me. I did not see him, but he saw Mrs. Breckinridge and communicated his information to her, as she told me.

Question. State what your information was, if you please.

In substance that she must meet him in Richmond or Danville, and that he desired her to be with him; that he expected to be there in a very short time. This was a week or two before the battle of Perryville.

Question. State, if you please, whether this information to her was to the effect that he desired her to be with him or that he desired her to go South with him, and whether the information indicated that the object of this meeting was to go South at that time.

It did not; it was that he desired her to be with him.

Question. Did this information indicate that General Breckinridge was coming alone or that he was coming with his troops?

With his troops.

Question. State what information you had as to the strength of the column he was expected to bring at that time.

He was said to be a major-general, and his troops were variously estimated at from 10,000 to 20,000.

Question. Were you satisfied yourself that General Breckinridge, with his command, was expected in Kentucky at that time, and have you any reason now to doubt that he was expected and actually on his way?

I confidently believed that he was expected in Kentucky, and am satisfied from information that he was actually on his way.

Question. Did the people of Kentucky regard the invasion of the State by the armies of Bragg and Kirby Smith and the additional force that was expected under Breckinridge as a temporary raid, or did they regard it as a formidable effort to get possession of the State and secure it to the cause of the rebellion?

I think all regarded it as a formidable effort to hold permanent possession of Kentucky if possible.

Question. State, if you please, what steps were taken to inaugurate the provisional government under Confederate authority and what other steps were taken to enforce Confederate laws within the limits of the State during that invasion.

Richard Hawes was inaugurated as provisional governor by General Bragg at Frankfort. I am unable to give the exact date, further than that it was on a Saturday, and I think the Saturday before the battle of Perryville. Several members of his council were in Lexington claiming the authorities conferred upon them by the provisional governor. I saw three or four of them just before his inauguration. In answer to the other branch of the question I will state that they required Confederate money to be taken like any other currency, and claimed the right to punish by imprisonment or otherwise those who sought to depreciate it. They claimed also the right to punish persons who discouraged enlistments.

Question. Did they claim the right to enforce the conscription act and was that act enforced in any case?

I do not think it was in the neighborhood of Lexington. General Bragg issued an order, the purport of which I do not distinctly remember, threatening to enforce it at some early day in the future. That is my recollection of it, but I cannot now give the substance of the order.

Question. Were the people of Kentucky generally so provided with arms and munitions of war as to be able to increase very materially the efficiency of the invading army if they took part with it?

A great many men in my part of the State had rifles, shot-guns, and pistols; there were few farmers but had one or the other.

Question. What was your information in regard to the supply of these articles brought into the State by the rebel forces during their occupation of it?

I saw what appeared to me to be immense numbers of guns at their depot in Lexington; in fact at several depots they had large numbers. Where they obtained them I do not know, but they certainly had a large supply at Lexington during their occupation of it.

Question. Have you any means of making an accurate estimate?

I have not.

Question. Had they also supplies of provisions and other necessities for an army at these depots?

They had at these or other depots. They kept their guns in one and their supplies in others.

Question. Were the guns you speak of in the depot in boxes or were they loose?

Mostly loose when I saw them. I saw some in boxes with the tops off, but not a great many.

Question. State, if you please, about the size of the rooms in which these arms were stored and in what manner they were stored; that is, as to the space that they occupied. I want to arrive at an approximate estimate of the numbers, if I can.

Their principal depot was what had been a livery stable, on Short street; the guns were laid in the stalls. One side of the stable was filled with guns lying flat and piled from 5 to 7 feet high; six or eight of these stalls being so filled when I saw them. Large numbers were standing about the door and the central portions of the stable, and were being divided out at times to different companies of volunteers who were being organized to take part. I saw also at the different depots where companies and regimental organizations were attempted to be perfected guns cleaned up and put in order, ready to be delivered to the men.

Question. About what time was it that you saw these arms stored in this way?

First shortly after their arrival, in the early part of September, 1862, and I saw them occasionally till within a week or two before their departure.

Question. Had the quantity seemed to increase or diminish when you saw them last?

I did not observe with sufficient accuracy to answer.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What time were you in partnership with Mr. Breckinridge and when did that partnership terminate?

It commenced the first part of 1855 and terminated about the time he was a candidate for the Presidency; I think in 1860.

Question. Was there any formal dissolution of that partnership?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President, as not being relevant to the matter under investigation.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The witness has undertaken to state the movements and intentions and force of Breckinridge in reference to Kentucky at that time. For the purpose of showing how accurate and reliable his information could be he states himself in his examination-in-chief that he had been the law partner of Mr. Breckinridge. For the purpose of testing precisely what was introduced, as to how far his acquaintance with Mr. Breckinridge would justify his statements to this Commission and a knowledge of his movements or intentions, I ask this, because I think it is pertinent.

General BUELL. In calling upon the witness to state the relations which afforded him facilities for obtaining information in regard to the movements of General Breckinridge I did not base it upon business relations, but upon former social associations more particularly. I do not think that the business relations of General Breckinridge and Mr. Beck have any bearing upon this testimony; it was more particularly his relations with the family of General Breckinridge that I meant to inquire into.

(The court was cleared; after discussion it was decided the question be put.)

The WITNESS. We agreed to dissolve and did dissolve. There was no writing either in the formation or dissolution, and I soon after formed a partnership with F. K. Hunt, my present partner.

Question. Where was Mr. Breckinridge at the time you dissolved that partnership?

I saw him in Washington and spoke to him of my intention to form a partnership with Mr. Hunt, in which he fully concurred, we both agreeing that our partnership was at an end. I formed an actual partnership with Mr. Hunt after my return, and wrote to Mr. Breckinridge informing him of it, but I do not remember if he replied to me or not.

Question. Was Mr. Breckinridge in Lexington subsequent to that conversation in Washington?

Yes, sir.

Question. What was the cause of the dissolution at that time?

His political engagements were such that he was unable to attend to his law business, he being then Senator from Kentucky.

Question. How frequently was he in Lexington subsequent to that conversation in Washington?

He spent most of his time in and about Lexington from the time Congress adjourned in August, 1861, till September or October, 1861, when he went South.

Question. What became of the business after the dissolution?

I attended to the closing of it.

Question. Have you had any communication with him since of a business character or in reference to your former partnership?

I have had no communication with him since he went South directly. I have said to gentlemen going South that if they saw him to tell him how his family was; nothing more.

Question. Was not that dissolution of partnership really caused by his going South or by his intention of joining the rebel army?

No, sir; it was closed long before I had the least suspicion of any such thing and I think before the war broke out.

General BUELL. With the consent of the judge-advocate I should like to ask the witness one other question?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have no objection, with the consent of the Commission.

Question. (By General BUELL.) Do you know of any arms having been in the State Arsenal or stored elsewhere at the time of the invasion by Kirby Smith, and do you know whether the arms which you have stated to have seen in store may or may not have been part of the same?

I have no personal knowledge on that subject.

Question. (By General TYLER.) Are you in favor of the execution of all the laws passed by Congress and of all the orders issued by the President of the United States and his subordinate military officers, so far as they have come to your knowledge, for the suppression of the rebellion commenced at Fort Sumter and since carried on by the rebel Government at Richmond, of which Jefferson Davis is President?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President. It is totally irrelevant to the matters under investigation, and I shall not give my consent, whatever that may amount to, to continue to make this investigation of political opinions. The question has that tendency; it is in every sense irrelevant and improper. The witness may be a firm and devoted adherent of the supporters of the rebellion or he may not be; I do not know anything about it at all. I have no acquaintance with him. I saw him for the first time this morning, and have not conversed with him five minutes in all. He appears here only because I happened to hear that he had this information in regard to the movements of General Breckinridge.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not propose to say anything as to the merits or demerits directly of this question; but certainly the question cannot be successfully objected to on the grounds General Buell placed it upon. It is no test of political opinion whatever as to the manner of conducting a government. Properly defined, the word politics cannot possibly enter into the question whether the Government should exist or not. Whether his answer would affect his credibility as a witness or not I cannot say.

General BUELL. The term may not be well chosen. I do not pretend to say that it is. I use it in its popular sense, however, and not in any sense in which it can be interpreted as expressing support or opposition to the laws of the Government. I still contend that the question is irrelevant, because it has nothing to do with the validity of the witness' testimony, nothing to do with the matter under investigation, and nothing to do with the credibility of the witness.

General TYLER. I ask this question on my own responsibility, and I must confess that on the answer to it will depend the weight that I give to the gentleman's testimony.

The court was cleared for secret session.

On the court being opened the witness was informed that the question would be put.

The WITNESS. I will ask the court if I may be allowed to enter my protest on the record, that my answer to the question may not in any event be used against me.

General DANA. I think it would be right to advise the witness as to the power of the court to enforce an answer to any question put to him by the court.

The PRESIDENT. I will admonish the witness that if he believes his evidence will criminate him, and being a lawyer he will understand the meaning of this, he has a right to decline answering it upon that ground.

The WITNESS. I am not prepared to say that it would criminate me, in my opinion.

The PRESIDENT. As to the power of the Commission to compel an answer to its questions from any witness, whether he be citizen or soldier, I have no doubt. The witness in this instance may understand, however, that this court has no criminal jurisdiction nor can a prosecution be begun or entertained in it; neither is it intended that answers given before it by witnesses shall be used as a foundation for any prosecution in any court of competent jurisdiction. It is proper to say in addition that it will be well for the witness to consider how his answer may affect his relations with his neighbors if his residence should be in a secession neighborhood.

The WITNESS. With that explanation I am prepared to answer.

General BUELL. Before the witness proceeds with his answer I wish to enter my formal protest against the question and all questions of that character, the tendency of which is to deter and intimidate my witnesses, both in appearing before the Commission and in giving their testimony. There is nothing more certain than that it has no earthly bearing upon the matter you are investigating, and there can be no charge made that it affects the reliability of a witness or the validity of his testimony. I repeat to you that it has the tendency to intimidate witnesses before the Commission. There will be a vague apprehension of something—nobody knows what—in the minds of many men when such questions are put to them before this Commission, the object and the authority and the legal sanction of which are not understood anywhere.

The preceding remarks of General Buell having been, according to rule, read aloud by the recorder, who read "intention" instead of "tendency," General Buell proceeded:

I will suggest from this particular case the importance and justice of an examination of the record that is made of the remarks of all persons. You see in this instance how important an error was made by the recorder. The day before yesterday I was refused the privilege of revising the remarks I made before the Commission.

The PRESIDENT. I beg your pardon, general; it was no refusal of the privilege. It was intended, as has been the rule, to allow you to have a copy of the proceedings to examine afterward, and in this particular case to make any correction in your remarks if any were required. It was not intended to debar you from the privilege accorded you by the Commission, but only to expedite the proceedings of the court.

General BUELL. Will you allow me to remark on the inconvenience of correcting a particular word after it has passed two or three days? There is a difficulty, too, in remembering what was actually said; besides in the case referred to the Commission had already decided against the privilege of correction before I proposed to have the record read for emendations.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission required the record should stand as it was; nevertheless you will remember, general, I said you could have the record to make any alteration it might require, and that privilege you have now.

General SCHOEPP. There are only two instances in which such questions were asked; consequently the statement of General Buell that it intimidates the witness is not a fact.

General BUELL. Does the Commission suppose that if questions of this kind are put it will not be known abroad and that witnesses will not be apprised of the fact?

The PRESIDENT. I will call your attention to the impropriety of speaking to a question decided by the Commission.

General BUELL. I am forced to reply when opposition is made to the protest I have made.

The PRESIDENT. All such questions would be in order before the question was decided by the Commission.

General TYLER. I do not see what right General Buell has to dictate to the Commission. Our proceedings are taking a very remarkable shape.

General BUELL. I think so myself. I may cite the question itself as evidence of it.

The PRESIDENT. That remark is a reflection upon the proceedings of the Commission, and I must be permitted to say I think uncalled for.

General BUELL. I do not mean to cast any reflection upon the proceedings of the Commission, only upon the question itself.

The PRESIDENT. The remarks of General Buell upon the proceedings of the Commission are, I think, uncalled for.

The remarks of the president having been again read to the witness, he proceeded:

The WITNESS. After what is recorded I desire to say many of the acts of Congress and acts of subordinate officers I have not read. I think I have read most of the orders of the President himself. Some of those I have read are not, in my opinion, calculated to promote the purposes for which they were intended, and I therefore do not agree with the policy of them. Others I deem unconstitutional, and therefore oppose them. I approve of all constitutional measures to restore the integrity of this Union as I greatly desire the attainment of that object. I should like to be permitted to say that I have obeyed all laws, State and Federal, to the best of my ability and intend so to do, taking no part against the Government in any form in this rebellion.

By General DANA:

Question. At what time did Keene Richards, the emissary of Breckinridge, seek you in Lexington and have an interview with Mrs. Breckinridge?

I understood it was shortly before the battle of Perryville; how many days I am not prepared to say. He saw Mrs. Breckinridge, as I understood, in Scott County, where Keene Richards formerly resided.

Question. Was Lexington at that time within the lines of the United States forces or within those of the rebels?

I am not able to answer that question distinctly. It was not occupied in force by either side. That is my best recollection.

Question. At what time prior to the battle of Perryville did you know of the whereabouts of Breckinridge?

I did not know personally of his whereabouts at any time. Shortly before that, reports were reaching us of his approach frequently, but those reports were very conflicting.

Question. According to the best information that you have, where was the rebel force under him at the time that Keene Richards made his appearance at Lexington?

Between Chattanooga and Knoxville, was the best information I have.

Question. Were you informed about that time as to whether any other rebel emissaries were visiting Lexington or that vicinity?

There were a great many in that vicinity at that time, and reports of such were frequent, but I cannot specify them with any distinctness.

Question. Did you see any of these rebel emissaries yourself?

Do you mean emissaries from Breckinridge?

Question. Yes, or from other generals?

I frequently saw men during the occupation of the country by rebels about Lexington, who were coming from the South, from Bragg to Kirby Smith, from Marshall to Kirby Smith. A good many of them had been formerly citizens of Kentucky with whom I was personally acquainted.

Question. Prior to the time of the occupation of the vicinity of Lexington by the rebel forces and during the time that Lexington was supposed to be within the Union lines did you see any persons in that vicinity whom you knew to be from the rebel lines?

I do not think I did. I have no recollection of seeing any. I heard of them, but I had no conversation with any and I don't think I saw any.

Question. When Keene Richards visited Lexington was he an officer in the rebel service?

He was said to be on Breckinridge's staff; in what capacity I do not know.

Question. Did you derive any information from the dress he wore at the time he came?

I did not.

Question. Was it a military or citizen's dress he wore?

I had no information on the subject.

Question. Do you know whether any Union men at Lexington at the time these rebel emissaries made their visits to the vicinity of Lexington took measures to send information to the commanders of the Union forces of those visits?

I do not know.

Question. Is it your opinion that any Union man in Lexington would notify the commander of the Union forces if he knew of the visits of the rebel spies or rebel officers in disguise to his vicinity?

In my opinion there were some gentlemen in Lexington who stood so well in the opinion of the commanders of the Union forces that they could with propriety have done so and I suppose did; but I have no knowledge on the subject.

Question. Had you such information of the strength of the forces under Kirby Smith as would enable you to give a decided opinion of it?

I have not. I have heard it variously estimated, but cannot speak with any certainty myself as to its strength.

Question. Was the whole of his column supposed to be at Lexington at any time?

I think not. His advance passed through Lexington and beyond before other portions of his column reached the neighborhood.

Question. Do you think the whole of his column passed through Lexington or through that vicinity?

I suppose nearly all of it came into the vicinity of Lexington; but I do not know.

Question. What is the estimate of intelligent men of that part of the country as to the strength of Kirby Smith's column?

I should say not far from 15,000 is the estimate of the most intelligent men I have spoken to of it.

General BUELL. Although the rebel forces may not have been actually at Lexington—

The PRESIDENT. Allow me to interrupt you. I wish the judge-advocate to read the resolution adopted lately regarding the order of examination of witnesses.

General BUELL. It would be proper for me at this time to urge my right to re-examine the witness upon any new matter introduced either by the judge-advocate or any member of the Commission. I ask the decision of the Commission upon this question, and I do it without argument.

General SCHOEPF. I would like to know what is General Buell's idea as to what new matter has been introduced in this cross-examination.

The PRESIDENT. It is inquired of you, General Buell, by a member of the Commission, what is the point upon which you wish to examine the witness.

General BUELL. What I ask is a decision upon the principle and not upon the particular question I wish to put. They are different questions entirely.

(The court was cleared, when the decision of the Commission was reaffirmed, and on the opening of the court was announced to General Buell.)

General BUELL. Mr. President, as the right to cross-examine this witness upon the new matter introduced has been denied me, I will suggest to the member of the Commission who examined last an inquiry which may further the object of his investigation. I understand that object to be to ascertain under what circumstances emissaries of the rebel authorities were permitted to visit the vicinity of Lexington, as appears to have been done in the case of Keene Richards spoken of. I will therefore suggest to the Commission this question, and, if proper, I propose the question be put.

General TYLER. I would like to know what the question is before it is put.

The PRESIDENT. General Dana did ask one or two questions touching upon new matter, and though I am of opinion that both questions and answers were very unimportant, I think in this case it would be nothing but fair for the question of General Buell to be put by General Dana.

General ORD. Before the question is put I propose that the judge-advocate read the ruling of the court.

The PRESIDENT. Will General Buell suggest the subject of the question?

General BUELL. Although the rebel troops may not have been actually in possession of Lexington at the time of the visit of Keene Richards to which you have referred in your testimony, nevertheless were not the rebel troops in possession of all that district of country and had they not virtually the entire control of it? That is the question.

The PRESIDENT. I understand General Buell wishes that question to be put by General Dana.

General BUELL. Yes, sir. But that is not the new matter upon which I proposed to examine the witness. That was in reference to the strength of Kirby Smith's force and which was entirely new matter.

General TYLER. I move that the court be cleared.

(The court was cleared. The question of General Buell is adopted by General Dana and put to the witness.)

The WITNESS. They had all that portion of country east and south of Lexington. That north and northwest of it was, I might say, debatable ground.

General BUELL. If now the Commission or any member of the Commission would accept the suggestion of another question, I have no doubt it would have a tendency to bring out information that has seemed to be desired.

The PRESIDENT. I would suggest, general, that you have the question written.

The question was as follows :

“Does your estimate of 15,000 as being the strength of the rebel force under Kirby Smith in Central Kentucky include the column under General Stevenson which came in somewhat later? State also what you understand to have been the strength of that column.”

The WITNESS. The estimate I spoke of had no reference to General Stevenson's column. That column, as I understood, did not approach Lexington, but went from some point in Madison County toward Danville or Harrodsburg.

Commission adjourned to meet February 21.

CINCINNATI, February 21, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

G. W. DOWNING (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name, if you please.

George W. Downing.

Question. Are you a resident of Kentucky?

Yes, sir; I reside near Lexington.

Question. Did you see General Breckinridge, of the rebel army, in the month of October last? If so, please state where.

I did, sir; I saw him in Knoxville.

Question. State what information you received from General Breckinridge in regard to the movement of his division into Kentucky shortly previous to that time.

General Breckinridge stated to me that he was on his way to Kentucky, and within a days' march of the Kentucky line, when he received orders to return to Knoxville.

Question. What was the date of this interview with General Breckinridge; according to the information given you, about what time was this movement taking place and when was it countermanded?

I could not say exactly the date. I think it was in the latter part of October. I could not exactly state at what date the order was countermanded. He had received orders and his army had turned toward Knoxville before the other army had got to Cumberland Gap, but I do not exactly know the time.

Question. Where was his division at the time you received this information?

His army, or the most of it, had moved to Murfreesborough. A portion of it was gone on. While he was waiting to get upon the cars I had a conversation with him of twenty or thirty minutes.

Question. Was he moving his whole force by railroad, did you understand?

Yes, sir.

Question. Do you know where the army of General Bragg was at that time?

The most of it had arrived in the vicinity of Knoxville.

Question. Was this movement of General Breckinridge's division toward Kentucky going on while Bragg's army was in that State?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did General Breckinridge tell you what the strength of his division was? If so, please state what he told you about it.

General Breckinridge told me it was about 8,000 or 10,000.

Question. Have you reason to doubt the truth of the information given you by General Breckinridge both in regard to the destination of his division and the strength of it?

I have not.

Question. Do you know anything of the character of the country across from Somerset to East Tennessee in the direction of Knoxville?

Yes, sir; I know some little of it.

Question. Do you know the road that leaves the Cumberland River just above the mouth of the South Fork and goes through Jacksborough, thence on to Knoxville?

I do.

Question. Have you traveled that road?

Yes, sir.

Question. What is the character of it?

It is a pretty bad road.

Question. How does it compare with the Cumberland Gap road?

It is a worse road, I think.

Question. Is it a road that is much traveled?

No, sir; I think not.

Question. Is it used for wagons?

Not a great deal, I think.

Question. State as particularly as you can the general character of the country, its population, and agricultural resources, especially between the Cumberland River and Jacksborough.

I could not say exactly; there is not much of that country that is very productive.

Question. Is it a level country or is it a mountainous country, abounding in difficult passes and defiles?

It is a mountainous country.

Question. How do you get on to that road, starting from Somerset?

I could not state exactly. I never paid a great deal of attention to the country or the roads.

Question. From the information you received did you understand distinctly that General Breckinridge's division was not in Kentucky during the occupation or invasion of that State last summer by the rebel forces?

Yes, sir; I understood so from himself.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. What were you doing in Knoxville at that time?

I left the State about the time Generals Smith's and Bragg's armies were leaving Kentucky, a little in advance of them sometimes.

Question. What reason had you for leaving the State at that time?

I was a good deal scared at that time, as a good many others were. We heard a great many tales about pressing men into the service, and as I did not care about going in I thought it better to leave.

Question. What service do you refer to?

To the Union service.

By General DANA:

Question. Do you know of any men pressed into the service of the United States; can you name any man?

No, sir; I have heard of a great many, but could not find out how it was. I heard a great many tales when the Confederates were in Kentucky where I live about what was being done at Louisville and Covington.

By General SCHOEPPF:

Question. Was there a single Union officer or soldier near Lexington to press you into the service?

No, sir; not at that time.

By General TYLER:

Question. Are you in favor of all the laws passed by Congress and of all orders issued by the President of the United States and his subordinate military authorities, so far as they have come to your knowledge, for the suppression of the rebellion commenced at Fort Sumter and since carried on by the rebel Government at Richmond, of which Jefferson Davis is president?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I am forced, Mr. President, to object to this question. I cannot see precisely the ground upon which the question can be pressed upon this witness or asked of him.

General BUELL. I desire to enter my objection to the question also for the reasons which I stated yesterday in an objection to precisely the same question to another witness.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. There is a difference between this witness and the former one. The former witness had, from the position he occupied, taken an oath to sustain the Constitution of the United States. That oath he may have violated, and violating that oath affects his credibility before this or any other court. But here is a witness occupying no such position, and I think on that ground the question is scarcely pertinent.

General TYLER. I propose to ask the question of every witness, whether presented by the judge-advocate or General Buell, as a means of obtaining information as to their credibility. On the answer given to that question will depend very much the force that I shall give to their testimony before the Commission. I would like to ask the judge-advocate if the witness examined yesterday had taken an oath? Nothing of the kind appears on the record.

The PRESIDENT. His being an attorney requires it. Every attorney is required to take the oath of allegiance to the United States.

General BUELL. It occurs to me to say a word in reference to the remarks of the judge-advocate in answer to mine, if it is not too late.

The PRESIDENT. Proceed, sir.

General BUELL. The question of General Tyler extends to matters which may not, perhaps, come within the constitutional obligations of citizens of the United States. This question does not speak of lawful orders; it not only specifies the orders of the President, which may be presumed to be constitutional always, but it specifies the orders of all officers under the President. He does not say whether they shall be constitutional or unconstitutional. The opposition to such orders or the violation of such unconstitutional orders by any person would not be a violation of the oath, and it would not therefore disqualify a witness before any tribunal.

General DANA. I move that the witness be informed that if he deems the answer to this question may commit him in any degree, either now or hereafter, he may not answer it.

The PRESIDENT. If you think the answer to that question will have the effect of criminating you in any manner, either now or hereafter, you are not required to answer it.

The WITNESS. I would rather not answer the question, sir. I do not think the answer would criminate me. I decline answering it.

By General TYLER :

Question. Have you ever been connected, directly or indirectly, with the rebel service?

No, sir.

Question. Under what circumstances were you brought in contact with General Breckinridge, and how did you become so intimate with him that he should give you the strength and position of his army?

I am an old acquaintance of General Breckinridge and his wife is a distant relative of mine.

Question. How long were you absent from Lexington at the time you visited Knoxville, and were you in contact with the Confederate army during the whole of that time?

I cannot be certain as to the time, but I think it was about two or three weeks from the time I left Lexington until I arrived at Knoxville.

Question. In whose company did you leave Lexington?

I had a few friends with me.

Question. How many? And please name them.

There were some 5 or 6. Mr. Reed, of Fayette County; Mr. John H. Cooper, of Fayette; Mr. Hern, of Fayette; two Mr. Armstrongs and Mr. Stuart, of Fayette County, composed the company.

Question. Did these gentlemen return with you?

Some returned and some have not.

Question. Did any of them join the rebel army?

No, sir.

Question. What route did you take from Lexington to Knoxville?

We went on to Richmond, then to London, and along that route.

Question. Did you fall in with the rebel army?

Sometimes we were with it; but every chance we had to get off the road we turned off to keep from being with it as much as possible.

Question. Did you return to Lexington because you had no sympathy with the rebel army?

No, sir; I did not have any sympathy with it. I am not a secessionist by any means.

Question. But you left Lexington to avoid the draft or being pressed into the Union service?

From reports that I heard I did; but I found out they were untrue and returned.

Question. Have you had any communication with General Breckinridge since you returned to Lexington?

No, sir.

By General SCHOEPF :

Question. Were you aware of an order of General Buell that persons who went with the army to Tennessee and came back into Kentucky should be arrested?

General BUELL. I gave no such order. I request that the orders referred to by General Schoepf be read.

(General Orders, No. 49, is read, as follows :

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 49. }

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO,
Louisville, October 26, 1862.

I. All recruits for the rebel army captured or arrested by troops of this command will be regarded as prisoners of war and sent without delay to Vicksburg, and there paroled and left subject to exchange.

II. All persons who have actively aided or abetted in the invasion of Kentucky by rebel troops within the last three months will be immediately arrested and sent to Vicksburg, Miss., and forbidden to return to Kentucky. This order will not be understood as including persons indicted or held by the civil authorities for trial, nor will arrests be made on suspicion or insufficient evidence of guilt.

III. Brig. Gen. J. T. Boyle is charged with the execution of these orders, and will give such special instructions as may be found necessary.

By command of Major-General Buell :

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

General BUELL. The order refers to particular classes of persons, not to persons in general; it refers to deserters from the rebel service and to persons who have actively aided and abetted in the invasion of Kentucky in the army of General Bragg.

The WITNESS. I was not aware of any such order.

General SCHOEPF. Were you not arrested when you returned?

Yes, sir. I was not—I want to correct that by explaining—

General BUELL. I beg the recorder —

General SCHOEPF. I object to General Buell's interfering with the recorder all the time.

I reported myself to the commander of the post at Danville. I was not arrested. I went and reported myself, and he gave me a letter to General Granger at Lexington, and I reported to him there.

By General SCHOEPF :

Question. Do you know that James Clay, of Lexington, raised a regiment in Kentucky before Kirby Smith left?

No, sir; he did not.

Question. Did he not issue a proclamation to the people to enlist?

He did.

Question. Did not a good many enlist or go with him to Tennessee for the purpose of enlisting?

I think not.

Mr. J. H. COOPER (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows :

By General BUELL :

Question. State your name and place of residence, if you please?

J. H. Cooper; 8 miles north of Lexington, Fayette County, Kentucky.

Question. Were you in Lexington last summer during its occupation by the rebel troops under Kirby Smith?

Yes, sir.

Question. Did you see any arms belonging to the rebel force? If so, state where they were stored and about how many there were of them, as near as you know.

They were stored in a stable belonging to a Capt. O. B. Beard. I think there were from 8,000 to 10,000 muskets.

Question. Were they in boxes or in what manner were they stored?

They were piled up in the stable in the stalls and a good many were in boxes.

Question. Did the rebel troops bring these arms into Kentucky; if not, where did they come from?

I understood they were captured at Richmond, Ky. I heard of their being captured and curiosity led me to go and see them. I saw them brought in in wagons and I saw them unloaded.

Question. Were they those in boxes which you saw unloaded or were these loose in the wagons?

Most of those I saw unloaded were loose; yet there were several loads that were in boxes. My attention was more particularly called to those that were loose as I was passing along the street.

Question. When did you first see them? If you cannot remember the date, state with reference to the time of the arrival of the rebel troops.

It was within a very few days after the arrival of the troops—some three or four days; I don't remember the exact time they got there; it was three or four days after the Richmond fight that I saw them unload the guns.

Question. Were you at the time well apprised of the fact of a battle at Richmond and were you at Lexington when the rebel troops entered that place?

I was in the country the day of the fight. I heard the firing of cannon. I went up on Sunday, and on Monday morning I went back to Lexington, and the Confederate troops, I think, got there about 12 o'clock.

Question. Did you see General Breckinridge, of the rebel army, about the time that General Bragg retreated from Kentucky in October last? If so, state where, and give the date if you remember it.

I saw him in Knoxville, and to the best of my recollection I think it was about the 25th of October. He was then on his way to Murfreesborough; his force had gone ahead of him and he was there waiting. Hearing that I was in Knoxville he sent for me, and I went out to him and saw him a few minutes before he left.

Question. Did you have any conversation with him or hear any conversation between him and other persons with reference to the previous movements of his troops? If so, please state what that conversation was.

I think it occurred about in this way: At Lexington we understood that General Breckinridge had gone to Richmond with 20,000 troops, and at that time I stated this fact to him, and he told me he had started to Kentucky, and had got within one day's march with about half the number it was said he had taken to Richmond; that he was within one day's march of Cumberland Gap, or Kentucky, with about 10,000 men, and there he received countermanding orders and returned to Knoxville, understanding that General Bragg was retreating from Kentucky.

Question. Had you previously known General Breckinridge, and had you then or have you now any reason to doubt the truth of what he stated to you?

I have been acquainted with General Breckinridge for, I think, about fifteen years, and I have no reason in the world to doubt anything he stated to me.

Question. How were General Breckinridge's troops going to Murfreesborough, and how long had they started before you saw him on the occasion referred to?

I think they went on the railroad. My best recollection is that they left there a day or two before General Breckinridge left Knoxville himself.

Question. Do you know whether or not there was much dissatisfaction among the rebel troops on account of their withdrawal from Kentucky?

Yes, sir; there was a great deal of dissatisfaction among both the officers and troops, more particularly among the officers. I had more chance to talk with them than the men. There was a general dissatisfaction. They claimed that they came there to hold Kentucky and they saw no reason why they should leave it.

Question. Did you hear anything about a council of war among the officers of Camp Dick Robinson with reference to a retreat from Kentucky? If so, state what you heard and from whom you heard it and all that you know about it.

On Sunday morning I understood that they held a council of war among the officers at Camp Dick Robinson and that there was a majority of officers in favor of giving battle, but that General Bragg overruled them and ordered a retreat. I got this from Mr. Gilson Johnson, and I heard divers others speaking about it. My best recollection serves me now that it was Sunday or Monday the retreat was ordered, and I went on to Lancaster, and the next morning General Buckner's command came through there; his command came through Lancaster on Monday morning on the road to Crab Orchard.

Question. Who was this Mr. Johnson that you received this information from and what connection had he with the rebel army?

I think that he belonged to General Breckinridge's staff and he was out on furlough; but I met with him at Camp Dick Robinson, and he went back with the retreating army.

Question. How long was this council held after the battle of Perryville or was it before or after the battle?

It was after the battle of Perryville, the Sunday following the battle, which I think took place on the Wednesday previous.

Question. What was the opinion of the people of Kentucky, as far as you know it, in regard to the object of the invasion; did they believe it was a temporary incursion or did they suppose that the rebel forces came there to hold the State permanently?

It was generally believed by the people of Kentucky that General Bragg's object in coming there was to hold Kentucky, and they held to that opinion up to the time of his retreat, when the people generally were taken by surprise, as they did not look for anything of the sort. General Bragg made a speech in Lexington to that effect and convinced the people that such was his object.

Question. Do you say you were at Camp Dick Robinson at the time the rebel army was there after the battle of Perryville?

Yes, sir. I got there on Friday, I think, and remained there till the retreat was ordered, which, as I stated before, I believe was on Sunday evening.

Question. Did you have an opportunity of having some knowledge of the intended movements of the rebel army; and, if so, was it supposed or understood when that army moved to Camp Dick Robinson that it was retreating out of Kentucky?

When it moved to Camp Dick Robinson I think it was generally understood that the intention was to give battle, from the fact of their concentrating their whole forces at that point, and it was believed so up to the time this council of war was held. After that I understood that the army would retreat to the south by way of Cumberland Gap.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE :

Question. Had you ever any facility for examining those arms you spoke of?

As I stated before, in passing, on coming down town, I saw the wagons unloading, and curiosity led me to go into the stable and see them. I saw them piled up there, and I saw there were a great many. I asked questions of those who were guarding the arms, the pickets—the number of guns and where they were captured. They were large stable doors, and any one passing could see them in the stalls, and the boxes that had not been opened.

Question. Did you go inside the stable?

Yes, sir; I think I was in there once or twice.

Question. How did you pass the guards who had charge of them?

I got permission to go in.

Question. Who gave you permission?

As well as I recollect now I think it was Captain Beard who went with me, and who was acquainted with the guard. It was a stable he rented out. The Government had it before the rebel army got there, and they took possession of it and were using it as a commissary store. There were a good many goods captured at Lexington, and some, I think, were stored in that building.

Question. What induced you, Mr. Cooper, to make that trip to Knoxville just at the time you did?

I suppose you want an honest answer?

Question. Certainly.

I was a Southern man in feeling.

The witness is cautioned by the judge-advocate to decline answering the question if he thinks his evidence will criminate him.

I don't believe it would be very criminal for a man to tell you the honest truth. I had no other object in leaving than that I believed I would be imprisoned if I remained, and I went South, and I staid there till I got pretty well satisfied that home was the best place. I made my intentions known there and came back to obey the laws existing. I left the Confederate Government and came back to the Federal, to obey the laws as a loyal citizen, and hope to remain. There was no compulsion used. I could have remained there, but I saw my error, and I went to General Bragg, told him my intentions, and he gave me a pass to go through his lines, and I returned home.

Question. You have a farm near Lexington, have you not?

Yes, sir.

Question. Are you one of the citizens of your country indicted for taking part and sympathizing with the rebellion?

I was indicted previous to the Confederates coming here, and General Smith got the notice and sent it to me, and they never renewed it. Our grand jury sat some ten days ago. I have not since been indicted. The other indictment was not served upon me. General Smith got it out of the clerk's office and sent it to me through the post-office.

Question. Was Mr. Downing also indicted?

I think he was indicted after leaving. I heard nothing of his being indicted previous.

Question. What passed between General Bragg and yourself when you announced your intention to return to your allegiance?

Nothing at all. It was done through young Mr. Johnson. I went to General Bragg's room, but Mr. Johnson, who was General Bragg's private secretary and an acquaintance of mine, applied for Mr. Downing, Mr. Reed, and myself. I was introduced to General Bragg, but I got the pass from Mr. Johnson, who made our intention known. He had refused to give passes to most persons, but he granted one to us. We intended to have gone by the way of Nashville. I was advised by Colonel Hunt and General Breckinridge that that would be the safest way, and give ourselves up to Rosecrans and make our intentions known, and they did not doubt he would give us a pass to return home; but we changed our notion and came by a different route.

By General SCHOEPPF :

Question. What day did you arrive at Camp Dick Robinson ?

I think it was the Friday before the Sunday that the army retreated from Camp Dick Robinson.

By General TYLER :

Question. Did you accompany any part of Kirby Smith's army to Camp Dick Robinson ?

No, sir; I did not.

Question. Do you know the day on which the advance guard of Kirby Smith's army arrived at Camp Dick Robinson ?

I do not.

Question. Was Kirby Smith's army at Camp Dick Robinson on your arrival there ?

Yes, sir; it was.

Question. Do you know that Kirby Smith's army was at Camp Dick Robinson or in that vicinity on the day of the battle of Perryville ?

I did not go to Camp Dick Robinson till after the battle of Perryville, and at that time—the battle of Perryville—Kirby Smith was stationed at Salvisa, between Harrodsburg and Frankfort.

Question. By what route did Bragg's army retreat from Camp Dick Robinson ?

They went by two or three different routes; I think Buckner went by the way of Crab Orchard; Kirby Smith by way of Richmond. I went out with the rear of the army, but had nothing to do with it, considering I was a citizen.

Question. How long did you remain at Camp Dick Robinson ?

As I stated before I got there on Friday, and I think I left there Sunday or Monday evening; according to my best recollection I left Sunday evening. From there I went to Lancaster with the retreating army.

Question. Were you in Kirby Smith's camp at Salvisa ?

I was not.

Question. Did any of Kirby Smith's army occupy Harrodsburg or pass through Harrodsburg ?

Not to my knowledge; but I understood they came through Harrodsburg up to Camp Dick Robinson. I do not think they could go there in any other way than by passing through Harrodsburg.

Question. You speak of your information as to the different movements of the rebel army from Knoxville to Murfreesborough and from Camp Dick Robinson; what were your means of information other than that of personal information ?

None other than being acquainted with officers and hearing them talk about their movements after the retreat had become generally known. I was there as a citizen, and as such talked to by everybody, and being acquainted with officers of course heard their conversation.

Question. Name the officers who communicated to you the information as to the movements of the rebel army.

I do not know, sir, that I could mention them, as it was in the room of Mrs. Robinson's inn, where I heard the officers talking to each other, that I got my information. I do not want you to understand that they directed their conversation to me at all; it was my mixing with them at table after this retreat was ordered and became generally known that it was talked about.

Question. Had the rebels a line of communication between Knoxville and Murfreesborough by which they moved their troops?

Yes, sir; they had. I saw them move their troops from Knoxville to Murfreesborough.

Question. Are you in favor of the execution of all the laws passed by Congress and all the orders issued by the President of the United States and by his subordinate military officers, so far as they have come to your knowledge, for the suppression of the rebellion commenced at Fort Sumter and since carried on by the rebel Government at Richmond, of which Jefferson Davis is the president?

General BUELL. I object to this question, as I have done to the same question in all previous cases and for the same reason.

The court is cleared. In secret session it is decided that the question shall be put.

The PRESIDENT. It is proper to admonish you that you are not required to answer the question if in your judgment it would criminate you in any degree. Do you understand the meaning of my caution?

I do, sir. I would rather not answer that question. I can answer it. As I stated to you before, I have come back and taken the oath with the intention of becoming a loyal citizen. At the same time I do not approve of everything Mr. Lincoln has done.

The PRESIDENT. Do I understand that you decline to answer the question?

It is a very hard question for me to answer. I want you to understand that I am trying to be a loyal citizen and want to remain as such. I have taken the oath and intend to adhere to it, and I am in a loyal State and I intend to stay; but if you want my candid answer I will give it. I could answer it very quickly, but in doing so I might get myself into trouble.

Question. If you apprehend that you are not bound to answer it.

As I stated before, I have told you my object in going South and my object in coming back.

Question. Do you decline answering the question?

Please read the question again.

The question is reread.

I would rather not answer it at all; but if I am to answer it I will say it right out: I don't approve of Mr. Lincoln's January proclamation in regard to slavery.

Judge LANE (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and place of residence, if you please, judge.

G. W. Lane; Huntsville, Ala.

Question. Have you a good knowledge of the country of North Alabama and of its agricultural resources?

I have been a resident there for the last forty-five years; have traversed it in almost every manner, and profess to have a pretty correct knowledge of the physical geography and topography of the country, and I profess to have a knowledge of the agricultural resources of the country.

Question. State, if you please, what you know on these subjects.

Please describe the general features and character of the country, and state what its products are, and which are the productive regions and which the least so.

There is a spur of the Cumberland Mountains that passes through, dividing North Alabama rather from northeast to southwest. One-half of North Alabama is mountainous, with coves here and there; the other half is table-land, with the addition of what we call the river bottoms. The Tennessee passes through North Alabama. I should say that perhaps one-half was table-land and the balance was mountain coves and river bottom. The table-land is owned and cultivated by the wealthy class of the community that we term planters. On the table-land you find farmers owning from 3,000 acres of land down to 500. That part of the community denominated planters look to cotton as the source of their revenue. They have recently, for the last four or five years, been endeavoring more than formerly to raise their supplies of corn and meat on their own plantations. Up to ten years ago they would look to the Northwest for their meat. They usually raised corn enough for their needs, but for the last ten years they have tried to raise upon their plantations what they would consume, and as a general rule the best farmers have succeeded, but the rest look to the West for their supply of meat and flour. Owing to this fact there is but little surplus of corn and meat; but the planters are all satisfied if they raise corn, forage, fodder, and hay for their own consumption.

Question. I wish you first to describe the general features of the country; the limits of what you call the productive regions, particularly toward the east; to describe this feature of spurs running toward the Tennessee River and corresponding coves running up toward the mountains; to give some idea of that productive region, and what the amount of its production is, I should say, with reference to the amount that its population requires for its own consumption.

There are four counties lying on the north of the Tennessee River. Jackson County extends up to Nicojack; it is the most eastern county in the State, and extends up to the line. I should say four-fifths of Jackson County is very mountainous; the balance is what we call cove-land. But very little of that cove-land is adapted to the cultivation of cotton; it is a stiff, black limestone land, unfit for the cultivation of cotton. According to the size of this county and its population there are fewer negroes than in any county in the State; it is a poor white population. They raise principally corn, some wheat, and have been in the habit of bringing down to our country hogs for sale. The next county is Madison. I should say that four-fifths of that is good arable land, suitable for cultivation, and about two-thirds of that is cultivated in cotton. The next county is Limestone County. I should say two-thirds of that is arable and is cultivated in corn and cotton. The land in that county is mostly owned by the class I have described as the wealthier class of the community. The next county is Lauderdale, on this side of the river. There is very little mountain in that county, but a good deal of poor land. Large tracts of land are still owned by the United States Government. I should say one-half of that county is cultivated in corn and cotton, perhaps more than half of it, and owned and cultivated by planters, who look, as I have said, to their cotton as the source of their revenue. Jackson County is the only one in North Alabama that raises anything for exportation in the way of meat or breadstuffs, and that in but a small degree. The people are generally content, and eat what they raise. This embraces the counties on the north side of the river.

Question. You may give the same information with reference to the country on the south side within 10 or 15 miles of the river.

Commencing at the first county after crossing the river from Jackson County you strike De Kalb County; it is entirely mountainous for 20 miles and almost uninhabited. There is some bottom land on the south side of the river, lying in small tracts, that is perhaps the very best corn land we have in the country, but it is subject to inundation and the rises in the Tennessee River, which are frequently so late that planters are deprived of an opportunity of planting their corn, the floods extending into June, and it makes it a very uncertain business to raise corn on that side of the river. The next county is Marshall, and the same answer would be applicable to that. The next is Morgan County, and for a distance of 10 or 15 miles from the river the same answer would apply. The river seems to pass through the gorges in the mountains. There are mountains on both sides from the main gorge down to Morgan County. The main gorge is only about 15 miles west of Chattanooga by land, but I think it three times that by water, for the river is as serpentine as a corkscrew there. After getting out of Morgan County the next is Lawrence. There you strike a fine quality of land, what is called the Cortland Valley, extending down to Buzzard Roost, which is 95 miles from Huntsville. It is a fine valley, owned principally by rich cotton planters and cultivated in the way I have described before. When you get to Buzzard Roost you are near the Mississippi line, 8 to 15 miles to the Mississippi line west.

Question. Do the arable portions of the country south of the Tennessee afford any provisions beyond what is required for the support of the population?

It is inhabited by the rich planters I have already described, who are satisfied to make merely enough to carry on the operations of their plantations and look to cotton as the source of their revenue.

Question. Are there any practicable wagon roads leading into these coves that you speak of, judge, and where do these people find a market for the little surplus they have and how do they get it there?

There is no turnpike or roads that can be called highways running through those coves; there are roads that are used and the mountains are crossed by citizens, but the word "practicable" is scarcely to be applied. The mountains are crossed, but I should say there was no road running from Jackson County entering from the cove in Madison County to Huntsville that could be used or a load of anything brought. For instance, there is what is called the Big Cove; people live there, and bring to Huntsville their marketing with horse and buggy or carts, but they could not bring one-fourth of a load across the mountain; they could bring upon a mud road four times as much as they could bring across that mountain.

Question. What was the condition of all this region you have described, judge, in the month of July last, with reference to surplus supplies of provisions and forage?

I should say that 1861 was what was termed a bad year, for the grain crop was very short in North Alabama. Independent of that, in the month of February or March the Confederate army that fell back from Bowling Green and Fort Donelson passed through North Alabama and levied contributions upon the country as they passed through. These two facts, of a short crop and the Confederate army levying upon the people, made the supplies less than usual. The Confederate army passed right through the valley and levied contributions during the two weeks they were there.

Question. What was supposed to be the strength of this army that levied upon the country in that way?

It was said to be from 25,000 to 30,000 men. I saw a great many divisions pass. The secessionists of the country said there were from 25,000 to 30,000.

Question. Had the country also been drawn upon to a considerable extent by the United States troops previous to July, under the command of General Mitchel?

If my recollection serves me right I think General Mitchel reached Huntsville on the 11th of April. I do not know what time General Bifell got there, but I suppose it must have been about the 1st of July. My impression is that General Mitchel left the 3d or 4th of July and General Buell got there three or four days before General Mitchel left. This would make two months and a half that General Mitchel had been there with an army of some 6,000 or 8,000 men; but I do not think General Mitchel had levied very heavy contributions, for I was frequently at his headquarters, and he evidently tried to avoid levying contributions, and got his supplies as well as he could from the army stores in Tennessee. There was some difficulty in getting provisions along the road; his trains were fired into and bridges were burned; but I think he brought a great many supplies from Nashville or Murfreesborough. He levied contributions for the forage entirely. I recollect on one occasion there was a considerable sensation, as it was said he was going to levy upon the smoke-houses, and it produced a great deal of consternation among the people. But I do not think he levied upon the people while I was there. He obtained his forage entirely from the country.

Question. What was the cause of this consternation produced by this anticipation that General Mitchel was about to take meat; was it because of the pecuniary loss, or because he would take that which was necessary for the sustenance of the population?

Upon consultation with General Mitchel I informed him that there was a great scarcity of the article of meat there, and the general appointed myself and two others as a committee to go around and assess the smoke-houses; the levying was to be made according to the quantity we each had in our smoke-houses; but in the mean time a wagon train arrived and the levy never was made. I had been a pork-buyer, and I think I had never given more than $5, but $3.50 was the ruling price there up to the year 1861, when, owing to the condition of the country and that we had failed to get our usual supplies from Kentucky and Tennessee, where we had been in the habit of getting our meat, it went up to $10 and $12, and consequently there was less put up than we were in the habit of doing.

The Commission adjourned to meet February 23.

CINCINNATI, February 23, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Judge LANE'S examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Can you state, if you please, judge, whether the inhabitants in and about Huntsville were very much in want of the necessities of life—of provisions—at the time of my arrival there; that is, about the 1st of July last?

Yes, sir; never to my recollection was there so great a scarcity and never were provisions so high; they were about 200 or 300, perhaps 500, per cent. higher than usual during the last summer. I paid as high as $2.50 for coffee. The usual price of bacon in Huntsville is from 10 to 12 cents per pound. It could not be bought there at that time (if it could be had at all) under 30, 40, or 50 cents per pound.

Question. How was it, sir, with reference to breadstuffs?

Flour had advanced 200 or 300 per cent.; it was selling from $20 to $25 per barrel. Corn meal, which is usually bought for 37 to 50 cents per bushel, advanced to $1.50.

Question. Is the country you have described a cattle-raising region?

No, sir; it is a cotton-raising country there, and cotton-planters have come to the conclusion that the raising of cattle won't pay; that the injury that is done to the crop, the ground in winter, is more than the stock is worth. To understand it, I should say that for the preparation of cotton it requires that the land should be well pulverized, and if the stock is allowed to run upon the land in the winter in the spring the ground breaks up in clods. They have avoided raising more stock than is sufficient for their own purpose, and have no more on their own plantations than is necessary for their own use as working oxen and milch cows.

Question. How is it with other stock that is used for provisions?

We do not pretend to raise sheep there. Some poor planters raise a few. There are some planters that raise enough for their own purpose and that have cotton occasionally, but it is not a sheep-raising country; there is no attention paid to it. The farmers during the last ten years have got more in the habit of raising bacon than formerly. They used to raise cotton to buy bacon with, but now they raise other supplies upon their plantations.

Question. Am I to understand that as a general rule they raise no surplus of provisions?

As a general rule that part of the planting interest known as planters are always satisfied if they can raise enough to supply their own plantations. There is another class—the poorer class—who raise some supplies; that class do not raise cotton; they raise some supplies for the home market. That part of the country lying on the north side of the river has never raised more than enough to supply the home consumption of this country. I doubt if they have ever raised enough for that.

Question. State, if you please, what you know of the products of that part of Tennessee bordering on Alabama, the agricultural products, and the quantity of provisions in proportion to what is required for the sustenance of the population.

The products there are more various than they are in Alabama. In all that tier of counties, commencing at Franklin, running east, coming down through Lincoln, Giles, and Lawrence, it is more or less a cotton-producing country. In that part bordered by Alabama, a greater proportion of meat and breadstuffs is raised than on the Alabama side. I cannot state what proportion of those counties send certain amounts of breadstuffs and meat into Alabama, but the amount of meat and breadstuffs sent by them would not be enough to supply the north of Alabama without sending into Middle Tennessee and Kentucky.

Question. Which of those counties is the most productive in supplies of provisions and forage?

Lincoln, sir, produces more breadstuffs and meats than any of those counties. Lincoln is a mountainous county, containing a great deal of rich valley land not adapted to the cultivation of cotton; hence they raise other supplies—provisions.

Question. About what time were the supplies from the States north of Tennessee, from which you say Alabama and other Southern States have been in the habit of drawing supplies of provisions, cut off from that market by the rebellion?

The rebellion was inaugurated in the winter of 1860 and the spring of 1861, and the supplies were cut off about that time. For instance, we put up our bacon in the winter; the bacon supply was cut off in the winter of 1861. Before the inauguration of the rebellion we had put up for 1861, but in the winter of 1861 our supplies were cut off by the rebellion.

Question. Did that circumstance throw a greater demand upon that region of Tennessee for its surplus of provisions?

Yes, sir. That portion of Middle Tennessee and that portion that borders Alabama was overrun by the rebels, and there was a very large amount of Confederate stores put up all through that region of Tennessee.

Question. What route or routes did the rebel army pursue in its retreat from Nashville south in the spring of 1862?

I do not know. The larger proportion of the rebel army, and the whole of it as far as I know and believe, went from Nashville to Murfreesborough, from Murfreesborough to Shelbyville, from Shelbyville to Fayetteville, from Fayetteville to Huntsville, from Huntsville to Decatur. Some proportion of it may have gone by some other routes, but I am not certain.

Question. State, if you please, what you know of the agricultural resources of the country between Bridgeport and Chattanooga and within a circle of 10 or 15 miles around Chattanooga in all directions, explaining anything with reference to the topography of that country that may serve to illustrate the subject, if you please.

From Bridgeport to Chattanooga—the Memphis and Chattanooga Railroad crosses the Tennessee River at Bridgeport, and there on both sides of the river it is almost a perfectly mountainous country up to Chattanooga, and as to its productions they are extremely limited. It is only from 10 to 15 miles from Bridgeport to Chattanooga. From Bridgeport on the south and the north the country is entirely mountainous. When you get beyond, south of Chattanooga, there is some pretty good productive country within a distance of 15 miles; but I do not know much about that country beyond Chattanooga, except that there is some pretty good country, and I think the productions are entirely breadstuffs and meat.

Question. Do you know enough of it to be able to say whether there would probably have been much surplus provisions in that country last summer, considering the limits to which the Southern demand was confined by the circumstance of the rebellion?

I could only give an opinion there; I should say that there was not. That opinion would be predicated on this: that Chattanooga had been in the possession of the rebels and the rebel army was there during the whole spring and summer.

Question. If not required for any force at Chattanooga, would it probably have been drawn off for other points to supply the demands of the cotton States?

It is simply my opinion again and I must give my reasons. The Charleston Railroad passes right through that section of country, and the products of that country have been usually carried down to Macon, Augusta, and Savannah. None of the productions of that country have ever come down our way; they went from Chattanooga to Atlanta, Augusta, &c. The only channel for the products of that country was through the interior of Georgia, and it was from this country that the interior of Georgia got its supplies.

Question. Are there at any season fords across the Tennessee River within 10 miles of Chattanooga?

I have never heard of the Tennessee River being forded there at all. I have never known the Tennessee River forded anywhere except at the head of Muscle Shoals. I believe General Jackson forded there in 1814 with his army. It is called Colbert Shoals, and that is 150 to 200 miles from Chattanooga, and more by water.

Question. Do steamers ever cross the Muscle Shoals; and, if so, at what season of the year, and what is the greatest draught of a boat that can cross the shoals under the most favorable circumstances?

I have never known a steamer pass up the shoals—steamers built here in the West—but they were tugged up. There is no navigation, and never has been. No steamer has gone up unless it was carried up by force; that is, force independent of the steam itself.

Question. Was there formerly an attempt made to make the river navigable over the shoals by means of locks and dams?

Yes, sir; in 1828 there was an appropriation of land made by the General Government of, I think, a million of acres. There was raised from that land about $3,000,000, and that money was expended in the attempt to cut a canal around the shoals, but it proved a signal and entire failure, and it is now in perfect ruin. I do not know that a boat has ever passed through it.

Question. Have you a general knowledge of the fact that depredations to a very considerable extent were committed by Government troops in various places in North Alabama in the spring and summer of 1862 and prior to my arrival at Huntsville? If so, please state what effect was produced upon the temper of the people and their sentiments toward the Union by those depredations.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Mr. President, I object to that question. There is no earthly doubt but that depredations committed by soldiers will produce a bad effect upon the inhabitants of any country; the fact can be admitted without calling upon a witness to prove it; but if depredations were committed precisely at that time I cannot see what bearing it has upon the investigation we are engaged upon.

General BUELL. They have this bearing, Mr. President: that they go to explain to a considerable extent perhaps the cause of the dissatisfaction and demoralization which has been charged to have subsequently existed in the army under my command, and that has been one of the subjects of investigation before this Commission. It may serve as an answer, too, to the infamous denunciation that has been expressed in the public prints with reference to the measures which I adopted to suppress and punish those depredations and preserve discipline in my army. That is the object of the question.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the question should be put.

General BUELL. I propose to modify the question by inserting after the words "Government troops" "more particularly those under the command of Colonel Turchin, Nineteenth Illinois Regiment."

The PRESIDENT. I suggest that you specify what troops you refer to in a separate question.

General BUELL. I request, sir, I may have permission to amend the question.

General SCHOEPPF. I object to that amendment, because Colonel Turchin was tried by court-martial and has since been promoted.

The court was cleared; and, after discussion, it was decided that the proposed amendment to the question should not be put.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir. I have a general but not a personal knowledge of any depredations except in one particular instance. I do not know whether I am to speak from general knowledge or—

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The witness is to speak here as he would in any other court—from his personal knowledge, from what he knows.

General BUELL. I request that no greater restriction be placed upon this witness than has been practiced heretofore. I know no reason for a distinction at this particular time. I do not think the object of the investigation is to determine whether any particular person is to be hung for the crime of murder or whether he shall be adjudged to pay a certain forfeit. The object of the investigation is to get the best information we can in regard to the operations of the army and the exercise of my command. That has been the rule heretofore. The investigation has been pursued in a very general way, and I know no reason why it should be restricted now by a nice scrutiny.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. It certainly was not my intention, and if my memory serves me aright the rules governing the introduction of testimony have in no instance been departed from on the part of the Government, but I have permitted it on the part of the defense; but the departure from the established rules must not be carried too far.

General BUELL. I wish to say that I do not admit that any particular favors have been extended to the defense at all in this investigation or that any advantage has accrued from extraordinary liberality on the part of the prosecution. I do not admit that any greater liberties have been allowed to the defense in the introduction of evidence than can be found to have been used in the prosecution.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The record will speak for itself.

General BUELL. That might have been a sufficient reason why the declaration of extraordinary liberality was unnecessary.

General SCHOEPPF. The division referred to as having committed these depredations was subsequently under the command of General Rousseau, who testified that they were as good as any soldiers he wished to have. It is casting a reflection on the dead and can do no good at all.

General BUELL. That would have been a very good reason for approving of the proposed amendment. I do not wish to cast any reflection upon the troops at all. Many of the best officers in that command were outraged at these depredations, and, as I was told, threatened to resign their commission if these things were tolerated. I know that General Mitchel himself disapproved of them, except that he perhaps failed to enforce discipline which he would have himself approved. These violations were confined for the most part to a particular brigade. The question was put in the first place not very cautiously. It was for that reason I desired to amend it, so that it should apply to the troops to which the odium of this conduct properly belongs.

The court was cleared; when it was decided by the Commission that the witness may state any well-authenticated rumors or general information of depredations or misconduct, without involving any particular corps or regiment.

The WITNESS. I have a knowledge that there were general rumors that there had been various depredations committed; I might say that I got that information from General Mitchel himself and from various officers belonging to the different corps d'armée under his control. I will go further, and state that I was upon terms of the utmost intimacy with General Mitchel, and so far from having any disposition to do injustice to his memory I would say that I have known few men for whom I have had a higher regard. On one occasion, after there had been a very flagrant violation committed by the army, I accompanied General Mitchel from Huntsville to Athens, the adjoining town. The general had the different regiments assembled, and he made a speech to them, in which he deprecated very severely the course of conduct they had pursued, saying that he should certainly hold both officers and men to strict accountability for their conduct. As a matter of course those depredations that were charged to have been committed did produce some bad effect against the Federal army. I could go on further, and say that perhaps on the second day after General Mitchel arrived in Huntsville I sent for him, and we had a confidential interview, in which he asked my advice as a citizen as to what would be the proper policy to pursue there, and I have vanity enough to believe that the advice I gave him influenced his course of action. I could explain to the court what predicated the advice that was given. North Alabama had always been a Union State; the elections had taken place on the north side of the river, in which there had been an overwhelming demonstration, perhaps five Union votes to one secession, and I gave it to General Mitchel as my opinion that there was a Union sentiment, and that that sentiment should be fostered by a conciliatory course of conduct, and General Mitchel set out with the determination to pursue that policy. But I must say that my experience there convinced me that I was perhaps mistaken. No good came from the conciliatory policy; no good has since resulted from it, and I have seen fit to change my views on that subject.

The PRESIDENT. No good?

No good, sir. I take more blame upon myself, for I advised General Mitchel to pursue this course: that there should be no discrimination made; that it should not be known who were and who were not secessionists; that contributions should be levied on all alike; but I think now that if the Union men knew that they were to be protected, while the burdens should fall alone upon the secessionists, it would have made the Union men more decided. Sharing the burdens with the secessionists I think had an unfavorable effect.

By General BUELL:

Question. Do I understand you to say that the depredations that were committed at Athens and other places ought to have been approved by General Mitchel; that the effect of such approval or the encouragement of such depredations would have strengthened the cause of the Union among the people?

By no means. I did not so intend to be understood; on the contrary, I intended it to be understood that these depredations did excite and inflame the people against the Federal cause. I intended to say that the conciliatory policy pursued by General Mitchel, being extended alike to secessionists and Union men, did not produce the good effect upon the Union men that I had hoped.

Question. Was it a matter of notoriety that depredations similar to those committed at Athens were committed at various other points in North Alabama, and perhaps also in Tennessee on the borders of North Alabama?

It was notorious that there had been depredations committed at various places, but none of so flagrant a character as those committed at Athens.

Question. By a conciliatory policy I understand you to mean a policy which discriminates in a marked manner between those persons who are loyal to the Government and those who are disloyal?

General SCHOEFF. I object to that question; that is more politics than a subject for a military investigation. The President of the United States will decide which policy to adopt; it is not for us to decide here.

General BUELL. My policy in the exercise of my command has been made the subject of investigation; the testimony goes to particularize that policy and to the wisdom or error of it. It was therefore pertinent.

The WITNESS. The question shows that I am not perfectly understood as to the policy I recommended to General Mitchel. I wish my ideas of what is a conciliatory policy to be understood by the court.

General BUELL. That is my object in asking the question.

The WITNESS. The question implies exactly what I did not mean.

On the expression of the wish by Judge Lane to correct his answer and make himself more fully understood General Schoepf withdraws his objection.

General BUELL. The policy which you now think wisest I understood to be one which discriminated in a marked degree between persons who are loyal and those who are disloyal in their sentiments, and this I understand you to put in contrast or opposition to the conciliatory policy. Please be precise and state exactly what you mean by a conciliatory policy.

This is the understanding that General Mitchel and myself came to: That it would be a sound and good policy to be as kind to the people generally, both secessionists and Union men, as was consistent with his duty as a United States officer, and that there should be no discrimination made between Unionists and disunionists. That was the policy which I wished General Mitchel to adopt. The conciliatory policy was that all should be treated alike. The policy that I would now recommend would be that he should discriminate in favor of the Union men, and that his contributions should have been levied entirely upon the disunionists. By this course the Union men would have felt themselves protected by the Government of the United States, while the secessionists would have felt the burden of the war falling entirely upon themselves.

Question. Was it a feature of this conciliatory policy that disloyal men should be allowed to talk and act disloyally?

No; I intended that the conciliation should be on the part of General Mitchel; that the kindness should proceed from him as a United States officer, not expecting or intending that he would submit either to rebellious or seditious language, acts, or conduct from the disunionists.

Question. By a more rigorous policy do you mean that it would be wise for an army marching into a district of country to proceed at once to levy contributions, to take possession of their property, and treat them with severity and harshness personally merely on account of their opinions?

I should think that the commander of an army marching into a country should be governed by circumstances. If the country into which he marches was entirely rebellious, I should say that coercive means should be used to force that country into submission to the Constitution and the laws of the United States. If there was an element of Unionism, and one that I thought I could foster and encourage by pursuing a course of kindness and conciliation, I should certainly adopt that course. But wherever I marched an army into any portion of the rebellious States I should feel authorized to sustain that army, as far as I could, upon the sustenance that could be procured from the rebellious part of the community. I would go further, and say that no community in a state of rebellion to the Government of the United States has any right to claim the protection of that Government against which it was in rebellion. At the same time I would bring them into subjection in as civilized and Christianized a manner as I was capable of.

Question. Do I understand that you would take their property without compensation?

I should be governed entirely by what I considered military necessity required, and at the same time I should be opposed to any wanton destruction of property or any illegal or unconstitutional use of it. These are my present views, and not the views that I entertained at the time General Mitchel and yourself entered Tennessee with the Federal army. My views were then very different.

Question. In the whole district of North Alabama how many persons could General Mitchel have selected who, on account of their adhesion to the Government, would have been entitled to this favorable discrimination, as nearly as you can judge?

They would have been very scarce, although, as I have remarked, I had believed there was a strong Union sentiment there. When they came to take the responsibility of serving Jefferson Davis or the United States they were very cautious which side they took; and indeed I would say that there were not a dozen men in North Alabama who were willing to incur all the responsibility of coming out in favor of the Union and joining General Mitchel. But nevertheless there was a large number of what I term a sort of quasi Union men there who were anxious to receive the protection of the Government of the United States without incurring the responsibility of rendering themselves liable to be interrupted by the Confederate Army.

Question. Do you not believe that there is a very considerable portion of the population of the Southern States, at least of some of them, who would be very glad to place themselves again under the protection of the Constitution if the power of the rebel Government and its means of coercion did not render it impossible for them to do so?

I do, sir. I believe that four-fifths of the population of North Alabama would today be in favor of a reconstruction of this Government, and that they would be willing to unite with the Government of the United States if they could have a positive assurance that they could receive the protection of the Government without again being interrupted and interfered with by the Government of the Confederacy. I speak more especially of my own section, but from what I have heard from other sections of the country I believe the same would apply there.

Question. Is it true that those people who are at heart loyal to the Union are almost universally supporters of the rebellion?

Yes, sir; I believe there are a great many men (I speak more especially of my own section) who are loyal at heart, but who are professed secessionists; a state of things brought about by the fact that their personal safety, the safety of their families and property, depend upon their conforming to the requirements of the Confederate Government.

Question. Are or are not justice, the security of constitutional rights, and other results flowing from our institutions the considerations which have given rise to and have preserved this loyal sentiment in the people of the South toward the Constitution and the Government?

Yes, sir; I should say unhesitatingly that it was.

Question. What, then, would be likely to be the effect of the policy and conduct of an army upon these people which should violate all these principles? I do not speak now with reference to the people of the South more than to people everywhere.

The violation of justice and constitutional guaranties would in this case and everywhere be calculated to excite and enrage a loyal people, and I would go further, and say that it would be well calculated to estrange them from their Government.

Question. Suppose, then, these principles to be observed in any district of country, taking for example Middle Tennessee and North Alabama and the rebel power in that district of country to be destroyed and its armies kept out, which policy would leave those people in the best condition as regards their support to the Constitution and the Union, that which judges men according to their acts while they are at liberty to act according to their judgment and affection or that which punishes them harshly for acts which have been committed under the pressure of military force and a public sentiment which amounts almost to an insanity?

I should say that the preservation of justice, constitutional guaranties, and law to a loyal people would be well calculated to attach them to the Government, but that I know of no way of judging men's motives or their hearts but by their acts, and if their acts are rebellious I should say that they are rebellious at heart; but, at the same time, should the state of affairs take place as contemplated by the question, that the rebel army should be driven out of the country, a conciliatory policy would be best to pursue to bring them back again into the pale of the Constitution and under the protection of the Government of the United States.

Question. Suppose the rebel power not to be crushed and its armies not to be driven out, which line of conduct will leave these people in the best disposition in regard to the Union and the old Government, that policy which has respected personal rights or that which has violated them and treated the people with harshness and severity?

I should say that the mild policy, that which has treated them with the most consideration and in the mildest manner, would be the best calculated to attach them to the Government.

Question. Will you please state, judge, as far as you understand it, wherein my policy differed from that which General Mitchel entertained?

I do not know of any difference at all. Although I claimed to be very intimate with General Buell, perhaps I was not so conversant with his policy as I was with General Mitchel's; but, as far as I am aware, I know of no difference at all. I received as many favors asked for persons from General Mitchel as at the hands of General Buell, and perhaps as many at the hands of General Buell as from General Mitchel. Indeed I think their policy was the same; the only difference I know, I never held consultations with General Buell as to the policy that should be pursued, while I did with General Mitchel.

Question. If, then, General Mitchel's opinions and my own were not materially different upon the question of policy, was there any difference in our practice? If there was, please state what it was and what the effect of it was.

As far as I know there was no difference in their opinions as to the policy pursued. The only difference that now occurs to me was this: General Mitchel was a very impulsive man, and his practice did not in every instance conform to his opinions. For instance, some days, owing to circumstances, he would seem to act more harshly than at other times, while in the main he was kind and considerate. General Buell, on the contrary, seemed not to be under the same amount of impulse as generally actuated General Mitchel, and his practice was more uniform. I will state one fact. The general's trains on the railroad were very frequently fired into by guerrillas and nothing seemed to aggravate him and put him in a worse humor than for his trains to be fired into, and it not unfrequently happened when persons would come to me to ask favors or to have their wrongs redressed in some particular, knowing that his train had been fired into the previous day, I used to advise them to put off their application till I could find the general in a better humor, and I very rarely failed to obtain whatever I asked for the applicants. General Mitchel was also more communicative to me, while General Buell was disposed to be more reticent and to keep his own views to himself.

Question. Do I understand you to mean that this interference with his trains seemed to instigate General Mitchel to a harsher course of conduct toward the people?

By no means. It did not interfere with his practice, but with his professions. He would sometimes declare that he would do things that he did not do, and I would find him just as kind and as disposed to grant favors as before.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. With a portion of the people in arms against the Government, what do you consider the personal rights of those who side with the rebels, at least so far as giving aid and comfort goes?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President. I have not examined the judge with reference to what are the personal rights of persons engaged in this rebellion.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The question is based upon the proposition made by General Buell as to which were the better policy with the inhabitants of a country where our armies were, that which respected the personal rights of those inhabitants or that which treated them harshly. Now I want to know what are the personal rights of people who openly express their sympathy with the rebellion.

General BUELL. I do not think that in the whole course of my examination I have used the term "personal rights."

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. General Buell is mistaken; he did use the very extraordinary expression, as it struck me at the time, "personal rights."

General BUELL. I wish to deny that a man under any circumstances loses personal rights, and that it is extraordinary that men under any circumstances should have personal rights. If I understand the effect of it, it is to bring them to the level of the beast and nothing less.

The record was examined and the words found to have been employed by General Buell.

General BUELL. I withdraw my objection; I am very well satisfied to have used the phrase; but what I meant was that I had not put that idea prominently forward. As I am not allowed to re-examine the witness I will make another objection to the question, and that is that the witness' explanation of what he understands to be personal rights shall not stand as expressing my views upon that subject, and that is an objection that I consider to be valid against the question.

The PRESIDENT. That is an objection to the answer rather than to the question. I don't imagine that anybody would suppose that Judge Lane's answer to the question would be fastened upon you as your opinion as to what were personal rights.

General BUELL. I have no objection to the answer.

The WITNESS. All who aid and assist in treason are principals; there are no accessaries. All aiders and abettors should be treated, in a legal point of view, precisely as the traitor himself, and all who give aid and comfort must be traitors and rebels, and should be treated precisely as the principal was treated. I should make this distinction between such and a sympathizer, if he merely sympathizes—if he had not reduced it to acts—that he had not given aid and comfort to the enemy.

General BUELL. If the judge will allow me I would ask him to answer as a lawyer.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have the witness, and I have asked a question which was to illustrate a question asked in the examination-in-chief.

The PRESIDENT. It was hardly fair, general, to interrupt a witness, unless it is to make an objection to his answer.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Do you know of any right which prohibits the army of the Government from living upon the country it invades if that country is in a state of rebellion?

General BUELL. I ask again that the witness may answer the question as a lawyer.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I certainly must protest against this interference. I have the witness, and as to the manner of answering this question it is for me and the court to say.

General SCHOEPF. Mr. President, the judge-advocate is wrong. General Buell has complained that he has not been shown any favors. I propose that the court show him every favor and permit him to dictate to the witness.

General BUELL. I am very much affected by the judge-advocate's indignation that he should be interrupted in his investigation. I think, nevertheless, that my suggestion is a proper one and I urge it.

General TYLER. I move that the court be cleared.

The court was cleared; when it was decided by the Commission that when a witness is under examination the person having the right of questioning the witness shall not be interfered with except by objection made in the usual form.

The WITNESS. We have a clause in the Constitution of the United States which says that private or individual property shall not be appropriated without making fair and just compensation; but here comes up the question as to the law of military necessity, and without being a military man I do not know how far the military necessity or how far a commander-in-chief would have the right to claim individual and personal property; but I would suppose, and this would be my answer, that he would have the right to levy contributions upon the enemy to the amount of what was necessary for his present and pressing necessities.

Question. Abstaining, then, from levying contributions upon a country in a state of insurrection and granting safeguards and other protection to rebel property are to be regarded as favors and not as a recognition of rights?

Yes, sir; I so consider them.

Question. Has not the rebel Government been in the habit of prosecuting those they supposed to be the loyal men of the South to the furthest extent of their power?

Of that fact I have no personal knowledge, but from reliable information I believe they have.

Question. If we abstain from exercising our rights as a Government by levying contributions, &c., does it not in fact make it safer at the South to be a rebel than a loyal citizen?

Yes, sir; I should say that it did. But let me explain. The disloyal citizen would have two chances: he is protected by the Government of the United States, and let the rebels triumph he would be protected by the rebel Government, while the loyal citizen would only have one chance of protection.

Question. In a disputed territory where the two armies were contending, as in Tennessee or North Alabama, has not this conciliatory policy been taken on the part of the inhabitants as an evidence of weakness on our part and thereby worked our injury?

I should say not as an evidence of weakness, but as an extreme disposition to conciliate.

The Commission adjourned to meet February 24.

CINCINNATI, February 24, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Judge LANE'S cross-examination continued.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Do you recollect, judge, how many counties you described in your evidence in chief lying along the line of the railway?

Yes, sir; I recollect there were only three. There are only four counties on the north side of the river—Limestone, Madison, Jackson, Lauderdale. The railroad passes through but three of them—Limestone, Madison, and Jackson.

Question. I refer to those counties of which you gave us a detailed description of their products.

There are five—De Kalb, Marshall, Morgan, Lawrence, and Franklin—on the south side.

Question. What is the population of those, if you can recollect?

I commence with Jackson County, the extreme eastern county, on the north side of the river: the voting population is about 2,000; Madison, about 800; Limestone, 1,200; Lauderdale, about 1,800; De Kalb (on the north side of the river), say, 1,400; Marshall, about 1,400; Morgan, 1,200; Lawrence, about 1,500; Franklin, about 1,800. The usual calculation there is ten inhabitants to a vote.

Question. Does that include the black as well as the white population?

Yes, sir.

Question. Was there subsistence—meat, corn, &c.—enough in those counties in July, 1861, to carry that population through to the next year?

I have no doubt they get through upon it, but I am satisfied it was a short allowance. I knew that on the south side of the river they were suffering for the substantial of life.

Question. In that term "substantials" what is included?

I mean meat and bread.

Question. Do you know, judge, whether the railroad from Huntsville to Stevenson is now in use by the rebels?

I so understand from the newspapers and rumors; but that they are running but one engine from Bridgeport to Decatur on that line of railroad.

General Buell desiring to ask further questions of the witness on the war policy, the court was cleared for a decision, when it was decided not to depart from the established rule.

JOHN B. YATES (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States, if you please.

John B. Yates; acting major of the First Michigan Engineers and Mechanics.

Question. Have you a commission in that regiment? State for what rank it is.

Captain Company A.

Question. Were you on duty in North Alabama last spring, under the command of General Mitchel?

Yes, sir; I was.

Question. Did you have anything to do in constructing what was called the gunboat Tennessee while you were there?

I had the charge of the construction of the gunboat Tennessee while I was there.

Question. State as particularly as you can what its construction was, its dimensions, and its subsequent operations.

It was made from a horse-ferry boat that ran from Whitesburg, 10 miles south of Huntsville, to the other side of the Tennessee River. Its dimensions were 52 feet long, if I remember correctly, and about 11 to 12 feet wide. It was built in the first place for the purpose of a gunboat, to run up and down the Tennessee River from Whitesburg to Bridgeport. The sides in the first place had barricades on them filled with cotton, to protect the men on the boat from the guns of the guerrillas; there was also one gun of Captain Loomis' First Michigan Battery. The machinery was a stationary engine, taken from a saw-mill and put on the boat. The intention was in the first place to case the boat with iron, to ward off more effectually the bullets of the guerrillas, but the tonnage of the boat was not sufficient to support it so as to make it bullet-proof. After it was discovered that it would not answer the purpose it was built for it was taken down the river to Decatur and there used as a ferry-boat by order of General Mitchel, who determined it could not be used with safety to patrol the river. As the machinery was continually getting out of order, he was afraid it would become unmanageable and be taken by the guerrillas, who would destroy the boat and take the gun.

Question. Did it ever make a trip up the river ?

It made one trip up. How far I do not remember.

Question. Did it go as far as Bridgeport ?

I do not know. As they were going up the river they were fired upon beyond Gunter's Landing by a party of guerrillas as the boat went near the bank, and some bullets went through the barricade. I heard they went nearly up to Bridgeport. That is my impression, though I do not know the exact distance they went.

Question. What was the defect or peculiarity in the engine which made it inefficient for that purpose ?

It was, I think, a cast wheel, and the wheel was breaking. It was also a stationary engine, and had to be made so that we could reverse it, and the reversing gearing was constantly getting out of order. We had the castings made at Huntsville.

Question. How many men was it intended to carry as a guard or crew ?

I do not know how many men it was intended to carry, but there was one company of the Tenth Ohio, Captain Steele, and one gun of Captain Loomis' Michigan Battery.

Question. What were its performances as a ferry-boat ?

We built two boats, and placed one on each side of this ferry-boat, calculating to drive wagons on each side—two wagons to a boat—and distribute men on the ferry and on each of the two lighters, to ferry them across the river. We used it for some time—I do not know how long—with two boats. One of them became unserviceable, so that we were compelled to use but one.

Question. Could you carry animals with the wagons; and how many men could you carry in addition ?

I never saw them carry any wagons or mules across or any men. I never was down there at the time the boat was running as a ferry-boat. When it was built it was put in charge of ferrymen that were sent there; but the calculation was to put two wagons and four mules to a boat; that was General Mitchel's idea.

Question. How many men was it estimated to carry in addition ?

From 250 to 300 men was one calculation.

Question. Do you know whether in practice its capacity proved to come up to the estimate ?

I think it did not, as I heard a great many complaints about it.

Question. What were the dimensions of those flats used in connection with the gunboat for ferrying ?

The one we made was about 54 feet long and 14 feet wide; that was the good one. I do not remember the dimensions of the other, but it was smaller.

Question. What was the difficulty in replacing these boats when they became disabled ?

It was impossible to get the sides or the lumber to cover the bottom. We had a great deal of trouble in getting those we had there; they were a little decayed, and we had to patch them up so as to make them serviceable.

Question. Do you know anything about the measures that were taken to get out the lumber for the construction of the pontoon bridge at Bridgeport after my arrival at Huntsville last summer ?

I received an order from General Mitchel to set all the mills running between Huntsville and Stevenson to get out lumber for the pontoon bridges; and after a great deal of trouble I got two started; they were some 5 miles between Huntsville and Stevenson. But it was impossible to get the men to work at them; they were afraid of guerrillas running in upon them at night. It was considered dangerous to start them, and it being a dry season many of them were out of water; one of them had no water at all. At Jackson's Mill two of our men were taken prisoners after we had started it. Paint Rock Mill, one of the mills we had in operation, was idle a great deal of the time for the want of water.

Question. What was done from first to last to carry on and complete the work?

All the mills were started that we could start. Our regiment was sent to Stevenson to build the boats, and we thought when we moved there that when we got into camp the lumber would be ready, but we were delayed a number of days for the want of the lumber.

Question. Did you work the mills yourself or did you depend upon the owners to work them?

Paint Rock Mill was worked under the charge of the owner, a man named Douglas, and a detail from our regiment and a detail from the Tenth Wisconsin to assist. Jackson's Mill was under the charge of Jackson, the owner of the mill, with a detail from our regiment. Colonel Innes had the general supervision of both mills after they were fairly started.

Question. Notwithstanding these delays, were the boats for the bridges constructed before the completion of the railroads and the accumulation of supplies at Stevenson which would have enabled the army to use them?

The boats were not completed before the road was finished through to Bridgeport, but they were finished before there were sufficient supplies collected at Stevenson for the army.

Question. Do you know anything about the abundance or scarcity of supplies for the troops under the command of General Mitchel before my arrival there? State, if you please, whatever you know upon that subject.

We were on half rations at one time—I do not remember the exact date—and we had a great deal of trouble to get our trains through; they were attacked and captured by bands of guerrillas. At one time Captain Paul, a captain of the commissary department, informed me that he had no rations on hand for the next day, and wanted to know when our trains would be in; and then we were on half rations. We got an order that our men should have full rations, as they were hard at work on the bridges, but the rest were on half rations.

Question. Did you use all the supplies you could gather in the country?

I do not know that we used all we could gather, but we used a great deal that we gathered from the country.

Question. Was it the policy of General Mitchel to supply himself as far as possible from the country he occupied?

That I cannot answer directly, but he was always anxious about having supply trains come up, so as to be able to supply his army from his own department.

Question. Was your scarcity due to the difficulties in the transportation of supplies from the depots of Nashville?

Yes, sir.

Question. About what force had General Mitchel on that line that was supplied in that way?

We had the Third Division and about 600 to 700 negroes and men at work on the railroad.

Question. Estimate the number of men altogether, as nearly as you can.

I think 7,000 would cover them all.

Question. With the difficulties that you experienced in supplying 7,000 men, what would you think of the practicability of supplying 20,000 with the same means?

It would be worse in proportion.

Question. At what time did you get this order to prepare lumber for pontoon bridges and from whom did it emanate?

I got it about June 30, 1862. The order emanated from General O. M. Mitchel to me. General Mitchel said to me that he was ordered to get the lumber out.

Question. Did he state by whom?

We supposed it was by General Buell's order, although his name was not on the order.

Question. State whatever you know in regard to the service of your regiment during the summer of my arrival at Huntsville; and if you do not know particularly of the services performed by the whole regiment, state whether any portion of it, to your knowledge, was idle during that time.

No portion of it, to my knowledge, was idle during that time. Two companies with me, under General Mitchel, were hard at work from the time of our arrival at Huntsville, and also on the march from Nashville to Murfreesborough and from Murfreesborough to Huntsville.

Question. Does your answer include the time subsequent to my arrival at Huntsville? You will observe the question refers to that time.

It refers to the time we finished the pontoon boats.

Question. How were the companies under your command employed during that time?

In the building of bridges on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, assisting in running the trains from Huntsville to Stevenson and from Huntsville to Elk River, also in building one of the bridges between Stevenson and the Tennessee River, and assisting in building the pontoon bridges.

Question. Have you traveled frequently on the railroad between Huntsville and Bridgeport?

I have.

Question. State what you know from observation of the character of that country and its agricultural resources.

About 16 miles east of Huntsville, on the railroad, the land is very good as far as you can see on each side of the road; from there on to Bridgeport it is through a broken, rocky country, and with only small clearings on each side of the road.

Question. Has this productive tract that you speak of any name by which you can designate it, and what is the extent of it along the road?

I cannot designate it by any name, and I do not know anything of its productions, save that once in a while we would pass what would look like a good farm from the car windows; and these points were between Huntsville and Brownsborough and Brownsborough and Paint Rock Station.

Question. Do you mean that the country for 16 miles is productive and cultivated or do you mean that isolated points for that distance are cultivated?

Occasional farms; not the entire stretch of country.

Question. What is the character of the country between these farms?

The road runs through rock cuts.

Question. Were you in the battle of Perryville?

I was.

Question. With what corps?

Three companies of the Michigan Engineers, under Major Hopkins, attached to General Rousseau's division.

Question. Did you see many officers and men the night and morning after the battle, and have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with their opinions in regard to the condition of affairs consequent upon that battle?

I saw quite a number; I do not know how many.

Question. As far as you know, what was the expectation of the officers and troops in regard to a battle the following morning; that is, the morning of the 9th?

I can speak for our command more than I can for any other. We expected to be called into action the next morning. Our men were very tired, and Major Hopkins told them they must get all the rest they could, for they would probably have to go into the fight in the morning. We were ordered by General Rousseau to take our position in the rear of Colonel Starkweather's brigade, and we were drawn up in line of battle when we got to our position.

Question. Was there, as far as you know or from any indications you could see, any other expectation than that the battle was to be renewed that morning?

All the officers with whom I talked thought we were going into battle again next morning.

Question. Do you mean by that that you expected to fight the enemy on that ground?

I did. I expected that we would fight the enemy, keeping the ground in the morning that we left after dark.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. At the time the troops were on half rations that you speak of in your examination-in-chief did they suffer any?

There were some complaints, but I was not around among the troops to see whether they suffered or not. I was posted at the depot, and attended there most of the time, assisting Captain Paul, by furnishing transportation. I only heard from him that the troops were on half rations and from the guards who were stationed around the building that they had not full rations.

Question. Except from the guards about the building you did not know anything of your own knowledge?

No, sir; not from my personal knowledge; only from hearsay and from our regimental quartermaster, who said that the rest of the troops were on half rations and that we were on full because we had hard work at daily labor.

Question. Do you not know, from what you observed of the guards about the building, that they lived about as well on half rations as when they were on full?

From their looks they seemed to. I did not see any signs of pinching hunger.

Question. Do you know anything about the ferry at Gunter's Landing and the ford there?

I never saw the ferry; but all the boats on this side were, I believe, destroyed by General Mitchel's orders. Of the ford I remember nothing, though I may have heard of it at the time.

Question. Was that the case with the boats at the other ferry besides the one you speak of?

I believe so. General Mitchel gave orders to have all the boats destroyed from Decatur up the river to Bridgeport on this side of the river—all boats that guerrillas could get to cross over from the other side. Captain King, Fourth Ohio Cavalry, went over at one time and destroyed some boats that were over there by General Mitchel's orders.

Question. There was but one ferry in operation, and that was the steam-ferry you speak of?

Yes, sir.

By General SCHOEPP:

Question. What was the amount of transportation that each regiment had in that division?

About thirteen wagons to a regiment.

Question. How many wagons were in a brigade train to each of the brigades?

I do not remember.

Question. Do you know if there was a brigade train to each brigade?

I do not know for a certainty.

Question. Do you know the number of wagons in a division train?

One train that went out had two hundred wagons that I know of.

By General TYLER:

Question. What particular duties did you perform while this order for getting out timber was being executed?

I was acting as military superintendent of the railroad for General Mitchel at that time, and also started those men up the road to look up the mills and report their condition.

Question. Were these mills run under your orders or your supervision?

They were started under my orders. A short time after they were started I was relieved of the superintendence of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, in order to report to Colonel Innes, who then took the supervision of the mills.

Question. What was the amount of lumber ordered to be cut up by General Mitchel for bridges, pontoon boats, &c., in feet, board measure?

I cannot estimate the correct amount. I have the bills of timber at my tent. It was somewhat less, though, than the bill of timber for the boats that we built.

Question. Was there as much as half a million of feet, board measure?

I think it was about 300,000 feet, as near as I remember, but I cannot answer correctly from memory.

Question. Was standing timber plenty for supplying your mills; and, if so, what kind?

Oak timber was plenty.

Question. How many mills did you put in operation?

Two mills; Paint Rock Mill and Jackson's mill.

Question. Were these the only mills that could have been put in operation at that time within your control?

General BUELL. Mr. President, I do not wish to object to the question at all, but suggest to the Commission that it is unnecessary. I do not pretend that the failure to complete the bridge in time was the cause of my not moving to Chattanooga. I only call evidence upon this point to show how the troops were occupied; that preparations were being made. With that explanation I have no objection to the question.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; and I had an almost endless amount of trouble to get these two started and keep them running.

Question. What were the particular troubles you had to encounter?

Want of water, fear of guerrillas, and a want of machinery.

Question. Would not a single company or half a company guarantee these mills from incursions from the guerrillas?

It would have needed as much as one company, and that one company would have needed stockades for protection.

Question. Then I understand from your testimony that only two mills were available to cut your lumber out, and that these were where water is uncertain; that they were exposed to guerrilla incursions, and the machinery was inferior?

At one of these mills—Paint Rock—the water was all the while failing, though that mill was in the least danger. The mill at Stevenson was a pretty good one. The others were right in the infested region, near Woodville. I think that is the name of the station.

Question. I think in your direct testimony you say that the road was completed before there were sufficient supplies collected at Stevenson; what means had you of knowing what were sufficient supplies and when they were collected?

My means of knowing were from Captain Smith and from the trouble our quartermaster had occasionally in getting supplies and from the general talk of officers and men connected with the commissary department.

Question. Do you know that any particular amount of supplies was fixed upon as necessary; if so, what was that amount?

I do not know the amount or if there was any fixed upon.

Question. You were a captain in Colonel Innes' regiment, I understand; would Colonel Innes have had as good an opportunity of knowing or testifying as to the points upon which you have testified yourself?

With the exception of about the formation and building of the gunboat he could have spoken as to the efficiency or inefficiency of the gunboat while acting as ferry-boat at Decatur and about the trouble in starting those mills. He would not have known as much as I did of the complaints that the mills were not started sooner, but I have endeavored to explain to him many times why they were not started sooner.

Question. Then Colonel Innes was dissatisfied, was he, with the administration of that branch of the service?

He was dissatisfied with the delay in starting the mills, but he never complained of me as far as running the road was concerned.

Question. You stated in your direct testimony that General Mitchel's force was 7,000 men; did that include the whole force of General Mitchel, all told?

At Huntsville and supplied from that depot.

Question. What other divisions had he and where were they?

He had a brigade or part of a brigade a part of the time at Shelbyville, I think.

Question. Any other?

Not any that I know of that were supplied from Huntsville.

Question. That is included in the 7,000 men?

It is not included in the 7,000.

Question. Had General Mitchel any force under his command except the 7,000 men and this brigade or part of a brigade at Shelbyville?

There were some troops at Murfreesborough, but I do not know whether they reported to General Mitchel or not. I am not acquainted with part of General Mitchel's force. In this 7,000 men were included the employés and negroes on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad.

Question. To what amount?

I think 600 or 700, but I do not remember the exact number on the rolls.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. Was that division train that you spoke of as containing two hundred wagons made up of regimental and brigade wagons or was it not a division train proper?

I think it was made up of details; so many wagons from each regiment and so many wagons from each brigade. At one time almost all the wagons in the division were called on to go for supplies.

After the examination was concluded, by permission of the Commission, Major Yates made the following addition to his testimony:

The WITNESS. At Jackson's Mill, near Stevenson, where we were getting out the lumber, we had to send to Nashville for a circular saw, the one being unfit for use; this was one cause of delay that I remember. I wish to make that statement to show that everything was done that could be done.

Capt. JOSEPH J. SLOCUM (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States.

Joseph J. Slocum; captain and commissary of subsistence.

Question. Were you on duty at Huntsville last summer, under command of Major-General Mitchel?

I was.

Question. Do you know anything of the measures that were adopted to procure supplies for the army in North Alabama during that time and what the difficulties were? If so, please state what you know about both.

The supplies were derived partly from the Government headquarters at Nashville, partly by foraging upon the country and pressing supplies. At times the army was on half rations. I have had great difficulty in getting supplies in that vicinity; that is, the neighborhood of Huntsville.

Question. Did you endeavor to get as much from the country as you could procure and was that General Mitchel's policy? Indeed, was it necessary, from the difficulty you had in transporting supplies from the depots at Nashville?

It was necessary. I was acting in the capacity of quartermaster to our army in North Alabama at that time and not as commissary.

Question. Did your position and duty nevertheless give you an opportunity of being acquainted with the facts you have stated?

They did.

Question. Did you know of complaints on the part of the inhabitants of the country in consequence of treatment which resulted from this method of procuring supplies?

They were constantly complaining, but it was necessary, and we paid no attention to them. The forage supplies in that portion of the country were all procured, up to the time of General Buell's arrival, from the inhabitants. Our supplies of forage were much more abundant after General Buell came to Huntsville, as they were all then directed to that place from Nashville; consequently we had more with which to supply the army, but not sufficient for the whole army. A portion of the time our troops were in a suffering condition from the lack of supplies, principally in the vicinity of Bridgeport, toward Chattanooga and in that direction; even after General Buell came there it was impossible to get up supplies fast enough.

Question. How long did you remain on duty in Huntsville after my arrival?

Not long; I think between two and three weeks.

Question. Did you still during that time continue to draw all the forage you could from the country besides what you obtained from the depots?

We continued to draw from the country, but I am not prepared to say that we drew all we could; we had our forage trains out almost every day gathering in supplies.

Question. Do you mean by that that the country might have afforded more supplies or that you did not avail yourself of the means of your position to procure them—such as wagons, &c.

My impression is that the policy that had been pursued previous to that was such that we did not want to draw supplies from the country if we could help it.

Question. That is during what time?

During the months of May and June, while General Mitchel was in command.

Question. How did the troops at Bridgeport and Battle Creek obtain their forage?

I directed their quartermasters to forage upon the country, but they reported back that forage could not be obtained; consequently I was obliged to send supplies from the neighborhood of Huntsville. They did procure some supplies, but not sufficient.

Question. Do you know that they were sometimes in very great want of forage?

I do.

Question. What number of animals were kept at these points that you remember?

My memory fails me. I might answer that question with more reflection. General Sill was at Battle Creek with one brigade, I think—two regiments, at least; and the animals belonging to the same I suppose he had with him and the cavalry that were furnished him for scouting purposes.

Question. Was the number large or small in proportion to the number of troops; do you remember?

Small. Our means of transportation were strained to the utmost all the time to keep up a sufficient supply. I mean by that that we had no sufficient transportation. Our animals were worn-out. We had before that impressed a great many from the country, particularly for cavalry purposes.

Question. Did you make use of your regimental train's baggage wagons for hauling supplies as well as of your division train's?

I did.

Question. About what number of troops were in that part of the country—say on the line from Huntsville to Battle Creek—prior to the date of my arrival and before the arrival of troops from Corinth? If you cannot answer by numbers, give idea by brigades and regiments.

About 4,000.

Question. What troops did this include; what brigades or divisions? It is necessary to designate the regiments.

The troops of the Third Division, composed of the Seventeenth Brigade, the Eighth Brigade, and I believe a portion of the Ninth Brigade, with the artillery of Loomis' battery, Edgerton's and Simonson's battery, and the Fourth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

Question. Would not all of these have amounted to more than 4,000, or were some of these beyond the limits stated in the question.

I might say that my number perhaps was low, but they were beyond the limits. There was Colonel Turchin's brigade in the other direction. The troops were constantly moving up and down from east to west upon that road, sometimes more and sometimes less—moving from Decatur or Athens particularly, up and down the road, as they were required. At one time Turchin's brigade was at one end of the road and at other times at the other. I cannot now state about what time that was. I know one time that entire brigade was moved to a point north of Bridgeport; I think it was somewhere near La Vergne, in that direction, where they fought—I think at Winchester. General Negley had command of the expedition and drove the rebels back, but our troops were a good deal scattered.

Question. You mentioned to me the other day that you had by accident laid your hand upon a dispatch which exemplified the scarcity of supplies and the difficulty in procuring them. Have you it with you, captain?

I have. In looking over some of my old papers I found this dispatch a few days ago. I was searching for some other papers though:

"BATTLE CREEK, July 4, 1862.

"General BUELL:

"There is no forage here and no rations; everything is on short allowance. I have telegraphed and written, but could get nothing. Have no instructions in case of an attack. Enemy's pickets on the opposite side of the river. Sent General Mitchel official communication yesterday explaining everything. Refer you to it, as also to dispatches to-day.

"JOHN C. STARKWEATHER,
"Colonel First Wisconsin Infantry."

This is indorsed on the back to General Smith:

"See to supplies at once. Have you received the communication of yesterday and the dispatch of to-day? Look into the matter.

"D. C. B."

Another indorsement:

Captain Slocum to Captain Paul.

"Attend with all diligence to the within matter, and report to me forthwith what you have done.

"WM. S. SMITH,
"Brigadier-General, Third Division."

Question. Did this scarcity in this case occur under General Mitchel's administration?

It did. I suppose at the very time that dispatch was sent General Mitchel was relieved from the command, which accounts for its being indorsed by General Smith.

Question. On what day did General Mitchel leave his command?

I think on the 2d of July or thereabouts.

Question. Without reference to the inconvenience which the people of the country complained of on account of having their supplies taken from them for the use of the army, did they complain of abuses and wrongs practiced upon them by the parties engaged in collecting or pretending to be acting under authority for that object?

Not that I am aware of. I have suffered a great deal of abuse myself from these parties because they thought I was the responsible person, but I am not aware that the parties sent for the supplies inflicted any abuse upon them.

Question. "Abuse" is not perhaps the best word to use in the question. I do not refer to abusive language; injury might be a more ap-appropriate word; nor do I inquire whether they actually suffered these injuries, but whether they complained of them.

I do not recollect of any instance of that kind at Huntsville, though I am aware that complaints were made at other points. The rudeness of soldiers is about all I can remember now. In the matter of pressing horses particularly it was a very grievous one to them. Our men would sometimes, perhaps, use extreme language; the people would provoke it; but I remember nothing else.

Question. Is it a matter of notoriety that great outrages were committed by portions of the troops in that district of country?

If accounts are true of great outrages having been committed, it is. We had some regiments in that division who were extremely hard to control; but they were particularly good at the warfare that was carried on there, I suppose, of abusing the people. For instance, the Nineteenth Illinois has the credit of having a hard reputation. The Tenth Ohio was a pretty good regiment in that way, but it was under discipline. These regiments, particularly the Nineteenth Illinois, were kept out, I believe, as much as possible to the extreme for bushwhacking purposes, as we called it. They were very good at that and a very fine regiment when brought into action.

Question. With the difficulty you had in supplying the troops that you had on that line under the command of General Mitchel what would you think of the practicability of supplying 20,000 men at Bridgeport with the same means of transportation and the railroads of the country as they were at that time?

I should say that it would be wholly impracticable. One thing I distinctly remember: It was the fact of our division train for this small army that General Mitchel had with him at Huntsville of about 5,000 men—that train of 85 to 100 or, say, 125 wagons—was kept so constantly at work that it did not give them time even to have their horses and mules shod in some instances.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Under whose command was General Mitchel at Huntsville?

General Buell's.

Question. Why, then, do you speak of General Mitchel's policy; was it not in fact the policy of the commanding general?

As I understood at that time General Mitchel's command was separate, at the same time being a portion of General Buell's army; but he was ordered to go to North Alabama to take possession of that country. I did not join him until after he arrived there.

Question. Were not the complaints of the inhabitants there really based upon your attempt to gather supplies from them and not from any depredation or abuse from the soldiers?

As I said, I am not aware of complaints having been made; they felt bitter, and would raise every possible objection they could at the most trifling thing. They were paid. I am not aware that anything was ever taken from them for which they were not paid. In some instances they preferred Confederate notes, but I could not supply them.

Question. What articles did our forces need; were we suffering there from a lack of subsistence?

Bacon was one thing in the way of subsistence. Hay and oats we never had for our animals. The cattle fed on corn and fodder altogether.

Question. Did not the men have a sufficiency of beef, mutton, and pork?

No, sir; we would send out into the country and get in beef cattle frequently and slaughter them. I do not know that we ever had any mutton. Pork we had occasionally, as we could get it from the North. I recollect in one instance we had a yoke of oxen sent to me, that were captured by one of our scouts, belonging to a Confederate officer. They were very poor and thin, but I was ordered to turn them over to the commissary to be killed. We had no fresh beef.

Question. I understand you to say that it was the lack of transportation that made it impossible to support 20,000 men where 5,000 or 6,000 suffered?

No, sir. I do not recollect saying transportation only. We had nearly exhausted the whole country in the way of supplies. I mean by that that our trains could not supply such an army. The distance they had to go was 25 to 30 miles. They had to be wagoned down to Alabama.

Question. Do you know anything more of this telegram than what appears upon the face of it?

I do not; except that I was two or three times called over to General Smith's headquarters—in fact I was at the headquarters all the time—to consult with him on the possibility of getting supplies from Battle Creek. General Sill and Colonel Starkweather both represented that the troops were in a suffering condition.

Question. Do you know whether this refers to forage and rations or as to what the country might supply or what they would have on hand from the stores of the army?

I think it refers to both, or, properly speaking, to what they had belonging to the army. Of course they looked to headquarters for their supplies as much as possible.

Question. The country about Battle Creek was about the worst region you had to live upon, was it not?

I believe it was.

Question. In the indorsement upon the back you are ordered to see to the supplies at once; do you recollect how you remedied the difficulty?

My impression is that the commissary sent supplies that he had received from Nashville directly down there. I sent wagons into the country that got in some corn and fodder, and that, together with some supplies that were received from Nashville, I believe were sent down. But it did not remedy the evil; it was only an alleviation of it.

Question. If the two regiments could not subsist there, how did Crittenden's and McCook's manage to subsist till late in August?

As I said before, supplies came in more abundantly after General Buell came to Huntsville; they were directed to that point. The steamboats were coming down to Nashville by the Cumberland River loaded for that army. These supplies were all sent direct to Huntsville as fast as they could be sent there, but our communication was very uncertain from Nashville. I was ordered away from Huntsville on the 11th of July, I believe.

Commission adjourned to meet February 25.

CINCINNATI, February 25, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

RUSSELL HUSTON (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and place of residence, if you please.

Russell Huston; residence, Nashville, Tenn.

Question. What is your profession or calling?

I am a lawyer.

Question. I wish to submit to Mr. Huston and to the Commission an order which I published on entering Nashville in February last, and to ask him if he recognizes it as embodying the policy which I announced as that which I proposed to observe toward the people of Tennessee in the conduct of the war as far as my command was concerned. It is dated Nashville, February 26, 1862. General Orders, No. 13a.

I think I remember that order. My attention was called to the first order issued by General Buell, because I wished particularly to see what would be the policy of the Federal Army in our country. I recognize that order as embodying his policy in the conduct of the war in Tennessee.

Question. Will you please state what effect, upon general principles and from experience as far as you have had an opportunity of observing its practical operations, such a policy, if carried out, would have had upon the temper of the people of Tennessee with reference to the cause of the Union?

I take the object of the United States to be to restore the Union; not merely a physical conquering or reannexing of territory in which the people are in rebellion, but, as far as it may be in the power of the Government to effect it to restore the affections of the people to the Government. I take it to be of first importance to conquer the men in arms. After this is done I should say that such a course should be pursued as would effect the other purpose of restoring the love of the people for their country and Government. This may be accomplished to some extent, as I think, while the armies are passing through the country, but not by unnecessary harshness. I speak in reference to quiet and peaceable citizens. I think the order spoken of in the question is conciliatory, and if carried out was calculated to win back the affections of the people. I think that the course pursued by the army under that and like orders had a good effect upon the people of Tennessee as far as I had access to them. I think so from what I saw myself and I would say so from the knowledge I have of human nature. I think there was a better state of feeling toward the Government in Middle Tennessee as late as July, 1862, and has been since.

Question. Do you recognize in that order or in the practical effect of it anything which places loyal and disloyal people, those who are friendly or hostile in their conduct, on the same footing under all circumstances—anything that exempts from punishment conduct that is injurious to the interest of the Government?

I do not, sir. I recognize in that order a distinction in some cases between loyal and disloyal persons.

Question. From your knowledge of the people in Tennessee and the effect of the policy initiated there upon their disposition toward the Government, as far as it was faithfully executed, in what position do you believe the State of Tennessee would stand to-day if the rebel armies had been kept out of the State and the people left free to express their opinions and wishes?

By order of the president the Order No. 13a was here read to the Commission:

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 13a. }

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO,
Nashville, Tenn., February 26, 1862.

The general commanding congratulates his troops that it has been their privilege to restore the national banner to the capital of Tennessee. We believe that thousands of hearts in every part of the State will melt with joy to see that honored flag reinstated in a position from which it was removed in the excitement and folly of an evil hour; that the voice of her people will soon proclaim its welcome, and that their manhood and patriotism will protect and perpetuate it. The general does not deem it necessary, though the occasion is a fit one, to remind his troops of the rule of conduct they have hitherto observed and are still to pursue. We are in arms not for the purpose of invading the rights of our fellow-countrymen anywhere, but to maintain the integrity of the Union and protect the Constitution, under which its people have been prosperous and happy. We cannot, therefore, look with indifference on any conduct which is designed to give aid and comfort to those who are endeavoring to defeat these objects; but the action to be taken in such cases rests with certain authorized persons, and is not to be assumed by individual officers or soldiers. Peaceable citizens are not to be molested in their persons and property. Any wrongs to either are to be promptly corrected and the offenders brought to punishment.

To this end all persons are desired to make complaint to the immediate commander of officers and soldiers so offending, and if justice be not done promptly, then the next commander, and so on till the wrong is redressed. If the necessities of the public service should require the use of private property for public purposes fair compensation is to be allowed. No such appropriation of private property is to be made except by the authority of the highest commander present, and any other officer or soldier who shall presume to exercise such privilege shall be brought to trial. Soldiers are forbidden to enter the residences or grounds of citizens on any plea without authority. No arrests are to be made without the authority of the commanding general, except in case of actual offense against the authority of the Government, and in all such cases the fact and circumstance will immediately be reported in writing to headquarters through the intermediate commanders. The general reminds his officers that the most frequent depredations are those which are committed by worthless characters, who straggle from the ranks on the plea of not being able to march, and where the inability really exists it will be found in most instances that the soldier has overloaded himself with useless and unauthorized articles. The orders already published on this subject must be enforced. The condition and behavior of a corps are sure indications of the efficacy and fitness of its officers. If any regiments shall be found to disregard that propriety of conduct which belongs to soldiers as well as citizens, they must not expect to occupy the post of honor, but may rest assured that they will be placed in positions where they cannot bring shame on their commands and the cause they are engaged in. The Government supplies with liberality all the wants of the soldier. The occasional depredations and hardships incident to rapid marches must be borne with patience and fortitude. Any officer who neglects to provide for his troops or separates himself to seek his own comfort will be held to a rigid accountability.

By order of General Buell:

JAMES B. FRY,

Assistant Adjutant-General, Chief of Staff.

The WITNESS. I can give only my own opinion. If the whole of Tennessee had been possessed by the Federal armies, and the people could have been assured that it would be held, I think the policy indicated in that order, as far as it was faithfully executed, would have had a good effect upon the people of the State in reclaiming their affections.

Question. And on the supposition which you have somewhat extended in your answer—that is, that they should be assured that the State would be held by the Federal armies—do you or do you not believe that the people of the State would by their own vote have returned to the Union and elected their officers under the Constitution of the United States?

Judging from what I saw and heard in the counties in Middle Tennessee and from what I know of East Tennessee I think it more than probable they would have elected their State officers and Congressmen. We had some large Union meetings in several counties of Middle Tennessee, and we regarded the prospects as very flattering for the return of the people to their allegiance.

Question. During this rebellion how has the disposition of the people in the counties you have referred to toward the cause of the Union compared with that of people of other portions of the State; have they been better disposed toward the Union or less so than the people of other portions of the State?

General TYLER. I object to the question. It is not definite. I can form no opinion of the force of the question, because I do not know what counties are included.

General BUELL. The question is not as to what is the disposition of the people of the particular counties. The object of the question is to draw a comparison between the disposition of the population which he has referred to—not the inhabitants of any particular district, but of the population he has referred to—with the disposition of the people of other portions of the State.

The PRESIDENT. I will suggest that if there is anything considered material by a member of the Commission it is his duty to draw out that information in his examination of the witness by himself.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Neither the Government nor General Buell can be controlled in the examination of witnesses, and all information sought should be obtained by asking questions after the Government and General Buell get through. It is the rule we have established ourselves, and is a very good one if adhered to.

The PRESIDENT. That is my opinion—to make no interruptions except it is to make an objection to the question; and scarcely think an objection to the form of the question would constitute a serious objection. General Buell has undoubtedly the right to shape and form his own questions on any particular subject; so has the judge-advocate on the part of the Government. I think it would be safer and better for us to adhere strictly to the rule we have established.

General BUELL. I will ask the witness to specify the counties in which he observed this disposition of the people which seemed to be favorable and to encourage the hope of their voluntary return to the Union.

The counties of Robertson, Sumner, Wilson, Davidson, Williamson, Maury, Giles, Rutherford, and Bedford, and perhaps Lawrence, Hickman, Wayne, and Hardin, though my information in regard to them is not so certain.

In reply to the question that was objected to—

I am not able to answer the other part of the question with any degree of satisfaction to myself or others.

Question. Do you know about the time when by my withdrawal to the west bank of the Tennessee River I was removed from the immediate supervision and control of the military policy in Middle Tennessee and North Alabama, and did you subsequent to that time observe any marked departure from the policy which I had announced by the troops under my command in that part of Tennessee and North Alabama?

General Buell left Nashville with his army some time in March or April, I think—at all events before the battle of Shiloh; left Middle Tennessee, and was not again in Middle Tennessee until some time in the summer or fall of last year. I think after he left, for a time, in some parts of the country around Nashville, the policy indicated in that general order was followed. I think it was particularly in Murray and Giles Counties, where there were post commanders. In each of these counties there was a large Union meeting, and we regarded the proceedings as flattering. I am not advised as to whether the policy was changed in Giles County. It was, I think, in Giles County. I am not, however, fully advised.

Question. Do you know, by common report or in any other way, of the complaints of the people that that policy was not very fully carried out in North Alabama?

I heard from citizens of Athens, Limestone County, Ala., that the policy was not carried out there. How it was elsewhere in North Alabama I cannot say.

Question. And from what you know was the departure from or neglect of that policy in this instance attended with good effects or bad with reference to the disposition of the people toward the Union?

With peaceable, quiet citizens I think a kind policy would have been best. My conversations with the citizens of Athens were had with Union men, or men who were disposed to return to the Union and to have North Alabama come back, as they assured me; and their statements to me were that the policy pursued there had a very injurious effect upon those people who were disposed to be friendly to the Government of the United States.

Question. From your knowledge of the people of the States that have been part in the rebellion, is it to be expected that they will return to their loyalty until the rebel armies are defeated and kept beyond their limits?

I do not think it is possible.

Question. As far as you know, what is the practice and policy of the rebel Government? I wish to distinguish between that and the practice of indiscreet officers and passionate citizens. What, I say, is the practice and policy of the rebel Government with reference to the inhabitants of those districts of country which are overrun alternately by the rebel armies and the Union armies?

I am not able to answer that question from positive knowledge; I only have information from others; that information leads me to believe in many instances, and particularly in East Tennessee, that their treatment has been very harsh. In other instances in Middle Tennessee my information has been that it has not been so. I make this latter statement from what I know of Murray County and Giles. There are many Union men in those counties remaining at home, I think, past the age of conscription. Since the Federal army left those counties, feeling an interest in those gentlemen, I have made frequent inquiries about them and their treatment. The information received was that they were at home unmolested, at least so far as their personal liberty was concerned. Whether any distinctions have been made in regard to seizing property of Union or secession men I am not advised. I know the fact that a great many young men have left some of the counties in Middle Tennessee (being, as I believe, Union men) to avoid the conscription. I know the fact that there are a great many refugees in Nashville and different parts of the State who left their homes to avoid punishment, as they feared, by the Confederate authorities. Whether they would have been punished I cannot say; doubtless some of them would have been had they remained at home.

Question. Is it understood that the harsh policy which the rebel Government has pursued toward the Union people of East Tennessee has impaired their affection and loyalty toward the Union; and is it supposed that this treatment, in the event of an occupation of that country by the Union armies, would prevent those people from giving expression to their loyalty and extending their support to the Government?

I do not think, from what I have heard from East Tennesseans, that their treatment by the rebel armies or authorities has impaired their affection for the Union. I rather think there would be almost a universal rejoicing if the armies of the United States would enter East Tennessee. I think their bitterness for the rebel authorities is very intense, and has been increased by the manner in which they have been treated by those authorities.

Question. It has been supposed that while the policy and practice of the rebel authorities toward those who forget their allegiance to the rebel Government are severe and our policy and practice toward those who forget their allegiance toward the General Government are mild the effect is to offer an inducement to disloyalty. Do you consider that that is really true; that the practical operation of these systems is to weaken the influence of the General Government over such people as long as they are under the control and protection of the Union armies?

I think treason to the United States ought to be punished. If committed in the face of the Army, the military ought to punish it; if not, the civil authorities ought to. I think a course of consistent kindness on the part of the United States Army in the territory whose people are in rebellion would have a good effect upon those people. From what I have seen of the East Tennesseans who have left Tennessee on account of their persecutions for their Union sentiments I am satisfied that the rebel cause has suffered by the treatment of these men. I think a milder course would have been better for it; and so I think of our own cause. Where it is necessary to be severe on account of offenses committed, then let severity come; but with peaceable, quiet citizens kindness, in my judgment, would be far preferable.

Question. Is it not true that the people of the States in rebellion against the Government have been compelled very generally to acquiesce in that rebellion, whatever might be their wishes and opinions?

On the first breaking out of the rebellion I think there was an apprehension on the minds of the people of Tennessee to some extent of physical force and injury, and in many instances there was a compulsion of public sentiment which the young men could not well resist, or at all events they did not. I presume that force is more recently used to swell their armies where force was necessary. I think on the 1st of April, 1861, that the people of Tennessee were for the Union. I know they were in February, 1861, from the vote they gave on the 9th of that month, in which the result was about 64,000 majority for the Union. I do not pretend to undertake to describe the state of things when this rebellion first broke out in Tennessee, but no man who was not there will ever comprehend it. Never.

Question. With, then, the existence of a latent or suppressed affection for the Union, has not the policy of severity the objection of punishing friends as well as enemies, the innocent as well as the guilty?

I think there is that latent feeling of regard and perhaps affection for the Union in the minds of a great many people of the South, and I think it can be cultivated much more effectually by kindness, where it can be extended, than by a contrary course. As to the effect of the policy referred to in the question, that can be judged of each man for himself.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. How long have you been a resident of East Tennessee?

I am a native of Tennessee.

Question. Were you in the State subsequent to its withdrawal from the Union?

Yes, sir.

Question. How long did you remain under the rebel Government?

Until the advent of the Federal Army in February or March, 1862.

Question. As a Union man residing in the State at that time did you experience none of the harsh treatment we have heard of?

No, sir; I was not treated harshly personally.

Question. Were you understood by the rebel authorities to be a Union man?

I suppose so, sir.

Question. What was the number of troops furnished by Tennessee to the rebel Army up to the time of our occupation of Nashville?

I do not know, sir; I know that there was provision made in the Legislature to raise 55,000, but how many were raised I do not know, for I had nothing to say to or do with the authorities on that subject.

Question. Were those troops raised by volunteering or by conscripting or drafting.

A large portion of the first troops raised was by volunteering. In the fall of 1861 there was an attempt at a draft, and, judging from what I heard from others, in attempting to enforce the draft most of the called volunteered to avoid it. More recently in Tennessee my information is that they are conscripting them wherever they can find them, but I know nothing on that subject.

Question. Do you not know that that rebel army from Tennessee represents nearly the whole population of Tennessee?

Yes, sir; that is, they are from all parts of the State and a large majority of the families are represented.

Question. Did not that vote from which you drew your inference that there was a Union feeling in Tennessee stop short of an unconditional Union sentiment; that is, did it include coercion?

I think it did not stop short; that is my impression, from the fact that the majority voted against having a convention to consider the subject at all, lest that convention might take the State out. I do not know that that vote indicated a condition of coercion; at all events, it was a vote against holding a convention, but not by so large a majority as the 64,000.

Question. Was it not about the same thing as it was in Virginia; that is, that the people were in favor of the Union, but not in favor of a Union that could be coerced?

I do not know how it would have been in the vote of February if that had been the leading question, nor do I know for certainty how it was in the State of Virginia; but I think there has always been a better state of feeling for the Union in Tennessee than in Virginia. I do not of course include Western Virginia.

Question. How is it possible to pursue a conciliatory policy, such as you speak of, toward a population who volunteered to the number of 50,000, say, in opposition to its Government, representing thereby the entire population of the State?

I would not pursue a conciliatory policy toward the 55,000 then in arms. I should subdue them if I could; but for the quiet people at home who have not volunteered or joined the army in any form, who are remaining peaceable and quiet in the face of the armies of the United States, I would extend to them kindness. That would be my judgment of the course to pursue toward all men and women under all circumstances where I wished to win their affections.

Question. Why do you make a distinction between the man who carries the arms and the man who furnishes the arms and the sustenance for him?

It is very rarely to be found in the history of any wars that I have read of that war has been made upon peaceable citizens, men and women, who have no arms in their hands, but the business is to fight the men that have arms; this, it seems to me, makes the distinction itself. In the presence of the armies of the United States in the rebel territory I see no chance for furnishing arms or anything else to the men in rebellion and in the field. I should certainly make a wide distinction between those two classes of persons. I would go even further, and say if I could I would induce these men to lay down their arms and come back to the Union. I would do it, but I see no hope for that course.

Question. Does this distinction that you speak of obtain in rebellion?

I think it ought to, when the object is to restore the greatest portion of the country to its loyalty. I know of no instance to the contrary where a distinction has not existed; at least I remember none such now.

Question. In what way do you think the Government of the United States lost the affection of this people now in rebellion?

I think, sir, it has been produced very largely by the discussion of partisan politicians and partisan newspapers in both sections of the country, in which falsehoods and misrepresentations have been stated as truth.

Question. Do you not know, Mr. Huston, that the deadly animosity of that entire population is almost without a parallel in the history of wars?

With a large majority of the people of the South there is that hostility; but I think if the armies of the United States were to be successful it could be overcome by judicious treatment.

Question. You rely, then, upon the strong arm of the Government really and not upon the conciliatory policy which has been spoken of?

I should rely mainly upon that; without that there is nothing to be done. Conciliation I should adopt with a view of overcoming the prejudices and winning the affections of the people after the other work is done and while it is being done.

Question. Until, then, our armies are successful, permanently so, is not all the effort of a conciliatory character taken as an evidence of weakness by the people of the South and laughed at accordingly?

General BUELL. I object to the question, inasmuch as it applies to the present time, when the disposition of the people toward the General Government may have changed and their opinion of its power changed from what it was when I inaugurated my policy. It may answer the judge-advocate's purpose to shape it a little differently and obviate the objection.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I see no objection to the question as it stands. I do not propose to argue it.

General SCHOEPF. The witness stated that the people were very different until July last year, 1862, and that they have changed since then. There is a difference in the time and policy of the whole affair.

The court is cleared, and after discussion it is decided that the question should be put.

The WITNESS. I have spoken of a conciliatory policy toward peaceable and quiet citizens who remained at home. I do not myself regard that course as an evidence of weakness, nor have I any knowledge or information that the rebels so regard it. My information, though somewhat limited, is that they are delighted to hear of instances of hardship from people at home, because, as I suppose, they look upon it as a means of exasperating the public opinion of the country. From what I see and hear they are glad to be able to cite these things as a verification of what they pretended to predict at the onset of this contest.

Question. Did not the rebel States put forth their entire strength; and have they, in fact, needed any such incentive as that to embitter their feelings?

I think they needed that element of strength to some extent, for the reason that there were a good many people of Union feelings and a good number indifferent—at all events having a latent feeling for the Government of the United States; and I think they saw if they forced them into the army they would not make as good soldiers as if they were first exasperated and then induced to volunteer or come in by the conscription laws. I do not think a conscripted soldier makes as good a soldier as one who goes in willingly. I may be mistaken in that, but I do not think I am.

Question. As the conciliatory policy you speak of that was inaugurated by the commander of the Army of the Ohio depends upon the application of the order referred to, please tell us from your experience who were designated as peaceable citizens, who were to be protected, not to be molested, in their persons and property.

I do not know of any specific designation outside of this order and others that I may have seen. I put a construction on it myself, and supposed it meant persons who staid at home and attended to their business and did or said nothing against the Government in any shape or form.

Question. I ask you from your experience, and not from your construction of that order, whether citizens openly avowing disunion sentiments, having sons in the rebel army and having until our army arrived there, furnished those sons with subsistence, and willingly supported the rebel Government, were included in that order as persons not to be molested in their persons and property?

I have no particular experience as to that matter; I remember no particular case now. But I would regard a man talking secession openly as not a peaceable citizen; and I do not include such when I speak of a conciliatory policy.

Question. If your recollection furnishes no instance in illustration of this sentence in the order, who were considered peaceable citizens and who were not, your observation has been somewhat limited, has it not?

I have been in Nashville most of the time since the Federal army arrived there. I do not know of any arrests under this order. I do not know whether there was anything to be observed or not; at all events I observed but little.

Question. Are you acquainted with or do you know of Judge G. W. Lane? If so, what weight would his opinion have as to the proper policy to be pursued in North Alabama?

I am acquainted with him, sir. He is a man of good sense, and I presume has an acquaintance with the people of North Alabama. I would rely upon his judgment about as I would upon any one man's. I should not regard it as unerring.

Question. Has not the treatment of Union men in East Tennessee by the rebel Government very effectually prevented any demonstration there in behalf of the Union?

The treatment and the presence of rebel armies there prevent any demonstration of Union sentiment among the people.

Question. Are you acquainted with or do you know of Parson Brownlow, of East Tennessee; and, if so, what weight would you give his opinion as to the proper policy to be pursued toward the rebels?

I am acquainted with him, sir. I should not give so much weight to his opinion as I should to that of many cooler men. I think he is too violent, and his judgment warped by his feelings honestly. He has been harshly dealt with, and feels it a great deal.

Question. I will ask you the same question with reference to Governor Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee.

I know of Governor Johnson. I would have a great deal more confidence in his judgment than in Mr. Brownlow's in regard to this whole matter.

Question. Would not his opinion very justly have great weight in settling a question of that sort?

It ought to have the same weight as that of any other sensible man of experience should have; but I do not know what it would have.

Question. Is he not regarded as a man of more than ordinary intellect, and has not his experience on this very subject been very extended?

Yes, sir; he has more intellect than common, a great deal. He has had a great deal of experience in this matter.

By General SCHOEPF:

Question. You stated that you were at Nashville after the army commanded by General Buell occupied that place; where were you before that time?

I was at Nashville, sir.

Question. Did you practice law at Nashville previous to that time?

I practiced law in the State courts as long as there were any—in one of them, at least, the chancery court, as long as it was held. The Federal court was abolished and the Confederate took its place; I never was in that court, sir.

By General TYLER:

Question. Suppose both the Union and the rebel armies were out of Tennessee to-day and the people left to decide whether they would continue in the Union or join the Confederate Government, which do you think would be the decision of the population?

Under the present state of feeling I should say they would join the Confederate Government.

Question. What do you understand by latent and suppressed affection for the Union under this state of circumstances?

I mean a feeling that once existed in all its force and that has been to a great extent overcome. You may combine with this state of mind the fear of making a demonstration of it in a given case, lest the powers adverse to Government should become supreme. I mean, in other words, that feeling in the minds of a great many of the people of the South which, if cultivated and all fears resulting from its development and demonstration removed, will make good citizens of the United States.

Question. How is it that this latent feeling you speak of has been overcome?

It was not a latent feeling at the start. It is kept latent by all the appliances used.

by the rebel authorities, and which are known to the whole country. I do not think it is overcome; I think it now exists.

Question. Are you in favor of the execution of all the laws passed by Congress and of all the orders issued by the President of the United States and by his subordinate military officers, so far as they have come to your knowledge, for the suppression of the rebellion commenced at Fort Sumter and since carried on by the rebel Government at Richmond, of which Jefferson Davis is President?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President, for the same reasons I gave when the same question was put to a previous witness.

The court was cleared; when it was decided that the question should be put.

The WITNESS. I am in favor of all the constitutional laws passed by Congress and I am in favor of the suppression of the rebellion by all means known to civilized warfare.

Question. Do you believe that all laws passed by Congress should be deemed to be constitutional until they are decided by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional.

I think the presumption is that all laws passed by the legislative department are prima facie with authority until they are decided otherwise by the supreme judicature of the land.

Commission adjourned to meet February 26.

CINCINNATI, February 26, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Capt. JESSE MERRILL (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States.

Jesse Merrill; captain in the Seventh Pennsylvania Infantry, on detached duty as an acting officer in charge of the signal corps.

Question. Were you on duty with the headquarters of the Army of the Ohio last summer? If so, please state in what capacity.

I was with the headquarters of the Army of the Ohio; I joined them at Corinth, and was with them as an officer in charge of the signal corps.

Question. Did you while at Huntsville prepare a code of signals to direct the movements of the army under certain contingencies?

I did.

Question. If you have a copy of that code please present it to the Commission.

(Code of signals presented by Captain Merrill, marked A.)

Question. I will submit this paper (the code of signals) as evidence, and as showing the preparation that was made to direct the movements of the army under my command, under certain contingencies, through the assistance of the signal corps.

The communication and the direction that was given was by means of rockets. There were officers under my command with four of the five divisions of the army at that time, and the fifth division was to have been supplied with officers if this code was carried into effect and it was found necessary to use them. The reason that the two colors are represented here is that they are used to indicate different things when differently combined. As a signal a white rocket was used to call attention, but when combined with anything else meant "artillery;" in the same way a red rocket was used to acknowledge the receipt of a message, but when used in a combination it meant "infantry;" and the red and white combined meant "repeat the message," but when used in combination it meant "cavalry."

Question. Do you understand that the movements which are prescribed upon certain roads had particular reference to the information which was expressed in the preceding message, giving information in regard to movements of the enemy, or is the particular arrangement you have there accidental; is there any particular design in it?

The design was to direct the movements of the army, and was made for that special purpose. The code is so arranged that any brigade or division of the army could have been ordered to move on any particular points named in any of the messages which the different combinations represented, always provided that the communication by this system of signals could have been made; that is, that a rocket could be seen from the point where the order was given and the point where it was intended it should go.

Question. Take an example here. Here is a message: "The enemy is crossing in force at Chattanooga;" then follows a signal message to the troops: "Move on Therman road," "Move on Cane road," &c. What I want to know is whether this arrangement of messages with reference to each other was a matter of accident in preparing the code, or whether it indicated that because the enemy was crossing at Chattanooga then the movements expressed in the message following were to be made. Was there any necessary connection between the two? In other words, for example, might not a message to the troops which followed some other message containing information in regard to the movements of the enemy have been just as appropriate on the occasion referred to in the first message giving information of the movements as any other message?

There is no necessary connection between these messages. For instance, if the intelligence came to General Buell, commanding that army, that the enemy was crossing in force at Chattanooga, he could, by having any of these combinations used, order his force or any part of his force to move on any of these points named. The messages themselves are entirely distinct and separate from each other, and the first might as well be last or in any other part of the code; so that the arrangement of the messages in the order in which they are expressed in the code is purely accidental.

Question. Were the different parts of your corps provided with the necessary means of using this code?

They were.

Question. Was it found necessary to use it in the subsequent operations of the army?

It was not.

Question. Explain, if you please, the alterations which were made in that paper subsequently and the object of them.

The alterations were made to direct the movements of the army after arriving at Louisville in September (2d, I think it was). The combinations were altered as well as the messages, inasmuch as I have been supplied with rockets of a different color and not requiring to use so large a number.

(The code and copy of the order presented as evidence, marked B.)

Question. Was your corps in operation at Perryville on the 8th of October last? If so, please state what stations you established, what time they were established and in operation, and what officers were in charge of them respectively.

Communication was established on the hill near General Buell's headquarters to a point immediately in front of and in the direction of Perryville and near the pike on which this hill was. This was about 12 o'clock. There was one intermediate station between these two points, making three stations in all. The station at General Buell's headquarters was worked by Lieutenants Meeker, Taylor, and Thayer, I think. I know Meeker and Taylor were there during the afternoon. The intermediate station spoken of was worked by Lieutenants Hollopeter and Bachtell, and the one in front by Lieutenants Fitch and Sheridan. At one time during the day this station in front communicated with a station near General Rousseau's headquarters, at which Lieutenants Landrum, Quinton, and Connelly were operating, but the communication with that station was but for a very short time.

Question. At what hour of the day was that communication interrupted?

I cannot speak certainly as to the hour, but think it was between 2 and 3 o'clock, or a little after 2.

Question. Did you establish communication between headquarters and the right corps of the army also?

I did some time during the night of the 8th.

Question. Were you on the ground and in the immediate supervision of these various stations?

I was. I was in the front along the line until nearly dark, trying to establish communication with the left wing—from the left wing to this station in the center.

Question. Was any communication, official or otherwise, transmitted to headquarters that a battle was being fought on any part of the line?

I have no knowledge of any communication of that kind having been transmitted over the line, nor has it been reported to me, as it should have been if such communication had been sent. I speak entirely with reference to the line leading from General Buell's headquarters to the front; not the communication with the right wing. A number of messages passed over that line, but none of them in reference to the fight that was going on, because communication with the right wing was not established till the night of the 8th.

Question. Have you heard any talk of intelligence of that kind being at any of the stations? If so, please state at what stations, what officers were in charge of them, and all you know about it.

I have heard within the last two months, and not before that time, Lieutenant Fitch assert that while he was on the station in front he received a message from the officers on the station at General Rousseau's headquarters to the effect that the enemy were attacking them with infantry and artillery, and I think that he asserts that he sent it to the next station, but not in any official way, as it was merely a message from one officer of the corps to another, giving this information, not coming from any official source nor directed to any official person.

Question. Do you understand that he transmitted it as information that was important or was it merely an exchange of intelligence among themselves; how did he represent it?

I understood it as merely an exchange of ideas, giving what he received from the officer of General Rousseau's division and telling them what was going on, and that he sent it to the next station for the information of those officers. The line being open for communication, he would not need to give the information himself to General Buell when others who knew better the state of affairs had the same opportunity of communicating with General Buell that he had.

Question. Lieutenants Fitch and Sheridan were at the third station, I understand.

They were at the third station, counting the station at your headquarters as No. 1.

Question. Does Lieutenant Sheridan know anything about this message?

He says he does not.

Question. Were you near that station yourself, and about how far from it, when this message should have been received?

I was near that station until half past 3 or 4 o'clock. I think the message was received at the time or just before the communication was broken off with General Rousseau. I was within 200 rods of the station.

Question. Who were the officers to whom it should have been transmitted next by Lieutenant Fitch?

Lieutenants Bachtell and Hollopeter.

Question. Have you had conversation with those officers on the subject?

I have not. I never thought it of sufficient importance until I saw the assertion in what purported to be a letter written by Col. Dan. McCook to his brother, in which he repeated this message; and since that time it has never occurred to me to inquire in reference to it when I have seen them.

Question. Had you conversation with the officers who were at the first station, the headquarters station?

I have conversed with Lieutenant Meeker, who was the principal officer at that station, and he has no recollection of any such message having come to him.

Question. Is it a rule in that corps to keep a copy of messages that have been transmitted to different stations and is such a copy kept at each station?

It is a rule to keep copies of all official communications. Now we have books prepared for that special purpose; they have been introduced since the time of which we are now speaking.

Question. How far were you from this station at General Rousseau's headquarters during the time when the severe fighting was going on, as it is now understood?

I cannot speak positively as to the distance, though it was not a mile.

Question. Were you in sight of the ground upon which the battle was fought, and with what general officers were you?

I was at the third station, immediately in front of the headquarters, on the road leading to Perryville, with the troops of General Sheridan, until half past 4 or 5 o'clock, when I went over to the left to make another effort to establish communication with General McCook, and was on that side of the battle ground until nearly or quite dark, when I went back to General Buell's headquarters.

Question. Designate these stations by numbers, commencing with No. 1, at the headquarters, and name the officers who were at them respectively.

Station No. 1, at General Buell's headquarters, Lieutenants Meeker, Taylor, and Thayer; No. 2, in a corn field half way between No. 1 and No. 3, Lieutenants Hollopeter and Bachtell; Station No. 3, near the Perryville road and General Sheridan's command, Lieutenants Sheridan and Fitch; No. 4, to the left, near General Rousseau's and General McCook's headquarters (only until between 2 and 3 o'clock, when they were compelled to abandon that station), Lieutenants Landrum, Quinton, and Connelly.

Question. What impression was made upon your mind by what you saw and heard in regard to the severity of the engagement that day?

It was the first fight I had ever seen and the first fire under which I ever was, and necessarily I felt rather singular. At the time, and before I saw the battle of Stone River, I supposed it was rather a severe action; since then, comparing it with that, I have changed my mind as regards its being a very severe engagement, and do not think it was a very severe engagement from what I saw, though I was not in the same situation by any means and was not so close in the battle of Perryville as I was in the other case.

Question. Was it your expectation, from what you saw and heard, that the battle would be renewed the next morning?

It was, sir. It was a very general impression with all with whom I conversed.

Question. Did you expect to find the enemy on the same ground or to have to go in pursuit of them?

I expected to find them where they were the day before and had arranged our communications with that expectation.

Question. Was it considered by anybody that you saw and conversed with, or whose opinion you heard expressed, that the battle of that day had been of such severity and importance as to decide the contest which had been expected between the armies all the time?

Not that I know of. All the officers with whom I conversed—they were mostly, though, officers of my own corps, with two or three exceptions—thought the contest undecided.

Question. Was it supposed the enemy had suffered by comparison very severely in the engagement—more so or as much so as ourselves?

I have no recollection so far as regards that. I myself supposed that they had, but I do not remember that I had any conversation with any one on that subject.

Question. Did you know that General McCook's corps had been driven from its position and that it did not regain that position during the day?

Some time during the afternoon—I am unable to say at what hour—I saw General Rousseau's line of battle retire and saw Loomis' battery (at least it was represented as Loomis' and I have no doubt it was) taken from the front, where it was stationed, and run back through a corn field, and soon after a rebel cavalry regiment went past the line which had been occupied by General Rousseau, and this rebel cavalry regiment was opened upon and I think driven back—at least they retired by the battery on the hill, near General Sheridan's batteries, where our station was. That was the first intimation I had of our lines having been withdrawn from the position where they originally stood. I have no knowledge of what was going on farther to the left until later in the evening.

Question. Was the question considered by General Sheridan, in your hearing and your knowledge, whether it was considered to send intelligence to headquarters of what was going on in front at any time during the day? State anything you know on the subject.

Lieutenant Sheridan, one of the officers working that station, informed me officially, perhaps the same day, that General Sheridan had prepared a message to send, but of the contents of that message my memory does not serve me, but I think it had reference to the contest; but just as Lieutenant Sheridan was about to send it General Sheridan recalled it and told him it was not necessary to send it.

Question. Was this information from General Sheridan to you in the nature of an official report or conversation between you; was it information which it would have been proper to give to you as his superior officer?

It was not, sir. It was simply a conversation of our doings and workings during the day.

Question. Do you know at what time this message was supposed to have been prepared?

I do not, sir.

Question. Did you on the night of the 8th transmit orders to the right corps with reference to attacking the enemy next morning?

I did.

Question. Have you a copy of those orders, captain? Please present it if you have.

Here is the copy of the order given me by General Thomas:

“(Official.)

“GENERAL BUELL’S HEADQUARTERS.

“To General CRITTENDEN:

“Have your advance division ready to attack at daylight. Issue orders at once.
“THOMAS.”

Question. At what time of the night was it given?

The order is not dated. It was given about half past 1 o’clock on the morning of the 9th of October.

Question. You have some messages which I understand were transmitted through your corps on the morning of the 9th. I will thank you to read them in the order in which they occurred.

The first message, I think, but I may be mistaken in reference to the order in which they were received, is:

“(Official.)

“To General BUELL:

“I am all ready. My post will be to the rear of the center of my line.

“CRITTENDEN.”

The message just read was received, I think, soon after daylight on the morning of the 9th. There are two messages which I think were sent without any answer. As to the order in which they were sent I do not know positively, but I think they were sent in this order:

“OCTOBER 9—8 a. m.

“General CRITTENDEN:

“Have you commenced the advance? What delays your attack?

“JAMES B. FRY,
“Colonel.”

The second message to General Crittenden is:

“Are you advancing, and what news? Answer.

“JAMES B. FRY,
“Colonel.”

Here are two other messages giving information.

Question. Have you any answer to that?

I have no positive answer.

“To Colonel FRY:

“Colonel Murray, who is off to the right of the command, reports that this morning a regiment of cavalry and one of infantry had crossed the Danville road beyond Mitchell’s, going south. I have ordered Colonel McCook to reconnoiter the woods and ascertain his whereabouts.”

That message was from General Thomas or General Crittenden, I am unable to say which. There is no signature. It was received some time in the morning before 12 o’clock.

There are two other official communications, but I am unable to say whether these communications, giving information in reference to the movements of the enemy, were received before or after this order; but I think after. The order is dated—

“OCTOBER 9—12 o’clock.

“General CRITTENDEN or General THOMAS:

“In case the enemy has retired, as reported, put two of your divisions in position near Crawford Spring, on the Harrodsburg road, and a third near Walker’s Spring, south of the town. Take the strongest positions you can find, and be ready at a moment’s notice to march or fight.

“JAMES B. FRY.”

The next is a communication official to General Buell:

"I have just conversed with a citizen of Parksville. He says there is no enemy at Danville nor on the Lebanon and Danville pike. He thinks they have turned toward Harrodsburg. I have sent McCook with his cavalry to observe and report. Crittenden's corps is advancing upon Walker's Spring. Have met no resistance for an hour."

This message was from General Thomas. I am unable to say whether it was before or after the order, which is dated 12 o'clock. All these messages were transmitted on the 9th of October.

There is another message to Colonel Fry:

"General Smith advancing. His skirmishers within three-quarters of a mile of Walker's Spring, on the Perryville pike. So far they have met no resistance."

I do not know the hour at which this was received.

Question. Do you know where Parksville is?

No, sir; I do not.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. Would the transmission of such a message spoken of by Lieutenant Fitch be in accordance with the custom or rule governing your signal corps?

General BUELL. I have not the privilege of cross-examining the witness, and would suggest that the question is not as distinct as the judge-advocate himself would desire to make it. It might be in accordance with certain rules, but not in accordance with those rules which would make it an official message.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. (In continuation of his question.) In other words, is it the habit or would it be within the rule for any post of your signal corps to send information of an important character without its being sanctioned by an officer outside of the corps?

It would certainly; if he chose to take the responsibility of sending that message to General Buell it would be within the line of his duty. But it is usual, when there is a general officer with whom an officer is stationed, for any information of that kind to come from that general officer. There are times when our corps is sent out as reconnoitering or observing officers, and then they report on their own responsibility; but if they are with any general officer the communication comes usually from him.

Question. Would such a communication as that claimed to have been sent by Lieutenant Fitch have been recorded as the others were?

If he had sent it as an official communication from himself to General Buell, giving information, it would have been recorded and reported or should have been; but conversations between officers while on their stations are not reported, even though they contain information given from one to the other.

Question. Would it not have been the duty of officers at Station No. 1 to have communicated that intelligence to headquarters, whether it came officially or not?

I am hardly prepared to say whether it would or not, but I have no doubt they would have done so; knowing that the communication might have come from a general officer, they would perhaps not have done so. I do not think it would have been imperative for them to have done so at all.

Question. Do you know of any messages received or sent along the line that day from headquarters respecting the firing in front?

I do not, sir.

Question. Do you know of any information or any inquiries such as you considered of a conversational character passing from No. 1 to the front that day?

I do not.

Question. If there had been any such would you have known it?

Not necessarily. The conversations, if any, from the station at headquarters would have been carried on with the Station No. 2, while I was most of the afternoon at Station No. 3.

Question. Do you know that those stations were busily at work passing signals all that afternoon?

No, sir; I do not.

Question. Did Lieutenant Fitch accompany you to the court-room at Nashville at the time I sent for you or was it Lieutenant Sheridan?

Neither of them accompanied me as a witness. Lieutenant Sheridan was afterward subpoenaed as a witness, and went there, but the court had adjourned to Louisville.

Question. Do you know that Lieutenant Fitch was ordered to appear and did come to Nashville at that time?

I have no knowledge of it, sir.

Question. At what time did you leave Station No. 3 that afternoon to go to McCook's left and establish communications?

I think it was about half past 4 o'clock. I cannot speak positively, but I think it was about that hour.

Question. In fixing the date and attaching the signature to some of these dispatches you have introduced you rely exclusively upon your memory, do you not?

With reference to these that are not dated I do.

By General TYLER:

Question. From what source or sources did you get the impression that the battle would be renewed next morning? Please explain.

I cannot give the source of the impression. I suppose I got it from the fact that I thought the battle was as yet undecided, and that I knew of the order for this attack to General Crittenden, and that there were troops in reserve that had not been engaged.

Question. Was General Crittenden ordered to attack the enemy or to be ready to attack the enemy?

The order reads to be ready to attack the enemy.

Question. Do you know of any order having been given to General Crittenden to attack the enemy?

I do not.

Question. What reason had you for expecting to find the enemy "the next morning" where they were the night before, as stated in your testimony?

It was a result arrived at in my own mind by some course of reasoning which I cannot now explain.

Question. You did not find them there the next morning.

I did not. I was not out; I was at headquarters of the Army of the Ohio.

Question. What would be the effect if all the signal officers arrogated to themselves the right to judge of military movements and go and report them on their own authority to headquarters?

The effect would be merely an expression of their own opinion, to be judged of by the general commanding according to their merits.

Question. Under whose control was the signal corps in General Buell's army?

I was the general signal officer in General Buell's army.

Question. And to whom did you report direct?

I report to and am under the order of Maj. Albert J. Myer, Signal Officer of the Army.

Question. Are you under the immediate command of the commanding officer of the army under whom you are acting?

I am.

Question. Do you make daily reports to the commander-in-chief of the operations of your corps?

I make now a semi-weekly report. To General Buell I made a daily morning report of the efficiency and strength of the corps, and the operations of the corps are reported to the commanding officer of the army when they do any work.

Question. Was there any order communicated by the signal corps on the 8th or 9th of October not cited in your testimony as yet?

There is one, I think, from General Gilbert on the 9th.

Question. What is that order?

(Official.)

To General BUELL:

Mitchell is close to the town and Sheridan closing up his right with Mitchell. His left retired, waiting for McCook to close up. McCook closing to his right slowly. When connection is complete and ready to advance Sheridan will move his left forward even with his right.

GILBERT.

Question. Then I understand you to say, captain, that we have on record the result of all the operations of the signal corps on the 8th and 9th of October?

You have, so far as I know them.

Question. You would from your official position know all, would you not?

All official business that went over the line I would.

Col. JOHN KENNETT (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and place of residence, if you please; whether you have been in the service of the United States, and in what capacity, and when you left the service.

My name is John Kennett; colonel Fourth Ohio Cavalry. On the 5th of September, 1862, I was detached in command of the First Cavalry Division. On the 25th of February, 1863, I resigned.

Question. Were you on duty in North Alabama from the time of the occupation of that country by our troops and did you continue so until they were withdrawn?

Yes, sir.

Question. State what the condition of your regiment was about the 1st of July last in regard to its horses and other necessities affecting its efficiency.

Our regiment had been ordered about so much in North Alabama and Tennessee that the horses were all worn-out; that, however, was under General Mitchell, before General Buell came on from Shiloh. About that time, when we were waiting to get other horses, our clothing was defective, and so with respect to other quartermaster's stores.

Question. State, if you please, what was done to refit you again and with what result.

I sent 125 men, by orders from General Buell, to Pittsburg Landing after some horses, which were brought through to Huntsville; 155 horses, I think, was the number. Also, subsequent to that, I sent 200 to Nashville, by General Buell's orders, for horses there; upon their return most of the horses were unfit for service.

Question. State how your regiment was distributed during the summer and whether it was actively employed subsequent to the 1st of July.

Yes, sir. All the time "on the go" scouting. Part of the regiment was at Battle Creek, extending from Bridgeport and Stevenson to Battle Creek and through that section of the country. Four companies were there on active duty.

Question. How did you supply your regiment with forage?

We had to feed them on green corn.

Question. Was old forage to be found in any abundance?

No, sir; it was very scarce at that time.

Question. Do you know whether or not the army availed itself of the supplies of the country to as full an extent as it admitted?

I think they did, sir. We visited every farm-house in every direction to get forage, bacon, &c.

Question. Were you with the army in its movement in Kentucky in September? If so, please state what you know in regard to the movement of the train from Bowling Green to Louisville, the route it took, &c.

I was, sir. Colonel Zahm was detached in command of the Second Brigade, to take command of the train that went by way of Brownsville, Priceville, Millerstown, from there to Hayesville, Deep Spring, and from there to West Point. I did not go on that road; my duty was on the other road, to protect any approach to the train. I took the road to their right, with the First Brigade, to protect them on every cross-road from the rebel cavalry cutting it off, and went on to Elizabethtown. There I occupied the place, threatening every cross-road all the time during Colonel Zahm's march to West Point, and receiving daily reports three times a day as to the precise distance he had gone and whether he required any further assistance from the First Brigade. I did send him the Seventh Pennsylvania when there were reports of some rebel cavalry appearing on its flanks. Every road was also covered with scouting parties during the whole time the train was in transitu. In addition to that we captured a whole regiment of cavalry, the Third Georgia. In the performance of that duty we felt the daily pickets on our right, with scouting parties toward Hodgenville, Boston, New Haven, and Bardstown.

Question. You do not pretend to describe the road accurately, then?

No, sir. I do not know that I could describe it accurately without having my own map here; I did not charge my memory with the names of the little towns I passed through.

Question. Were you in command of the cavalry division at that time?

Yes, sir.

Question. What time did your division leave Bowling Green and on what roads; in other words, what disposition was made of your division on the march from Bowling Green?

I do not remember the date exactly. The First Brigade went right on to the bridge over Green River to the right of Munfordville, and we went to Bacon Creek, on the Louisville and Nashville road, thence to Elizabethtown. The Second Brigade, as I just described, was in charge of the train toward West Point.

Question. Were you in advance with any portion of your command during the retreat of the rebel army out of Kentucky? If so, please state in what condition you found the country in regard to supplies of forage for your animals and what road you were on.

We were in the advance from Harrodsburg, Danville, Stanford, and Crab Orchard, up to Mount Vernon. Up to Stanford we found forage; from Stanford to Mount Vernon we could not find any, and were ordered back from Mount Vernon to feed the horses at Crab Orchard.

Commission adjourned to meet February 27, 1863.

CINCINNATI, February 27, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

General THOMAS L. CRITTENDEN (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and position in the service of the United States, if you please, general.

My name is Thomas L. Crittenden; age, forty-four years; major-general of volunteers.

Question. Were you on duty with the Army of the Ohio at Corinth; did you march with that Army into North Alabama and Middle Tennessee after the evacuation of Corinth by the rebel army, and what was your command at that time?

I was on duty with the Army of the Ohio at Corinth, and I did march with the Army of the Ohio from Corinth through North Alabama and through Middle Tennessee. I commanded the Fifth Division in the Army of the Ohio at that time.

Question. About what was the effective strength of your division at that time?

About 3,000, sir.

Question. Were you with your division when the movement toward North Alabama commenced in the month of June last?

I was near Baldwin at the time the movement of the Tennessee commenced and through Middle Tennessee. I remember it because General Pope had called for some re-enforcements; he was near Baldwin, and supposed the enemy in considerable force in front of him. General Buell sent up two divisions and went up himself with them. There we remained not more than two days, I think, possibly three; after which we commenced to march.

Question. Please state the route by which you marched from the vicinity of Booneville until you arrived at Athens and the more remarkable features of that route, as well as you can remember them, giving the dates as well as you can, the time of departure, and the arrival.

I marched from Booneville to Iuka. The only thing that dwells in my memory now is, that on the first day's march I encountered very considerable difficulties in crossing a bottom that was intersected by some streams and various little bridges that were destroyed. I managed, however, to get across, as I considered it important. I had but three days' rations, and was ordered to make the march within the time—three days. Supplies were sent to me at Iuka. As to the date on which we started I cannot be positive; I think it was about the middle of the month; from the 12th to the 15th I guess. I marched from Iuka to Tusculumbia. I remember nothing very particular on the march. The weather was intensely hot and the roads dusty. I marched at 3 o'clock in the morning and got into camp by 8 or 9. I was encumbered on that march somewhat with my reserve artillery—some six or eight batteries I had to carry along. I took them only from Iuka to Athens. At Tusculumbia we crossed the river; General McCook's division and my own ferried across the river there; and from Florence I marched to Athens, carrying along this reserve artillery. The roads were very dusty and the weather very hot. I remember no particular obstacle on the road. The river we had to ford. It is a considerable stream, and the ford was rather deep at the time, but we got across without any difficulty. I do not remember precisely when I arrived at Athens, but I marched from that place on the 5th of July to Huntsville. At Huntsville I was delayed a little while, perhaps a day, waiting for supplies. Supplies were scarce, and General Nelson, I understood, had taken all to Athens, so that none came on to Huntsville for me, and I had to start without sufficient quantity of supplies to take me to Stevenson. The general, however, determined to send my supplies to a point on the railroad between Huntsville and Stevenson, near which I passed on my march. I got to Stevenson on the 12th of July, and on the 13th I received an order from General Buell to go to Battle Creek and take command there. I reached Battle Creek on the 13th, and relieved General Hascall, who was there in command.

Question. In the march from Iuka to Athens what division did you follow and how far were you behind?

I followed General McCook's division; it was commanded by General Johnson. When I reached Stevenson I found General Johnson commanded the division. I think General McCook left his division at Athens, but I am not sure. The division left Huntsville on the day before I got there; they marched very shortly before I did from Athens; I do not remember the day; I marched on the 5th. General Johnson left, I think, the day before I got to Huntsville, for Stevenson, where I overtook him.

Question. What do you know about the condition of supplies at the time of your arrival at Athens and about the cause of the scarcity, if there was any?

I know that there was a scarcity of supplies, and I understood that there was a break in the railroad, which made it necessary to haul supplies a considerable distance. Of the exact distance I am not sure, but I heard it was about 22 miles. Our wagons had had to bring supplies along the road. Afterwards, on the very day I got to Stevenson, we received the news of the taking of Murfreesborough, and the interruption there made the supplies very scarce for a long time. We lived on half rations for, I should think, a month from the time I reached Battle Creek.

Question. Are you positive about the distance that supplies had to be hauled over that break in the railroad?

I am not, sir.

Question. Was your division train turned into the general train for the purpose of hauling supplies over this break?

I understood that it was. All our wagons were so used, I understood.

Question. Was exertion made to supply your command with forage while you were in the vicinity of Athens and did you find the supply in the country abundant or scarce?

I found the supply of forage quite scarce. I cannot say what exertions were made to supply the command with forage. I had expected some forage, had been notified that I might look for some, but none was ever supplied me. I supplied myself with a good deal of difficulty, taking the forage where I found it. I made every possible exertion. General Nelson was in command there, and I remember having some little quarrel because I thought his animals were living a little better than mine were. I thought he obtained it from the supply train; and I remember his telling me that I would have to work for myself—there was no other way of getting it; and I made every possible exertion to obtain forage. I moved my camp once during the few days I remained at Athens in order to get forage or to get nearer to it.

Question. Do you know about how long you remained in the vicinity of Athens and what was the cause of your halting there temporarily?

I was halted there because of the scarcity of supplies, I understood; but I do not remember when I arrived at Athens nor how long I remained there. I understood there was nothing for me at Huntsville, and we were living from hand to mouth at Stevenson, which I understood to be the cause of my detention there.

Question. How does the country about Athens and Huntsville compare with that about Stevenson and Battle Creek in supplies of forage?

I should say that the country about Athens and about Huntsville was a better one for supplies than either that around Stevenson or Battle Creek. We could not supply ourselves at Battle Creek, and supplies of forage were sent to us. I hauled forage from Bridgeport and from Stevenson to Battle Creek. We consumed everything around Battle Creek. We sent our wagons some distance up the railroad to haul forage for some distance in the country when it was hauled to the road and brought down by railroad to the camp.

Question. How did you find the country between Huntsville and Battle Creek in regard to supplies both of forage and provisions?

Scarcely anything; very poor.

Question. Do you remember anything about the orders that were given when the army was leaving Corinth for reducing the amount of baggage as much as possible and can you state about the substance of these orders?

My recollection is that when I left Corinth I did not know that we were going farther than Baldwyn. I do not think that I took all of my wagons; they were sent back. If my memory serves me, I was at Booneville when I received the order; I cannot remember the substance of it, except that it was to reduce the baggage as much as possible; but how many wagons were allowed and what the order was I do not now remember.

Question. Do you remember that orders were given reducing the allowance of tents and requiring the soldiers to turn over their overcoats and other surplus clothing? Do you know whether that order was executed; what disposition was made of this surplus?

I remember the order in reference to the overcoats and the order about the allowance of tents. My recollection is that the overcoats and tents were to be turned over at Iuka, but I cannot be positive.

Question. About what force was there at Battle Creek at the time of your arrival there till you left and how was that force composed—of what divisions or parts of divisions?

The force was composed of my own division, which numbered about 3,000 men, and a brigade under General Hascall which I found there. I do not certainly know what was the strength of that brigade; they had a battery; I think they had 1,500 men. Most of that brigade was ordered away when General McCook came up. General McCook's force, on its arrival, I understood to be about 6,000 men. Our entire force there was about 9,000 men, and this force continued there till we left.

Question. Had you instructions to inform yourself by all possible means of the strength and movements of the enemy while you were in command there and did you exert yourself in that way?

I was ordered to use every possible exertion to obtain information and to spare no expense in order to obtain it. I employed at once on my arrival there several men who were vouched for as trustworthy at considerable expense, and kept them going all the time. It was exceedingly difficult to get any reliable information there. The rebels occupied the bank of the river immediately opposite our camp; they were in sight every day and the men were very much afraid to go. We, however, got a man to go within a few miles of Chattanooga, who brought a message from a man who lived in that place.

Question. Do you remember that information now?

I cannot say that I remember it at all. I know that he mentioned that troops were at Chattanooga. I sent the information immediately to headquarters, as I did all information I received there; but I do not remember now what it was. It occurred about the middle of July and before we heard much about the movements of the rebel army; it was not fastened in my memory, as it would have been afterwards when events became more interesting.

Question. Was General McCook there at the time this information was reported?

I am not sure whether General McCook was there or not; he possibly reached there the very day my messenger returned. It is also possible I might have given the information to General McCook instead of sending it to General Buell, General McCook having taken command there.

Question. Do you know of General McCook's reporting to headquarters information which had been derived through your scouts or agents and which you probably reported yourself also?

I believe that that is the fact, sir. I have some recollection of General McCook's telling me that he had reported information to you which I also reported; but of course I cannot say that he did, though I think he told me so and showed me the dispatches.

Question. Do you remember what divisions of the army were embraced in the movement toward North Alabama from Corinth in the first place?

General McCook's division, General Nelson's, General Wood's, and my own; that is, in the first movement toward North Alabama. General Thomas' division, I understood, was to remain at that time; it did not start with us, but came up afterward.

Question. Do you know positively the time of the arrival of General Thomas' division at Athens or Huntsville?

I do not. General Thomas never reached me at any point on the march. I never saw him or any portion of his command until we reached Pelham, where I found General Schoepf in command.

Question. About what was the aggregate effective strength of the four divisions you have mentioned?

My own division was very much the smallest. Of course my knowledge is not accurate about the others. I talked frequently with the commanders, and supposed their divisions were about 6,500, from that to 7,000, strong; my own, as stated, was about 3,000.

Question. Making an aggregate force of how much?

Probably about 22,000.

Question. What did you learn with regard to the character of the country between Bridgeport and Chattanooga on the south side of the river and with regard to its resources of supplies; was there as much as would be required for the subsistence of an army?

For information of that kind we had to rely upon Union men who lived or had lived in that country. It was a barren country, and we supposed was very much exhausted by the troops who had been there; but of that of course we could only conjecture; we could not go over there. It is a very hilly, broken country, narrow bottoms, and very barren.

Question. With your knowledge of the dependence of the army in that region of country upon its depots in consequence of the scarcity of supplies in the country, and of the difficulty of getting supplies forward in consequence of the destruction of the railroad and the great distance of the army from its base, and considering also the force that the enemy, from the best information, could concentrate at Chattanooga to make such an operation difficult, if not uncertain, what is your opinion in regard to the practicability of moving directly to Chattanooga when the army arrived in North Alabama?

I do not think, sir, at any time the movement was practicable; I mean from the time of my arrival and the first arrival of the troops up to the time we left.

Question. What time was this?

I arrived at Battle Creek on the 13th of July. At no time after the breaking of the roads was the movement practicable at all, in my opinion. With the roads broken by which they had to receive supplies, and the troops thus living on halfrations, they could not have gone to Chattanooga even with a very small force to resist them. I should have considered it unsafe to go if there had been nobody there to resist us.

Question. Do you know at what date, from the best information, General Bragg crossed the Tennessee River in his advance through Middle Tennessee into Kentucky?

About the 22d of August. Perhaps on the 22d General McCook with his division and I with my division were in the Sequatchie Valley, having left me some 6 or 8 miles up the valley beyond the town of Jasper, and General McCook being himself about 6 miles farther up the valley, on his way to a road called the Anderson road, I think.

General McCook received information that thirty-six regiments had crossed the river and marched so far that in his judgment they could meet him to the Anderson road. He also received at the same time and from the same source (one of his spies) information that a large force had crossed the river at some two or three points; and upon this information he came back, gave me his information, and told me that as I had been separated from his command by order of General Buell and posted in the position I then occupied, he gave me no orders, and I must act upon my own responsibility—remain there or go back with him, just as I pleased. The precise day when the enemy crossed the river I cannot state; this is the only information I had as to the time. I supposed General McCook sent the information to headquarters when the rebels crossed the river. We had heard of the crossing of the river by smaller commands several times before, and then heard afterward that they had recrossed and gone back; but between the 18th and the 22d I should say that the main force or the force of the army crossed the Tennessee River.

Question. Was the information ever current for some time previous that the rebel army was advancing or about to advance on Tennessee?

Yes, sir; we had many conversations as to what they were going to do. Some thought they were going up to Knoxville; some to cross the Tennessee at Nashville; some thought into Kentucky. These were the conjectures among the officers and men.

Question. From the best information that you were aware of at the time as to the movements of the enemy and his designs what was supposed to be his immediate destination and by what route or routes across the mountains was he expected to move?

I confess I thought it was exceedingly doubtful myself as to what his object was, whether he meant to go to Nashville or whether he intended to go into Kentucky or whether General Bragg was expecting any great re-enforcements and hoped to lead our army farther into East Tennessee. I confess it was doubtful all the time to myself. Most of the officers with whom I talked rather persuaded me that Nashville was the point. That was the general impression at first. I did not know much about the roads at the time, but supposed he would take the Anderson road, and go either through Altamont or keep off to the right and go through Sparta. There was another road, of which I do not remember the name, farther east than the Anderson road, by which he actually did go. If he was going to Murfreesborough, he would go from Sparta to McMinnville, or directly to Nashville if it was practicable to leave McMinnville to the left and go higher up into the State before he turned off for Nashville.

Question. Was the country across the mountains from Chattanooga into the plains of Tennessee understood to be very destitute of forage and water?

It was, sir.

Question. Do you know, in a general way, about how the troops in Tennessee were distributed at the time the rebel army commenced this advance?

I know in a general way only. I knew we had troops in Decherd, at Murfreesborough, if they had not been moved from there; we had troops at McMinnville, and I learned very soon after that we had troops at Pelham, that we had some troops at Stevenson, and we left a small force at Battle Creek. I understood too that we had some troops at Tullahoma and some over at Columbia.

Question. Had we troops in North Alabama and on the line of road from Decatur to Nashville, did you understand?

I did so understand.

Question. Was it probable, from the scarcity of water and supplies on the route, that the rebel army would make its march across from Chattanooga into the plains of Tennessee as rapidly as possible, should you say?

I should say so, certainly.

Question. Was there anything in the scattered condition of our forces that would have seemed to offer an inducement for the enemy to march into the midst of our forces as well as make his movement as rapid as possible?

Undoubtedly I should think that the enemy would avail himself of every opportunity of that kind; there was every inducement.

Question. From an examination of the map and the position of our troops at that time what route or routes would seem to answer his purpose best for such an object?

I thought it not at all unlikely, if General McCook's information was correct and General Bragg was as near to our command as he was reported to be, that he might rush upon our two divisions; but that would have led him out of the way for any grand achievement. I think he took about the only course that was open to him by making his march to Sparta and Gainesborough, or if into Kentucky by Carthage; if his purpose was to go on to Kentucky, there was no other way. The roads across the mountains, except the roads he took, were impracticable. General McCook tried to get over the mountains some 6 miles up the valley beyond Jasper, but found it altogether impracticable. It was with the greatest difficulty that he got across the mountains at Battle Creek. It took two days and a part of the night to get up the mountain with our two divisions.

Question. What was to prevent him from moving directly on the Therman road to McMinnville or on the road from Dunlap to McMinnville or on the road from Pikeville to McMinnville?

There is nothing, sir; I see no difficulty; there seems to be a good road. I know nothing of the road directly from Dunlap to McMinnville. There is one from Pikeville through Spencer, across the mountains from Chattanooga, toward Pelham and Hillsborough. I meant to say there was no road that General Bragg could have marched on in that direction except the road he took, which is a very difficult one. There is a road from Dunlap to McMinnville and a road from Sparta to McMinnville. From Chattanooga and Harrison's Landing both roads seem to converge to Dunlap.

Question. Suppose the object of the enemy to have been to strike into the midst of our scattered troops and then through to Nashville, would the road by Sparta have been the most direct or the most circuitous?

It would have been the most circuitous. The direct road would have been from Dunlap to McMinnville and through Altamont, if he could have reached that place; but that seems to be an impracticable country and out of the way altogether. By the roads marked on the map, from Harrison's Landing to McMinnville and Murfreesborough is almost a direct line.

Question. You judge of the directness of this route by Altamont by the printed map that is before you?

Yes, sir; I was not on the road at all, and have no knowledge of the roads from Chattanooga to Dunlap and Altamont.

Question. Is your opinion as to the practicability of that road based upon the experience of General McCook in moving from Pelham to Altamont?

It is, sir. It was on that account that the road was considered by me impracticable. General McCook had told me of the difficulty he had in getting through from the broken nature of the country.

Question. Did General McCook ascend the mountain from Pelham to Altamont?

So he told me. I saw him start. I also knew he was ordered to go.

Question. What information did he give you in regard to the practicability of descending the mountain from Altamont?

I do not remember, sir, that he gave me any.

Question. Are you aware that a column of troops under General Negley actually crossed the mountains from Chattanooga on the An-person and Therman road as far as Altamont and then diverged toward Winchester on another road ?

I was not, sir.

Question. Do you consider that it was certainly to be foreseen that the enemy was destined for Kentucky when he commenced this march and that he was to pursue the road by Sparta ?

I did not, sir; I was more afraid of that, I suppose, than of anything else. I am a Kentuckian; it is my home; and I felt a deep solicitude about it. I feared it sometimes, but did not feel convinced at all as to where General Bragg was going, as I said before. I do not believe now that he knew certainly where he was going.

Question. Do you know or can you acquaint yourself by reference to the maps as to how close General Bragg in crossing the mountains could come to McMinnville and Sparta before determining which of these points he would strike for ?

Yes, sir; he might go to Spencer, I should say, without any difficulty. The points seem to be nearly equidistant between the two places.

Question. And how far would that point be from McMinnville and how far from Sparta ?

I should suppose not more than 20 miles from McMinnville and 14 or 15 from Sparta.

Question. Could it ordinarily have been determined with any certainty which point he was aiming for until he actually developed his plans by his movements ?

I should suppose he would have no difficulty in covering his movements for either point. Sometimes by demonstrations it would be difficult or impossible to tell until he had actually gone.

Question. Supposing the Army of the Ohio to have been concentrated at Sparta to oppose the advance of the rebel army, from your reading and your experience have you any doubt that the rebel army could substantially reach McMinnville before you could have a knowledge of his destination at Sparta ?

I have none, sir; I think it would have been entirely practicable to have reached McMinnville or to have gone to Sparta. If the Army of the Ohio had been at McMinnville, the rebel army could have gone by Sparta, by a demonstration upon McMinnville, without anybody's knowing it almost. If the Army of the Ohio had been at Sparta, it would have been entirely practicable for the rebel army to have marched to McMinnville without its movements being known.

Question. Do you know anything of the character of the road between McMinnville and Sparta and of the creek which intersects that road; that is, Caney Fork of the Cumberland ?

There is, I see (referring to the map), a creek crossing the road, but I know nothing of it.

Question. What advantage would the rebel army have had if it had reached McMinnville while the Army of the Ohio was at Sparta looking for it there, and what would have been the embarrassment of the Army of the Ohio from such a result ?

With the rebel army at McMinnville, the Army of the Ohio at Sparta would have been deprived of all its source of supplies by reaching Murfreesborough and Nashville first, I should think. It would have been almost fatal to the Army of the Ohio to have been cut off from Murfreesborough and Nashville by the rebel army in our then condition of supplies.

Question. With these various routes by which the rebel army could cross the mountains and this uncertainty as to its destination what, in your opinion, was the best point at which to concentrate the Army of the Ohio to counteract the movements of the enemy, whatever they might be?

General McCook and myself frequently talked about it, and we thought the army ought to be concentrated at Murfreesborough.

Question. What was the advantage of the concentration at that point?

One great advantage that we looked to at that time, from our having been on half rations, was the advantage of getting supplies for the army, and the certainty that we could cover Nashville and be on the direct road to Kentucky in case we should be required there.

Question. Would it also have the advantage of opposing a greater force to the enemy than could have been brought against him at a more remote point?

Yes, sir; we had troops as far west as Columbia, and Murfreesborough was a nearer point at which those troops could be concentrated with the balance of the army than any point east of Murfreesborough. We had, besides, the advantage of railroad communication running into Murfreesborough.

Question. Is it true also that the main body of the army is diminished for the purpose of protecting its communications the farther it goes from its base?

Undoubtedly, sir; it must be so.

Question. Did the arrival of the rebel army at Sparta indicate with certainty that its destination was Kentucky, in your opinion?

No, sir.

Question. How far could it march upon the routes which it actually followed before that question would be determined with certainty?

I should say that it would be almost certain after passing Smithville that General Bragg would go to Nashville, unless Kirby Smith had met him at the Cumberland River. He might have gone through Lebanon, or he might have gone to Gallatin and taken Nashville from that side, or he might have gone to the Cumberland River and formed his junction there if Nashville had been the object which they intended to direct the rebel force upon. But if General Bragg was to operate alone against Nashville I do not know precisely what road he would take. He could go up to Lebanon and cross the river. It is a difficult road, and it would be a considerable obstacle; still it might have been done.

Question. Is there anything in the character of the country or the condition of the roads to have prevented Bragg from striking the river and marching down it on either side or on both sides?

There is on the south side of the Cumberland Stone River, that would have proved one obstacle; on the other side there is no obstacle. He would have had very good roads, I believe.

Question. Would such a route have had the effect of throwing him into a region of country in which supplies were more abundant than on any other route toward Nashville?

Supplies were very abundant about Lebanon. It is a good country. East of Stone River supplies were abundant—plenty of forage—and I suppose that that route would have furnished him better with supplies of every kind than any other. On the other side of the river is also a good country as far as Gallatin; but I know little of the country. I was up the Cumberland beyond Gallatin.

Question. From a careful consideration of all the information of which you have had any knowledge, from the time the rebel army crossed the Tennessee River until it arrived at Sparta, about what was your estimate and that of other officers who had the best opportunity of knowing as to the strength of that army?

My own opinion was that the enemy was about 40,000 strong. I had information that varied very much. It was placed as high as 60,000 and 100,000, but I never supposed he had more than about 40,000 to 45,000 men at Chattanooga.

Question. Was your estimate greater or less than that of other high officers in the army?

I think my estimate was less than General McCook's. I am not prepared to say whether it was less or greater than that of other officers. I remember that after we got into Kentucky I had some conversation with officers as to the strength of Bragg's army, and the general estimate was that the enemy was about 60,000 strong.

Question. Did you find supplies of forage and provisions scarce or abundant in that part of Tennessee through which you marched in going from Battle Creek to Murfreesborough?

Very scarce. Parts of the road very scarce, with the exception of perhaps one day's march, where we passed through a pretty good country, about 30 miles south of Murfreesborough.

Commission adjourned to meet February 28, 1863.

CINCINNATI, February 28, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Major-General CRITTENDEN's examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Did you during the month of August last hear reports or rumors of an intended advance of the rebel troops from the vicinity of Knoxville; and, if so, what destination did those reports or rumors give to such an advance? I mean prior to a knowledge in the Army of the Ohio of the invasion of Kirby Smith.

I did hear in August last rumors and reports of a large force of rebels gathering about Knoxville. I am not sure that I heard of the direction that they were going to take. It was a matter of frequent speculation and conjecture with us at camp as to which way they were going, whether they would come to Chattanooga; and after Bragg had crossed the Tennessee it was a matter of speculation as to the point at which they would concentrate.

Question. What do you mean by concentration; do you mean a concentration of Bragg's forces with the forces that were collecting about Knoxville?

I do, sir. It would perhaps be proper to add that I think I now remember that at one time we heard of a very considerable force of Bragg's army moving from Chattanooga to Knoxville, but which I believe turned out to be a false rumor. Whether that occurred in August last or in the latter part of July I am not certain.

Question. In the statement previously given in your testimony in regard to the strength of your division are we to understand that it includes but two brigades; was the organization of your division subsequently changed, or rather was an additional brigade added to your division?

In my statement with reference to the strength of my division it is to be understood, of course, to mean the strength at that time at Battle Creek. When I arrived there I had but two brigades. Subsequently, when I moved from Battle Creek, Colonel Harker's brigade reported to me, either as we returned down the Sequatchie Valley through Jasper or at Battle Creek, 5 miles up the creek, where I encamped, and continued to form part of my command until I reached Nashville, where I was directed to instruct General Harker to report to General Wood, to whose division he belonged and from which he had been detached for some time. Colonel Stanley Matthews was ordered to report to me, and his brigade formed a part of my command from that time till now, but the precise day he reported to me I cannot now remember.

Question. Did Colonel Harker's brigade form a part of General Wood's division while it was on this temporary service with you?

I believe so, sir; in fact I heard General Wood claim that Colonel Harker should be restored to his command at Nashville, on the ground that he had been detached from his division. He claimed that at headquarters and in my presence, and orders were accordingly given by Colonel Fry.

Question. How many regiments had you in your division after the permanent addition of a third brigade to it?

I had twelve regiments, sir.

Question. How many regiments were added to your division at Louisville after your arrival there in September?

One to each brigade, making three to that division.

Question. And what would have been the effective strength of your division at that time?

I should say about 8,500 men. This is my best impression from quite a decided recollection of my division before the three new regiments were added. As to the strength of the new regiments I am not positive in my recollection. They were new and numerically strong.

Question. I understand, then, that you make 8,500 by taking the effective strength with which you marched from Tennessee into Kentucky and adding to that the strength of the three regiments added to your division at Louisville?

Yes, sir. When I reached Louisville I was in command of two divisions. I speak with reference, of course, to the strength of the Fifth Division, which was my own, and which I am convinced was about 6,000 strong. I reported at the mouth of Salt River to General Nelson that I had reached the mouth of Salt River with 12,000 men—General Wood's division and my own.

Question. Do you know anything of a very great diminution in the strength of these two divisions, about the time of their arrival at Louisville until the battle of Perryville, by straggling and by men going to their homes in the various States to which their regiments belonged, and can you form any estimate of the diminution from this cause?

I know that there was a very decided diminution of strength in many regiments. Many men left. I know this by the complaints of my own officers to me on the subject. I also know that there was a great deal of straggling on the march, particularly in the new regiments, from Louisville to Perryville. It was reported to me several times that the road behind was filled with stragglers, but on that march until the battle of Perryville, until my return from Wild Cat, we had no regular returns, and it was impossible for me to know what the diminution had been.

Question. Can you mention an example of any particular regiment which will give some idea of the extent of this diminution?

My recollection now is indistinct, but there was a regiment which it seems to me now refused to march, so it was reported to me, because they did not have the transportation which they thought they were entitled to. I cannot name that regiment, nor am I positive that this occurred at Louisville; but that is my decided impression, because I had no other regiments that would have refused to march under any circumstances. It must have been one of the new regiments.

Question. Have you any doubt that it was one of the new regiments?

I have not.

Question. Did the regiment march?

I think it did, sir. I am sure it did.

Question. Was any report made to you of the extraordinary diminution in the strength of the regiment of which General Hascall was formerly the colonel on account of absentees who left the regiment and went to their homes in Indiana after the arrival of the regiment in Louisville?

I do not remember any report in reference to that particular regiment.

Question. In the whole of your connection with the Army of the Ohio can you point to an example of the refusal of any regiment in that army to march or perform any other service that was required of it?

I never heard of any such occurrence in the army before, sir. It certainly never occurred in my command.

Question. Do you know anything about the length of service and discipline of the new regiments formed at Louisville when the Army of the Ohio reached that point?

I know that the new regiments which were added to my command at Louisville, and which command was increased at that place to three divisions, were undisciplined and new troops. As to the time of their service, I infer from their want of discipline and instruction that it must have been very short.

Question. Do you know to what levy they belonged?

I understood that those troops were mostly raised after the invasion of Kentucky, when Louisville and Cincinnati were both supposed to be in danger, but I have no knowledge of the fact, and cannot say under what levy they were raised.

Question. What would be your judgment as to the ability of the force that was found in Louisville when the Army of the Ohio arrived there in September last to withstand a determined attack from Bragg's army at that place?

I do not think they could have withstood an attack from Bragg's army at all. They were all, as I understood, new troops. General Nelson, who was in command at Louisville when I reached Salt River, was of that opinion, I know, from a note which I received from him, in answer to a dispatch of mine from the mouth of Salt River, urging me in his note to come immediately to Louisville.

Question. With what command and when did you march from Louisville against the rebel army at Bardstown?

I marched with the Second Army Corps, which was composed of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Divisions. It was on the 1st of October, I think.

Question. Was it known at that time at what point the rebel forces were to be met—at what point they could probably be brought to battle?

My understanding was, sir, that we would probably fight them at Bardstown.

Question. Did you find any rebel troops in Bardstown when you arrived there with your command?

We had rather a severe cavalry skirmish just on the edge of Bardstown, but found no infantry there. We drove the cavalry out, and in consequence of this cavalry skirmish, going up to support our cavalry there that met with a repulse there, my recollection is that we occupied Bardstown one day sooner than was expected.

Question. Was it known with any certainty at what point the rebel army would be found after its withdrawal at Bardstown?

I certainly did not know nor do I believe it was known. I remember, however, hearing you say at Bardstown, in a few minutes' conversation I had with you there while you were giving me instructions or orders for my march, that the enemy might make a stand at Perryville.

Question. By what road did you march after you left Springfield in advance upon Perryville, and at what point did you encamp on the night of the first day's march from Springfield?

I marched by the road which leads from Springfield to Haysville. General Thomas accompanied the command, and we went beyond Haysville to the fork of Salt River, some $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 miles, I think, from the turnpike which leads from Haysville to Perryville. I remember the camp distinctly, because we had a very fatiguing march, and my last division did not get into camp until 3 o'clock in the morning, and we marched without water too.

Question. Did you encamp at the place at which you were expected to encamp when I parted with you at Springfield?

I did not, sir. I expected to encamp at Haysville, but when I reached that place General Thomas ordered the command to go on to this fork of Salt River. He was of opinion, I know, that it would take us only about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles out of our way, and he deemed it important that the men should have water; and this being the only water, or the nearest, he ordered us to go there.

Question. What position did General Thomas occupy at that time and did he move with your corps?

He was second in command of the Army of the Ohio, and he did move with my corps.

Question. Do you know how far it is from Haysville to Perryville and on what known turnpike road is the town of Haysville?

It is, I should think, about 10 miles from Haysville to Perryville. I am not sure about the distance, however. Haysville is on the main road from Danville to Lebanon or Harrodsburg; I do not know the name of the road however.

Question. Do you mean to say that it is on the road from Danville to Harrodsburg?

No, sir. There is no main turnpike road through Haysville either to Danville or Harrodsburg.

General BUELL. I will offer at this time the instructions issued to General Thomas on the night of the 7th of October in reference to the movements of General Crittenden's corps for the following day.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I admit the instructions offered by General Buell to be those forwarded to me by General Thomas.

OCTOBER 7—7 p. m.

GENERAL: The Third Corps (Gilbert's) is within $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of Perryville, the cavalry being near, perhaps $2\frac{1}{2}$. From all the information received to-day it is thought the enemy will resist our advance into Perryville. They are said to have a strong force in and near the place. We expect to attack and carry the place to-morrow.

March at 3 o'clock precisely to-morrow morning without fail, and if possible get all the canteens filled and have the men cautioned to use water in the most sparing manner. Every officer must caution his men on this point. Send back every team and animal that is not absolutely necessary with the troops, as they will suffer for water. All the wagons which come must move in rear of your troops. The right of Gilbert's corps rests opposite to Gordon's place, which is on the Lebanon pike, and from Gordon's to Gilbert's right is about 2 or $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles. When the Second Corps gets up to that vicinity, that is to say, about 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from town, let the front be halted and put in order of battle and the whole column closed up, and the men allowed to rest in position and made as comfortable as possible, but not allowed to scatter. The commander of the corps must then immediately have the front reconnoitered and gain all the information he can of the position of the enemy and his strength, also of the nature of the country in his front. This must be done by inquiring of the inhabitants and personal examination of officers and by the reconnaissance. When the column has got into position you will please report in person at these headquarters, with all the information you may have been able to obtain, and instructions for the future movements will be given. Send orderlies back with bearer to learn where our headquarters are. All the usual precaution must be taken and preparation made for action. There is no water near us, and we can expect but little, if any, until we get it at Perryville. Nothing has been heard of you since we parted this morning.

Respectfully, &c.,

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

General THOMAS, Second in Command.

A true copy.

GEO. E. FLYNT,
Major and Chief of Staff.

Question. Do you recognize those as the instructions which were received for the movement of your corps on the 8th ?

Yes, sir; I think I received that order, or it was read to me by General Thomas, about 3 o'clock on the morning of the 8th. At this time the last of my rear division was still coming into camp when that order was received, at least when I first heard of it and saw it myself.

Question. State, if you please, in what manner it was executed.

We marched at 7 with the First Division; at 9 the Second Division was marched; and at 11 General Wood's division, which had been all night getting into camp, marched, being put in the rear again in order that the men might rest. We reached Perryville with the First Division about 10 or 11 o'clock. It was before 11 o'clock that General Smith had his division in line of battle within $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles of Perryville. It was perhaps two hours afterward when the Second Division got into position. Between 3 and 4 o'clock it was reported to me by one of my aides that I had sent over to the left to bring me such information that my last division had formed on General Gilbert's right, completing my line of battle.

Question. Did you march through Haysville ?

We did not, sir. I understand that to mean did we in marching from Salt River march through Haysville? The road by which we went to Salt River was not the road by which we returned to the pike. We came into the pike leading to Perryville some $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, as I understood, nearer to Perryville than Haysville is.

Question. Do you know the name of the creek near Haysville at which you were expected to find water on the night of the 7th ?

I do not, sir.

Question. Suppose you had been where you expected to encamp that night and had marched at the time appointed in the order about what time would you have been in position in front of Perryville on the morning of the 8th ?

My recollection of the distance from Haysville to Perryville does not enable me to state exactly what that distance is. I am sure it is not over 10 miles; it is possibly not more than 7. Of course the hour at which I could have reached Perryville, starting from Haysville at 3 o'clock, would depend somewhat on the distance. I should have marched on that road $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 miles an hour. Starting at 3 o'clock, if it were 10 miles, I should have reached Perryville by a quarter past 6 o'clock with the head of my column; that would carry me actually to Perryville by that time. We were, however, ordered to halt some $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 miles outside of Perryville, and that would put me there at that point an hour sooner—at a quarter past 5.

Question. What distance did you march on that day from the point at which you did actually encamp ?

I should think about 8 or 9 miles.

Question. Do you know at what time your arrival in front of Perryville was reported at headquarters and in what manner it was reported ?

I do not remember, sir.

Question. When were you first informed during that day that a severe action had been fought on the extreme left ?

About 8 or 9 o'clock that night; I think it must have been about this time. I first got my information from Captain Fitzhugh, whom I found at General Thomas' headquarters.

Question. Please state what your impression was prior to the receipt of that information as to the character and extent of the operations of that day and of the position and condition of the army with reference to the rebel forces.

We had heard very considerable cannonading during the day, or for a long time in the early part of the day, which we all supposed was the rebels firing upon our cavalry in the advance. This opinion of mine that it was nothing more than this sort of skirmishing was based also upon two dispatches which I received from General Gilbert during the day. I received a note from General Gilbert at 12 or 12.30 in the day, in which he apprised me that a reconnaissance of some force was about to be made which might grow into a general engagement; that General Buell had directed him to apprise me of that change. I immediately handed the note to General Thomas, but I heard nothing of any general engagements or any increased firing after that. At 4 o'clock I received another note from General Gilbert, in which he apprised me of some little change made in the disposition of his troops since my aide-de-camp had been over there in the morning, and also said, "The noise you hear on the left is from McCook," and in a vein of pleasantry he added, "My children are all quiet, and by sunset we will have them in bed and nicely tucked up, as we used to do in Corinth." I have those dispatches somewhere.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I should like to have them, general.

The WITNESS. In consequence of this I rode over with the note to General Thomas, and my impression was, and I so stated to him in the presence of a number of officers, that at last we had the rebels, and they could not possibly get away, so little did I know what was going on during the day.

O. P. BEARD (a witness for the defendant), being duly sworn by the judge-advocate, testified as follows:

By General BUELL:

Question. State your name and residence, if you please.

O. P. Beard; Lexington, Ky.

Question. Were you in or about Lexington when the rebel force under Kirby Smith entered that place last summer?

I was, sir.

Question. State what you know in regard to the strength of that force and how you obtained your information.

I counted General Smith's force as they came into town, with several other gentlemen. He had about 15,000 men. John Morgan had about 1,250 to 1,300. Humphrey Marshall came in with 3,500 to 4,000.

Question. I understand you to mean that these several numbers have to be added together to make up the whole force that came in?

Yes, sir; but not including General Stevenson's, that went through Danville?

Question. Did Stevenson's force go into Lexington?

No, sir; they did not.

Question. About how long did the rebel troops remain in Lexington?

I could not tell to a day. They commenced retreating from Lexington on the Thursday previous to the inauguration of Governor Hawes; that was in October, I think. They remained in Lexington until General Sill advanced upon Frankfort.

Question. Do you mean the Thursday previous to the inauguration or subsequent?

A good many of them left before and all of them a day or two afterward. A good many of the troops went toward Versailles as soon as they returned from Frankfort. They got back on Sunday to Lexington after the inauguration at Frankfort, and on Monday or Tuesday the whole force left, with the exception of a few mounted men that were on duty there.

Question. Which way did they go and where did they cross the Kentucky River?

They went both roads; they went both on the Harrodsburg and Versailles roads; and all the information of their crossing was from an aide of General Smith, Captain Allen, who told me that a good many of them crossed below Versailles. Humphrey Marshall went down the Harrodsburg road.

Question. To what point on the south side of the Kentucky River did they go? Can you place them?

Schryock's or Munday's Landing, or both. I would suppose they crossed at both ferries.

Question. Could they ford the river at these points without difficulty?

Yes, sir; the water was very low. I had crossed the river myself a few days before at Frankfort and the water was extremely low.

Question. Do you say that the force of Humphrey Marshall accompanied this movement toward Harrodsburg across the Kentucky River?

They did, from Lexington, sir; and went in the direction of the Kentucky River on the Harrodsburg road.

Question. Where did the force of Humphrey Marshall come from; by what road did they enter the State?

They came, as I suppose, from Mount Sterling (in an easterly direction) and Winchester into Lexington on the Winchester road.

Question. Mention the point on the border of the State at which they entered.

I talked with some of Humphrey Marshall's officers whom I knew personally, and they said they came through Piketon.

Question. From Virginia?

From Abingdon, Va., so they told me.

Question. Has this force or a similar force under Humphrey Marshall been operating from that quarter and on that route for the past year; in fact pretty much since the commencement of the rebellion?

It has been so reported at headquarters at Lexington and by officers connected with the army there to me.

Question. Is it a matter of notoriety that Humphrey Marshall has been operating in that way during that time?

It is, sir.

Question. Was there anything to have prevented him from returning by that route instead of going with Kirby Smith's force in the direction of Harrodsburg if he had desired to retreat from the State.

None that I have any information of.

Question. State what you know, if you please, of any depots of arms that the rebel forces had in Lexington while they were there.

They had a very large depot of arms on my premises. I have two stables in Lexington; one of them has been occupied by the Federal troops since the commencement of the war, and upon the retreat of the Federal forces the rebels took possession of the same and used it as a depot for arms. They had a very large quantity there; all the stalls were filled and the middle of the stable piled up. The stable is now in possession of the Federal authorities and is used by General Gillmore, for which the Government is paying me. The rebels never paid me anything.

Question. Where did these stores come from?

They were captured, I suppose, at Richmond—a great many of them—and a great many were found in Lexington.

Question. Do you know that the rebel troops captured a large amount of arms and ammunition at Richmond? You may state at the same time what opportunity you had of knowing what you do in regard to the battle of Richmond and the circumstances following and connected with that battle.

Upon the night after the battle of Richmond I was ordered by Colonel Anderson and Colonel McCook to take a squad of men and go out in advance of their regiments and march to the Kentucky River and stop stragglers. I started ahead of the two regiments. I found the army completely demoralized—very much frightened. I could not stop them at all; they refused to be stopped by me. I did not use any force. I met the trains; they were full of soldiers and men holding on behind on the wagon-boxes. I went out about 9 miles on the road and returned to Lexington. The Federal forces came back and intended giving fight the next day, but from some cause of which I do not know they retreated that night, and the rebels came into Lexington on Tuesday morning, I think it was. It was the 1st of September. Having a depot opposite my premises within 40 yards, and being at the head of the street, I could see all their trains as they came in. We had great curiosity, us Union men, to see what was going on. I counted one train of 40 or 50 wagons loaded with guns and marked "U. S." I saw a great many cannon, and loaded wagons of all descriptions of stores with the Government mark on them. They were unloading ammunition there the entire day, blocking up the street so much that people had to go around the entire square. I had frequent talks with the ordnance officer in command, who told me that they had more than I believe they had. He told me they had 25,000 stand of arms, but I do not believe it at all, though I would judge from what I saw they had from 10,000 to 15,000. After the rebels had been there for several days the trains continued to arrive with boxes of ammunition. They had country wagons, in which they could not haul a very heavy load.

Question. Do you know anything about the capture of arms at Frankfort by the rebel troops at the time they came into the State?

I procured a pass from General Kirby Smith to go to Louisville to get my omnibuses and wagons that I had let Colonel McCook have for hospital purposes. It was about ten or twelve days after that they got into Lexington. On my return from Louisville I came through Frankfort, and Leadbetter's division was in possession of that place. My road home was directly by the arsenal. There was a train upon the road, and a good many wagons loaded, a great many empty, and there were two or three wagons loading with arms at the time I passed the arsenal, moving in the direction of Lexington after they were loaded. That is all I know about it.

Question. How soon after their arrival at Lexington did the rebel troops begin to send out trains of supplies?

The first I saw that led me to believe they were moving supplies out of Lexington was when I went with my family out on the road to see a relative the third day after my arrival. On my return I struck the turnpike about 3 miles from Lexington, and there was one continuous train of wagons nearly the whole distance from Lexington, loaded with flour, going down the Nicholasville road, in a southwesterly direction from Lexington. The Nicholasville road leads immediately to Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. About what date was that?

That was about the 4th day of September.

Question. In your estimate of the strength of the force which entered Lexington did you include stragglers and other soldiers that accompanied the trains or were the numbers you have mentioned those which you counted in the ranks?

The numbers I have mentioned were those which came in the ranks, not including stragglers nor the recruits obtained through the country.

Question. Do you know anything about the number of recruits obtained in the State?

I know nothing except the numbers I saw pass through Lexington, of which I formerly made an estimate. I think that the different rebel regiments that were raised through the country would amount to 4,000 or 5,000. The rebel army was very much disappointed with the number of recruits they obtained there. None of General Bragg's recruits or those raised south of the Kentucky River came to Lexington, to my knowledge. At one time it looked as if every rebel in the country was going to fall into the ranks, but from some cause they became lukewarm, and a great many of them slipped out of the ranks and returned home.

Question. What was the opinion of the people of the State, as far as you know, as to the object of this invasion, as to whether it was a temporary raid or with the design of holding permanent possession of the State?

They believed, sir, from General Smith's conversation and acts, that they had come to remain in Kentucky permanently, and so strong was the belief, that when I expressed the opinion that the Federal forces would drive them out in two weeks they arrested me and put me in jail for it and kept me there a day.

Question. What sort of treatment did you receive from the rebel authorities when they came in?

Well, I thought pretty bad. They took possession of my premises; sent out and issued an order and had my horses taken; fed from my grain for a week, and paid me nothing for it. They put me in jail twice and arrested me once besides; at least I was arrested the first morning they came in and twice afterward and put in jail once; the third time when I was arrested they kept me in the marshal's office.

Question. Did they require you to take any oath or give any parole?

They demanded it of me and I refused. Upon the interposition of a friend General Smith released me.

Question. Do you know anything about the number of Union troops that were at Louisville when the rebel troops came into Central Kentucky?

I do not, sir; I went to Louisville after my property, and was under special promise to General Smith not to divulge anything; consequently when I got to Louisville I asked no questions and derived no information whatever.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. In this account of the forces under Kirby Smith do you mean to say that Marshall's and Morgan's are included in the 15,000 men?

I do not, sir.

Question. How many do you make the whole number?

From 20,000 to 22,000 it would add up.

Question. Do you not know that Kirby Smith entered Kentucky with from 8,000 to 10,000 men?

I do not, sir. The information I have on that subject is from a gentleman from our town, a Mr. Spencer, that he counted them in Barbourville, and his count was that 12,000 passed through that town.

Question. Upon what day did Kirby Smith enter Lexington and did his entire force come into town?

He first entered Lexington on the 1st of September. His army came in by divisions; some of them came in by different roads; one or two on the Tait's Creek road and the balance on the Richmond road.

Question. With his force entering the town by different roads how did you make up your estimate?

The two roads run into the main street, and the whole force of General Smith made a display down the main street.

Question. On the same day?

No, sir; on different days.

Question. Who assisted you in making that count?

Several gentlemen of our town, sir.

Question. Do you recollect their names?

J. M. Lawrence, David Hawkins. I do not recollect the others. I refused to do any business with the rebels while they were in Lexington, but made it my business to see all I could.

Question. How did you count; by regiments?

No, sir; I did not count by regiments. I counted them as they entered by divisions.

Question. Do you mean to say that you actually counted each man as he passed?

As near as I could. I do not think any person could make a really correct count,

It was as near as I could get it. I think it is impossible to, when a man's attention is attracted first to one thing and then to another; he may make mistakes. I do not mean to say that my count was perfectly accurate, but it was as near as I could make it.

Question. Counting under those circumstances might you not make a difference of 5,000 men, more or less?

I do not think I could make that much of a mistake, sir.

Question. Did you count the recruits in Kentucky in the same way?

I did not count the recruits at all; I only formed an estimate of them from seeing them in the different regiments. I was told there was a great many more than I made them, but I did not believe it.

Question. How were those recruits armed at the time you saw them?

They were all brought up in front of my stable and armed at the armory or the depot the rebels had there.

Question. Have you seen a statement by an ordnance officer connected with the rebel army in Kentucky, published in a Richmond paper, to the effect that he distributed 2,000 muskets and had lost the larger portion of them by recruits going home with them?

I did not, sir.

Question. If Kirby Smith recruited to the extent of 5,000 men would it not be reasonable to suppose that Bragg had gathered up to the same number?

From what I could learn from gentlemen who were with Bragg's army they scarcely got any. General Bragg, in his public speech at Lexington, said that he had been disappointed in getting troops.

Question. Are you so well satisfied with your estimate of the recruits that you could venture to contradict an official report stating the number to be about 2,000?

I should adhere to my opinion as to what I supposed to be the number. I may be mistaken; but I would adhere to what I saw and the conclusion I formed from it. I do not know how far the recruits went, but I know a great many of them returned. It was probable that not half the number went out of the State of Kentucky. I know of my own knowledge of a great many who volunteered out of Fayette County and went with the army, but when they got to the Big Hill deserted and came back and are now scattered all over the country, and others who went from other counties deserted and came back. I saw a great many of them.

Question. Was the abandonment of Kentucky on the part of the rebels really owing to their disappointment in obtaining recruits or from lack of co-operation of the people?

It was not so understood in Lexington; it was there understood to be in consequence of General Buell's marching into the southern part of the State.

Question. Was your imprisonment previous or subsequent to the visit to Louisville?

I was arrested once before I went to Louisville and twice afterward.

Question. Upon what ground were you released by General Smith?

When the fact of what I was arrested for was communicated to him he thought it was not sufficient and just ground for imprisoning a citizen and ordered me to be discharged, and cautioned me to keep my opinions to myself; that he intended to remain in Kentucky, and expected obedience to the laws from all the citizens. This, I believe, was about the substance of his remarks.

Question. After this knowledge of your opinions what reasons had he for permitting you to go to Louisville?

It was after I returned from Louisville,

Question. You say you were arrested and released previous to your going to Louisville and I ask you upon what grounds you were released?

There were no charges preferred against me. I was arrested by some soldiers and released.

Question. You were not then released upon the order of Kirby Smith?

No, sir; by the provost-marshal.

Question. Was Kirby Smith under the impression when you went to Louisville that you were a Union man?

Yes, sir; I was so represented to him by his aide, Captain Allen, who went with me and procured a pass for me. He also gave me a special permit for myself and Mr. Kenny, my partner, to protect seventy-five or eighty mules that we had bought for the Government and that were then on the road to Cincinnati; they had not been delivered to the Government, and he gave permission to Mr. Kenny to bring them to Cincinnati, which he did, and they were sold to the Government.

Question. Did Kirby Smith know at that time that you had been in the service of the United States at Richmond?

No, sir; I did not consider that I had any office when I went out temporarily. I had no commission; it was all volunteer on my part.

Question. Was this liberality on the part of Kirby Smith a common thing at that time?

Yes, sir; when he first arrived there. They were then on what I call their good behavior; but they afterward became pretty severe.

Question. This good behavior, I understand you to say, extended to the protection and delivery of seventy-five mules for the United States?

It extended to me and Mr. Kenny as individuals.

By General TYLER:

Question. You say you counted by divisions; how many divisions did you count; who commanded them?

I do not know whether I could tell all the divisions or not; I made no memorandum at the time. There were Cheatham's, Leadbetter's, Preston Smith's, Morgan's, and Marshall's. I do not recollect the names of the other commanders, sir.

Question. Did Marshall and Morgan command divisions?

They had separate commands. I do not know if they were entirely to themselves or not. I know the fact of their being called generals.

Question. Was there any great inequality as to the numbers of the divisions that you counted?

I do not recollect. My impression is that Cheatham had the largest division that moved down the Maysville road toward Cincinnati when they passed through Lexington, but I do not remember now the number that he had. I never expected to be called on to testify; it was merely a matter of curiosity with me.

Question. How large was Leadbetter's division, sir?

I do not recollect, sir. I cannot give you the number of any particular division now. I kept no memorandum of any division; we counted them as they came in.

Question. Then I understand you to say that Leadbetter's, Cheatham's, Preston Smith's, Marshall's, and Morgan's divisions made your whole amount of troops 20,000 men?

And the balance of them—I do not know who they were commanded by—make the number.

Question. How do you account for this balance? Where did they come from and where did they go to?

They came to Lexington; some of them marched toward Cincinnati and some of them marched down the Frankfort road. A gentleman by the name of Scott had command of the cavalry. I do not know whether he was a general or not; some called him General and some Colonel Scott. He had quite a smart force.

Question. How large a force had Scott?

I could not tell exactly, sir, because some of them went around Lexington and I did not get to see them.

Question. How could you count men you did not see?

I did not count them, sir.

Question. Were the Kentucky recruits organized into regiments; if so, how many regiments were organized?

I cannot answer how many regiments were organized. I know there were a great many advertised to be organized. Colonel Cluke had a pretty full regiment; the largest that was raised, I think. Colonel Thompson had a regiment. Colonel Che-nault and Colonel Viele organized a regiment, but the number raised I could not state. There was also Colonel Blackman, but how many he got I could not tell, for I never saw his regiment.

Question. Did you see as many as 2,000 recruits first and last; I mean under arms in their regiments?

I think I saw as many as four or five thousand.

Question. Where did you see them?

At Lexington.

Question. Where were they encamped at Lexington?

They were encamped in two or three different places, some on the south side of Lexington and some on the east side. There were some out on the Cincinnati road, on the north side of the city, but I never went to their camp. I was not in a rebel encampment while they were there.

Question. How could you testify as to the exact number of their troops without having been in their camps?

I saw them all under arms in Lexington.

Question. Did you see them all at one time or at different times?

At one time. I suppose they were brought there for the purpose of being reviewed by General Smith.

Question. Who was in command of the recruits at the time you supposed this review was to take place?

General Abraham Buford.

Question. How many regiments were they divided into at this review.

I do not know exactly how many regiments there were. I formed my estimate from the number of recruits I saw under arms. There were a good many independent companies raised and in the act of being raised.

Question. How do you know that all these men under the command of General Buford were all recruits?

I supposed they were under the command of General Buford. I knew nothing of the movements of the rebels personally; it was only from observation.

General Buell wishing to ask a question of the witness, it was adopted by General Tyler, as follows:

Question. I wish to ask the witness whether he is confident that General Cheatham's division was at Lexington and whether he knows anything of the division of General Heth?

The WITNESS. General Heth's division passed through Lexington and went on toward Cincinnati. The name mentioned in my testimony as Cheatham I believe is Churchill. I am not certain whether it is Cheatham or Churchill, but it is one of the two. There were General Heth and General Reynolds commanding a division also with Kirby Smith.

The Commission adjourned to meet March 2, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, March 2, 1863.

Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Major-General CRITTENDEN'S examination continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Were you on duty in the lines in front of Corinth until the evacuation of that place by the rebel army in May last?

I was.

Question. Were there any general or partial engagements between the rebel army and the forces under the command of Major-General Halleck prior to that engagement?

I remember one very considerable engagement, and I heard the firing from numerous small engagements or skirmishes. I had some skirmishing there myself. It would perhaps be proper to add that I was not in line in front of Corinth when the considerable engagement to which I refer took place; I was some distance back. I refer to the fight at Farmington when I speak of the considerable engagement.

Question. What was the impression made upon your mind by any engagement in front of Corinth compared with that made upon you by the firing in front of Perryville on the 8th of October as to the severity of the action?

That question reminds me of a slight mistake which I made in the answer to the previous question. In answering it I wish to make a correction, which is that I now remember another very considerable engagement where I was in line and subsequent to the fight at Farmington, in which in addition to the cannonading there was considerable musketry firing. I heard no musketry at Perryville. I heard cannonading at Corinth several times as rapid, I should think, as any I heard at Perryville. At Murfreesborough I heard more rapid firing in skirmishing going on than I heard at either place on one day. My impression was, of course, when I heard nothing but artillery firing at Perryville, that there was no engagement of any considerable force. I had heard at Corinth on the extreme right of our line what it seems to me now was equal to any I heard at Perryville, but I never heard any explanation of it to this day and I do not know what they were firing about; I think it was skirmishing or an artillery duel. I supposed at Perryville, as I believe I have already stated, that the cannonading which I heard was principally from the enemy upon our cavalry, which I supposed was pressing them, and perhaps by the return firing of our cavalry also. Hearing no musketry, my impression was that there could not be any battle going on; merely an artillery duel. When General Pope's forces became engaged at Corinth and when the musketry firing began I supposed it might have been a battle, and that perhaps it was the beginning of a very serious battle.

Question. Do you think it very remarkable that, with an army occupying a front of 5 or 6 miles and in front of an enemy, such partial engagements should sometimes take place at various points without attracting unusual attention or giving cause for apprehension of a dangerous engagement, unless other circumstances indicated that such engagement was imminent?

I thought it remarkable that I could hear no musketry from such an engagement as did actually take place there when I was within 6 miles, and I thought I could hardly have credited the fact if I had not witnessed it myself. I do not think it remarkable that such artillery firing as I heard there should take place in a line of battle 6 miles long without exciting any extraordinary interest or anxiety, because I have known such things to happen, within my own short experience as a soldier, several times, and nothing serious to result from it.

Question. After hearing of the engagement that took place on the left on the 8th of October, were you or were you not in expectation that the enemy would be found in our front and that a battle would ensue the next morning?

I expected a battle the next morning, because I received an order, which I have in my pocket now, from General Thomas, dated at General Buell's headquarters, in which he orders me to have my command ready to attack at daylight. I have also a note from Colonel Fry, inquiring, on the morning of the 9th, what delayed my attack. I heard nothing of the enemy's leaving Perryville, and from these orders had no doubt they were there.

Question. Did you witness any of the movements of the enemy or did you have knowledge in any way of these movements such as to give you a different expectation if such orders had not been received from headquarters?

I certainly witnessed no movements of the enemy, nor was there any circumstance to produce the impression on my mind that the enemy intended to leave Perryville that morning or that they had left the night before. I knew nothing of Perryville. I had no judgment as to the eligibility of that place for the enemy to make a stand and fight a battle, but my impression was that as they had stopped there, had selected the place, and had actually fought there, they intended still to fight there. That was the only ground that I had for such an opinion.

Question. Have you with you the dispatches from headquarters of which you make mention?

I have, sir. These are the dispatches to which I refer as received from General Thomas and Colonel Fry. The one from General Thomas was received by me after night of the 8th. I cannot fix the hour:

“(Official.)

“GENERAL BUELL'S HEADQUARTERS.

“To General CRITTENDEN:

“Have your different divisions ready to attack at daylight. Issue orders at once.

“General THOMAS,

“By Captain CASE,

“Signal Officer.”

The dispatch from Colonel Fry reads as follows:

“General CRITTENDEN:

“Have you commenced the advance? What delays your attack?

“JAMES B. FRY,

“Colonel.”

It is difficult on the field to remember the hour, but my impression is this was not received till 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning. I had ordered my command to be ready for the attack at daylight. I had taken my position in rear of the center of my command, ready to execute General Thomas' orders, which you will notice is to be ready for the attack, but I never received any order to attack. After waiting a long time, till after 8 or 9 o'clock in the morning—I am not sure whether it was after receiving this dispatch from Colonel Fry or not—I rode to General Thomas, and about that time we commenced the advance.

General BUELL. I propose to introduce those dispatches.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I have no objection to them.

OCTOBER 8—8.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The First Corps (McCook's) on our left has been very heavily engaged. The left and center of this corps gained ground, but the right of it yielded a little. Press your lines forward as far as possible to-night and get into position to make a vigorous attack in the morning at daylight. If you have got your troops into a position which you deem advantageous it will not be desirable to make a change for the purpose of complying with the general's instructions for you sent by Captain Mack. It may be as well to halt the division ordered to the center and let it wait where it is for further orders. The general desires to see you in person as soon to-night as your duties will permit you to come over.

Respectfully,

General THOMAS.

A true copy.

J. B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

GEO. E. FLYNT,
Major and Chief of Staff.

OCTOBER 9—10 a. m.

GENERAL: The general commanding in the center reports that the enemy appears to be moving toward our left, and a prisoner confirms this idea and says he thinks they are moving to Dicksville. This, if true, may be to pursue the advantage they gained yesterday over our left. You will move forward steadily, and when the action commences you must attack vigorously and get possession of Perryville, so as to be able to pursue your advantage by moving over the roads from that place to Dicksville, Cave Spring, or Harrodsburg. If the enemy attack our left, re-enforcements will be sent from the center, thus rendering the success of your attack the more necessary. Pursue with vigor any advantage you gain. Report more frequently.

Respectfully,

JAMES B. FRY,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

General THOMAS or General CRITTENDEN.

A true copy.

GEO. E. FLYNT,
Major and Chief of Staff.

General BUELL. I will first ask the judge-advocate if he admits these copies to have been received from General Thomas and recognizes the transmission of them by General Thomas as an acknowledgment that the orders were received by General Thomas?

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Yes, sir; they come to me in response to a request from General Buell asking for all orders and instructions issued at the time indicated in this order, and being authenticated as they are I take them to be in response to that letter, and permit them to come in as such.

By General BUELL:

Question. Have you any knowledge of these instructions?

I cannot say that I ever saw the instructions. They sound familiar to me, and I infer that I either saw them or that General Thomas told me the substance of them.

Question. What position did your corps take on the night of the 9th and at what hour did it get into camp?

General SCHOEPF. I suggest that General Crittenden mark his position on the map, so that the position of the troops be marked by an officer who was present.

General BUELL. I suggest, Mr. President, that the map of Perryville and the neighborhood was prepared before we occupied Perryville and from such information as I could collect in advance. It has never been corrected or verified, and there can be no assurance of its accuracy for any important purpose now.

General CRITTENDEN. My recollection is that one of my divisions encamped at a spring, the name of which I forget. I was not with the division or at the spring; but it is on or near the Perryville or Danville road. The other two divisions I think encamped at Crawford Spring, some few miles from Perryville. I cannot be positive as to the time I reached my camp; I suppose at 1 or 2 o'clock. I am not positive that I did not go on that day to Harlan's, which would be to the east of the Perryville and Harrodsburg road some 3 or 4 miles; but my best impression is that I encamped at Crawford Spring and went to Harlan's the next day.

Question. Where would that position be in reference to Perryville and on what road?

The position at Crawford Spring would be on the Perryville and Harrodsburg road and about 3 miles I think toward Harrodsburg. The spring is not on the road, but near enough I presume to be called on the road.

Question. What position did your corps take on the 10th and at what hour was it entirely in camp?

On the 10th my recollection is that I was in camp at Harlan's; but whether I reached the camp that day or whether I went there on the evening of the 9th is a matter about which I cannot be positive in my statements. I cannot remember whether I went to Harlan's on the 9th or 10th, but I did not move from there on the 10th. I now remember that before I marched from Harlan's with my entire command I sent a brigade to make a reconnaissance toward Harrodsburg. I must leave the question unanswered as to when I got into camp, because I am not actually positive that I marched on the 10th. If I marched on the 10th it was from Crawford Spring, and as it was but a few miles I have no doubt I got into camp early in the day, but I do not recollect the hour.

Question. Who commanded the brigade that went into Harrodsburg, and are you positive that it returned to your camp at Harlan's or did it not join you after you moved from that position?

Colonel Harker commanded the brigade which I sent into Harrodsburg, and since the suggestion which the question makes I am inclined to think that Colonel Harker did join me afterward and that he did not return to Harlan's.

Question. Did you give Colonel Harker his instructions or did General Thomas?

My impression is that they were given by General Thomas. My impression is that I was present or that I gave the instructions myself to Colonel Harker. This is my impression, because Colonel Harker was not instructed to go into Harrodsburg and I was surprised to learn that he had been there. I did not expect him to go there when he started. He was making a reconnaissance to see where the enemy were. I supposed at the time they were at Harrodsburg.

Question. Was the whole of your corps at Harlan's? If not, describe the position of the different parts of it.

The whole of my corps was not at Harlan's. About two divisions were at Harlan's, which is 4 or 5 miles from Perryville, at a point, I should say, nearly equidistant between the Perryville and Danville road and Perryville and Harrodsburg road perhaps a little nearer to the Danville road than to the Harrodsburg road; and one division south of the other two divisions perhaps 2 miles, on or near the Danville road.

Question. Do you know of a brigade being sent from your right division, while occupying that position, to Danville and beyond Danville on a reconnaissance?

I do, sir. I sent Colonel Harker to Danville with his brigade.

Question. Was your corps in the advance in the pursuit of the rebel army in its retreat from Camp Dick Robinson?

It was, sir.

Question. At what time did it march from Danville to take up that pursuit?

I cannot remember the day at this time.

Question. At what hour did your march commence?

It is impossible for me to recollect and state at what hour I marched. A number of blunders delayed one of my divisions. I am inclined to think I was ordered to march very early that morning. I now remember that a sister I had living in Danville was very anxious to have me stay all night at her house, and that I could not do it in consequence of the early hour at which we were to start next morning. That would induce me to believe that it was at an earlier hour than 6.

Question. Can you remember whether you had orders to march at 12 o'clock at night and can you be positive that General Wood's division did not march at that hour?

I cannot remember positively that I was ordered to march at 12 o'clock that night. I do remember that one of my divisions could not march at the hour designated in the order, and I think it was because the commissary had failed to furnish us with supplies.

Question. Can you remember, with reference to the hour appointed to march, at what time it was known that the rebel army was retreating to Camp Dick Robinson?

I cannot, sir; my best recollection is that I did not know myself when I marched that the rebel army was retreating to Camp Dick Robinson.

Question. State, if you please, general, as briefly as possible, the more important particulars of the pursuit as far as it was continued.

Very soon after leaving Danville we skirmished with the rebel cavalry continually, but nothing like a serious engagement. We had no difficulty in driving them along on the march till we reached Crab Orchard. There they made more resistance than at any previous point, so much so as to make it prudent, in my judgment, to send a brigade in advance to drive them along. On the march I heard pretty considerable firing over toward Lancaster, which was on my left, and which made us rather cautious in our approach to Crab Orchard, as there was a road running into that place from Lancaster. I suppose we were delayed only an hour or two at Crab Orchard, and from there on as far as the enemy were pursued by my troops—and they were in advance—we had no serious engagement. The nature of the country was such as to enable very few men with light guns, such as the cavalry had, always to impede our progress. In addition to other difficulties placed before us with their guns, and taking advantage of extraordinary passes through this broken country, they also obstructed our way by cutting down trees and gave us a good deal of work by tearing up the road. I went as far as Wild Cat with my command. I sent one brigade within 2 or 3 miles of London. I also sent a brigade from Wild Cat to Manchester, or the vicinity of Manchester, to destroy some salt works there, and where we scattered a considerable force and took some provisions and pursued them and took 200 head of very fine cattle. The country is barren, and we had some difficulty in keeping the animals from perishing for want of something to eat. The brigade had been sent from Wild Cat by a cross-road which runs from the road leading from Wild Cat to London to the road running from Richmond to London.

Question. Were there any side roads, or was the character of the country off the main roads such that movements could be made to intercept the enemy, or were you obliged to pursue the main roads which the enemy followed?

There is no road by which the enemy could be pursued except the main road, nor is there any road by which they could have been intercepted.

Question. After discontinuing the pursuit was your corps ordered to Glasgow and did it proceed to that point under my orders?

I was ordered there and I proceeded there.

Question. Can you state the date of your arrival there?

I cannot.

Question. From your knowledge of all the circumstances under which Kentucky was invaded by the rebel forces last summer what was your judgment and what is your judgment now as to the probability that that invasion was intended for the purpose of holding the State permanently and as to the presumption that that object was not to be abandoned without a serious struggle?

From the time I knew the magnitude of the force with which the rebels had invaded Kentucky I never doubted at all that they intended to hold the State if it could possibly be done and that they would fight for it. Perhaps it would be wrong to say I never doubted it, for when they began to retreat I thought perhaps that their hearts had failed; but my impression, certainly up to Perryville, was that they intended to fight; but when they commenced their retreat there I may have possibly thought differently (I do not remember precisely what I did think then), and when they passed Crab Orchard I thought they meant to abandon the State.

Question. When it was first discovered that the enemy had retired from his position at Perryville what was your impression as to the force he had had there, and was it your impression that his force was concentrated there or that only a small portion of it had made a stand there?

My impression was that his entire force was there, but I cannot say that I derived that impression from any information. The fact that they fought there satisfied me that he had concentrated his force there. I do not know that I had any information beyond that which induced me to believe his entire force was there.

Question. Do you consider that the supposition that he had concentrated his whole force and had fought there, and on the other hand the supposition that he made a stand there with only a small portion of his force, might make a very decided difference as to the object of his withdrawal from that point; in other words, while in one case it might indicate that he was retreating, might it not in the other case indicate that he was moving to complete his junction or concentrate for the purpose of battle?

Undoubtedly it would make a great difference in the inference which I should draw myself as to the object of his withdrawal; in the one case I should think he would consider himself unable to encounter our army, and in the other case I should think his object was to unite his whole force, and that he intended to fight or run as he might think best.

Question. With Bragg's army proper at Bardstown and Kirby Smith's forces at Lexington and other points in Central Kentucky, with the direct roads open from these points to any points on which the enemy might desire to retreat—for example, the turnpike from Bardstown through New Haven and Glasgow and so on to Middle Tennessee, the turnpike from Bardstown to Lebanon and thence on either directly to Glasgow or by way of Columbia, the road from Bardstown to Danville, thence to Somerset, or on toward Cumberland Gap, and for the other forces the roads from Central Kentucky by the way of Richmond on to Cumberland Gap—what to your mind would such movements indicate as took these separate forces entirely off these various routes for the purpose of concentrating them at or in the vicinity of an out-of-the-way place like Harrodsburg?

To my mind it would indicate certainly a resolution to fight.

Question. State, if you please, what your judgment is in regard to the state of discipline in the Army of the Ohio from first to last, and as to the care with which its discipline was watched over and preserved by its commander and his subordinate officers under his direction.

I think the Army of the Ohio, from my knowledge of it, has always been in a high state of discipline, and that the very greatest care was taken by its commander to preserve that discipline. He was very efficiently aided by very many of his officers; and I think the army has demonstrated its discipline, from Shiloh and Perryville down to Stone River, by the very highest sort of testimony to its efficiency.

Question. Does anything occur to you in connection with the condition of that army last summer in Middle Tennessee which was calculated to impair its discipline in spite of the best efforts of its high officers? Please state what now occurs to you on that subject.

There were several things, I think, calculated to impair the discipline of an army situated as that army was in Middle Tennessee. It was scattered very much, and in some divisions composing the army there was some dissatisfaction because they thought they were so isolated. They did not know how they were supported or to be supported in case of difficulty, and when the movement began some of the commands supposed they were retreating, which always impairs the discipline of an army. In addition to that we were living on half rations very often. There was a great deal of ripe fruit in the country through which we marched and the men would break ranks. There was great difficulty in keeping the men in the ranks. I know of nothing else. I think the discipline of the army was very much restored again as soon as it was concentrated and began to feel its strength and began to think they were to fight again and not to run.

Question. Is it or is it not your opinion that the tone of a considerable portion of the public press encouraged in the minds of the men the idea that they were more or less at liberty to make use of private property wherever they could find it, if they wished?

I think there was much in the tone of a portion of the press that encouraged that idea in the men. Undoubtedly, from some reason or other, many men seemed to have adopted that idea, and it was with great difficulty and after a considerable time that marauding could be stopped.

Question. Have you ever known any army or do you suppose it is possible to have an army in which there will not be more or less complaining and fault-finding and animosity toward the commander?

I have certainly never known such an army, and I do not believe there ever was such an army or ever will be, that is composed of men.

Question. Have you observed any instance of such animosity in the Army of the Ohio toward its late commander, myself, and have you in your own mind been able to explain it? Do you know of any marked instances of that kind that you can explain now?

I have known of some instances in which officers of the army complained of their late commander, and the explanation to my mind was—and I am not sure whether I did those officers injustice or not, but my explanation was that they were dissatisfied with the general because of some orders that were personally disagreeable to them. I supposed the dissatisfaction was temporary, because it grew out of such a cause as that. By this I do not mean to say that I have not heard officers complain of the general commanding or that I have not complained myself of some things, but I mean to say that as far as I know his general course as a commander was satisfactory to the army.

Question. I wish to submit to the witness General Orders, No. 13a, issued by me at Nashville a year ago, and ask him whether he recognizes that order as embodying the policy which I meant to pursue and did pursue, as far as my presence enabled me to enforce it, in the military operations of the army under my command.

I do not recognize the order, and I will state unhesitatingly that the whole time it was the commanding general's policy to carry out this order, and that he exerted himself, to my knowledge, to have it carried out when we were on the march, and that he exerted himself to have it carried out by frequent instructions and orders to his command.

Question. Do you see anything in that order or was it the practice under it to treat persons who were active in their opposition to the Government or violent and offensive in their language in the same manner as persons who were loyal to the Government?

There is nothing in the order requiring loyal and disloyal persons to be treated in the same way, nor was it the practice, to my knowledge, to treat disloyal and loyal persons in the same way.

Question. Do you consider that there was a time in Kentucky when the policy to be pursued by the army would have had a very material effect upon the sentiments of the people toward the Union?

I think so, undoubtedly.

Question. What, in your judgment, was the effect of the policy announced in that order; was it good or bad?

I think it was good.

Question. What, in your opinion, has been the effect of that policy everywhere wherever it has been faithfully executed, and what the effect of a policy which denied that the people had any rights, which deprived them of their liberties without some positive and individual offense against the authority of the Government, and impoverished them?

In my opinion the policy announced in that order is the true policy of the Government, and of course I think its effects must be good everywhere wherever it is carried out. The policy of depriving people of their rights and impoverishing them, depriving them of their liberties, arresting them without having committed positive offenses, I consider tyrannical and a bad policy, and that its effect must be bad among such a people as ours.

Commission adjourned to meet March 3.

CINCINNATI, Tuesday, March 3, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Examination of General CRITTENDEN continued.

By General BUELL:

Question. Have you any recollection of the visit which I paid to the camp of your division and other divisions near Pelham in the month of August last?

I remember your being at Pelham, and my division, General McCook's division, and General Schoepf's division were there; in the latter part of August I think it was.

Question. Did you, subsequent to that visit or about that time, hear any comments upon any particular incident connected with that visit? If so, please state what you heard and all you know about it, and particularly an incident connected with my visit to the division of which Brigadier-General Schoepf was at that time in command.

I remember being at General Schoepf's headquarters the day after General Buell's arrival at Pelham, which I think took place at night, if I remember correctly, and to have heard as I rode to General Schoepf's headquarters that he had been arrested.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Mr. President, before this question goes any further I think it would be proper for General Buell to state what he expects to prove by this line of examination that he is now entering upon.

General BUELL. I should like to inquire, Mr. President, by what right or upon what ground the judge-advocate requires me to explain the object of the evidence I introduce here any more than he should be required to explain the object of any question he may think proper to put. The explanation which he proposes I should be required to make might defeat the very object of the evidence itself. I can imagine no good reason for his objection.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. If I were to ask any question the answer to which traveled apparently outside of the issue or beyond the line of investigation called for by the Government and incumbent upon us to follow it would be proper for General Buell to ask me what I expected to prove by it. A great deal of time would be necessarily lost if we permitted the introduction of subjects, however interesting they might be, outside of what we are called upon to investigate. I cannot see myself the object of the question nor what the evidence has to do with the investigation under consideration.

General BUELL. I do not know that it is necessary that the judge-advocate should see what the tendency of this evidence may be. I think it is sufficient that the object is to defend myself before this Commission and before the country.

General SCHOEPP. Mr. President, here is a witness (General Crittenden) who was present, and if it is satisfactory to the Commission I will make a statement, which if correct—

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Mr. President, I would suggest respectfully to the members of the court that unless my objection is admitted to be in order a discussion upon it would be out of order. If my objection is in order then the court should be cleared for its consideration. If General Buell says that the answer, or what he anticipates will be the answer, would be defeated by stating the object for which he calls for it and that it is strictly within the line of investigation we are authorized to make, I have nothing more to say. The Commission will have to judge of that when they come to it on the record.

The PRESIDENT. I would like to call the general's attention to one point which I see involved in the question and on which I should like to hear the general's opinion. It appears that the question has reference to a member of the court. Now, if it is a question which involves misconduct of his, or involves him in anything the nature of which might hereafter be considered criminal, or which would affect his standing as a member of this court, charged like the rest of us with the investigation of the general's operations in the State of Tennessee and Kentucky, the general cannot but see that it would be but right that that member of the court should have an opportunity for a full explanation of the affair; and the making of that explanation might require the presence of witnesses, and it might require him in his own justification to go into a lengthened explanation by witnesses introduced before this Commission. As to the propriety of the question, therefore, I would like very much to hear the general's views.

General SCHOEPP. I would suggest that the explanation, which would only occupy two minutes, might be made to the court.

The PRESIDENT. Excuse me, general, the question which I propose for the general to speak to is whether a question involving the conduct of a member of this court, be it good or bad, could properly be considered as part of the issue pending before this Commission; and if in your opinion, general, it is properly a part of the issue, whether that would not require you to explain the purpose of your question and what is the particular fact which you seek from the witness.

General BUELL. It seems to me, sir, that the judge-advocate and the member of the Commission have both anticipated the answer. The question does not involve General Schoepf at all necessarily. General Schoepf is not mentioned in the question except as being the commander whose camp I visited near Pelham. I think, sir, that the objections are a little untimely. I will say further that I claim that it is my right to show to this Commission, though I am not coming to that point now, sir, that if any member of this Commission has disqualified himself by prejudice or by personal animosity to sit as an impartial judge upon this investigation, I claim the right to show that such a member would be incompetent to sit on this Commission. I do not say that I am coming to that point now, sir; but upon the other point I say that if any matter has been introduced in the course of this investigation which involves the conduct or opinions of any member of this Commission with reference to the exercise of my command, I have the right to introduce testimony to elucidate that matter fully.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. General Buell misapprehended me in the matter. Mr. President, I simply take the broad ground, which is my duty, to keep this investigation as closely as possible to the matter called for by the Government, and it was because I thought we were traveling out of that line that I asked for an explanation. The ground taken by yourself is strictly correct and I agree with your opinion; but I must say in this connection that if there is anything which disqualifies a member of this court from sitting as an impartial judge or juror this is not the proper tribunal to bring it before; it belongs entirely to another place; we could not take up our time in trying members of this court; but if these facts are in possession of General Buell the proper time to have urged them was when this court was being organized and not after the court has been sitting three months. Your objection, Mr. President, is properly taken and is tenable, but I did not introduce the argument, because I did not dream for an instant that exception would be taken to members of this Commission.

General BUELL. The judge-advocate is very right as to the proper time to make objection to competency of any members of this Commission under certain circumstances. If I had knowledge of facts that would have disqualified them it was proper for me to make objection at the time. I have not asserted that I have such knowledge now. If I have, it is my privilege, and it is due to justice, and I have no doubt the right will be accorded me, to establish the facts before this Commission.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I do not wish to prolong this discussion, Mr. President, but I would say that I still occupy the ground that I did. If the fact was not in possession of General Buell, but if the doubt was on his mind as to the propriety of any member sitting on this board, it should have been taken and discussed before this Commission at the time of its formation.

General TYLER. I move that the court be cleared.

The PRESIDENT. If this had been a court-martial or a court of inquiry I should have no right in the world to take exception to any individual members; but it is not a court-martial or court of inquiry, but a court of investigation. To show the distinction: General Buell is not charged with anything before this court; there is no charge, no specification. It is simply an investigation of general operations which certain officers of the Army are charged to make; and the point to which I would wish to call the general's attention is whether under the law or with propriety exception can be taken, either on the part of the Government or on the part of General Buell, to any member or members of this investigation.

General BUELL. This matter was not introduced by me, and I do not think it necessary to answer your inquiry negatively or affirmatively. When I come to that point then it will be time for you to give your decision upon it. I will make one remark in reference to any suspicion I might entertain. I will say that I should not object to any member sitting upon any court for the investigation of my conduct simply upon a prejudgment of his which might be rectified by the evidence. My presumption would be that all honorable men, in spite of slight prejudices or somewhat prejudiced conclusions, might in the end be able to do substantial justice, and therefore I should not object as a general thing to a member of this Commission, though I might know that he had expressed himself unfavorably. But I will say further that I was not apprised of that when this investigation commenced its sittings. I may have become apprised of it since, and I may say that I shall not fail to avail myself of that information,

On General SCHOEPP's requesting permission to make a personal explanation.

The PRESIDENT. I think it would be improper. The answer to the question has not distinctly involved you, and until it is fairly defined that you are involved in an act which may be called out by the answer I think it hardly necessary to make an explanation, and I think an explanation at this point would be immature.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would remark, Mr. President, that this discussion is entirely out of order.

General TYLER. I move that the court be cleared.

The court was cleared; when it was decided that the question should be answered.

The WITNESS. I think I inquired upon my arrival, either of General Schoepf or General Fry, for both were there before I left their quarters, whether General Schoepf had been arrested or was under arrest. I think General Schoepf himself told me that he had been arrested, but that he was released from arrest, and then the conversation which followed was in reference to the cause of the arrest. Both General Schoepf and General Fry participated in the conversation. I think they told me that General Buell had ridden through the lines and into camp without being challenged, and that he came up to their quarters (whether he came to General Schoepf's or General Fry's quarters I am not sure) very angry indeed, and complained of it as a piece of great carelessness on the part of the commanders that any one should be enabled to ride into headquarters without being challenged by a sentinel. I remember but little more of that conversation. The generals were both excited and I thought a little indignant at General Buell's anger and censure, and laughingly said they would make the sentinels or outposts arrest General Buell if he did not mind how he rode around the lines; that is the impression made on my mind by what they said. I think the general had not come on the road, but through a fence, and had got into the lines without being challenged. I thought it was a sort of indignation that would wear off. I have been as mad as that often myself with my commanding generals and it made no great impression on me. This is the only incident that I remember connected with General Buell's visit to General Schoepf's headquarters.

Question. Are you positive that it was asserted by any officer whom you heard converse upon this subject that I had ridden into camp by any by-road or across any field out of the usual route? If so, what officer made that assertion?

I cannot say that any officer made that assertion, nor am I absolutely positive that the assertion was made. My impression is and my recollection is that some one at that time mentioned it as a fact that General Buell had approached the camp, not by the road, but had gone through a field. I have not conversed with any one since on the subject. My impression is strong that I must have heard it, because I had no idea what road General Buell did approach by. Such a fact I think could not have got into my head unless I had heard it from some one. I cannot name the officer who made this statement nor can I be more positive than I have been.

Question. Has the supposition which you say you entertained at that time been realized, that the irritation caused by that incident would speedily pass away from the minds of those officers or not? You may answer with reference to General Fry.

Since that time I do not remember to have had any conversation with General Schoepf in reference to his arrest or to have had any conversation with him which would have induced me to think otherwise than that the irritation was temporary. With reference to General Fry my impression has been that he was subsequent to that time, perhaps a month subsequent, still unfriendly to General Buell; but whether that impression was formed from a conversation with General Fry, or from incidental remarks that I may have heard him make, or from having heard others say that General Fry was hostile to General Buell, I cannot now distinctly remember; nor can I state that the unfriendly feelings of General Fry for General Buell was in consequence of what occurred when General Buell visited his camp at Pelham, and therefore General Fry's irritation at Pelham may have been, as I supposed originally, only temporary.

Question. At what time did this visit to General Schoepf's camp take place? Was it in the day or night?

I understood it was at night, but I have no positive knowledge.

Question. On the march from Bowling Green to Louisville do you know of any proposition among any of the officers of the army having for its object the removal of General Buell from command? State anything that you know upon that subject, if you please, and all you know.

I think it was on the march between Bowling Green and Louisville—I am sure it occurred somewhere between Nashville and Louisville—an officer came to me stating that there was great dissatisfaction in his command; the officers and men were unwilling to fight under General Buell. He came to talk with me on the subject because I was an officer of high rank and a Kentuckian, and he thought I ought to take some part in it; he thought something ought to be done. I replied to him that I had entire confidence in General Buell; that there was no dissatisfaction in my command that I knew anything about, and asked him what he proposed to do. I think he said that we ought to arrest General Buell. I told him that I did not want him to talk to me any more upon that subject. I have not named the officer, but can do so if necessary.

Question. I will thank you to name the officer, and state to whose brigade and whose division he belonged.

Col. John M. Harlan, of Kentucky, was the officer. I think he belonged to General Thomas' division, but I cannot state to what brigade he belonged.

Question. Did Colonel Harlan give you any explanation of the dissatisfaction which he said existed in the part of the army he was serving in, or could you from what he said, or from any other fact, trace the cause of that dissatisfaction and of his discontent in particular?

I think I have stated almost entirely the conversation which I had with Colonel Harlan. He did not give me any explanation of the causes for dissatisfaction nor did I believe that there was any dissatisfaction. I thought that I could trace Colonel Harlan's own dissatisfaction with General Buell to an order which General Buell had published censuring to some extent a portion of Colonel Harlan's regiment that had been on detached service somewhere in Alabama or the southern part of Tennessee, I am not sure where now, and I believed that Colonel Harlan had mistaken his own irritation at having any portion of his command censured for the general dissatisfaction in the command. I scarcely thought that Colonel Harlan could be serious in his proposition to me. I know that he felt very sore under the order to which I refer from a conversation he had with me on the subject not long after the occurrence.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that the proposition you allude to for my removal from command ever came to my knowledge while I was in command of the army?

None in the world, nor any reason to believe that the proposition ever came to any one else's ears than my own. I should have deemed it my duty to have apprised the commanding general at once if I had supposed that there was any conspiracy among officers, or if I had not supposed it was a proposition made by a single officer, who was irritated and not in the exercise of his own best judgment at the time, and if I had not believed the conversation with him would be the end of it.

Question. Can you remember whether Colonel Harlan belonged to the brigade which General Fry commanded at that time and do you know anything of the personal relations between those officers?

I am inclined to think that Colonel Harlan did belong to General Fry's brigade. I am quite sure that their personal relations were very friendly.

Cross-examination by the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. At what date did you move your division from Baldwyn, Miss., and when did you arrive at Athens?

I was not at Baldwyn. I think it was from the 12th to the 15th of June, as I now remember, that I marched from near Baldwyn to Iuka and thence to Athens. I cannot be positive as to the day I reached Athens, but it was in the latter part of June.

Question. How long had McCook's division been at Athens when you arrived and do you know when he left the vicinity of Corinth?

General McCook's division reached Iuka about the same time that I reached there and preceded me on the march to Athens. We crossed the Tennessee River at Florence together, he preceding me one day. Whether General McCook preceded me to Athens or not I am not positive. I know that he marched in advance of me to Huntsville and as far as Stevenson, but cannot now remember positively whether I left Florence in front of General McCook's command. General McCook I think must have left the vicinity of Corinth about the 15th to the 17th of June, and I believe that he could march from Corinth to Iuka in a day, and my recollection is that he did make that march.

Question. You say you arrived at Stevenson on the 12th of July. How far is Stevenson from Chattanooga?

I should say it is about 40 miles. I do not know the distance by any road.

Question. What is the distance from Baldwyn to Stevenson and how many days were you on the route and what did your march average per day?

I think it is about 180 to 200 miles from Baldwyn to Stevenson. I do not remember how many days I was marching. I do not now remember how many days I halted on the march. Whenever I did march my recollection is that my march would average from 12 to 15 miles. I was halted several times on the march; I had to stop at Iuka. I do not know how many days I was detained for supplies and turning over a number of things, such as overcoats and camp equipage; things we did not want on the march. I do not remember how many days we lost at Tusculumbia in crossing the Tennessee River; we had to make a road there; nor do I remember how long I was delayed at Athens waiting for supplies. It would be impossible for me to say how many days I was marching unless I had access to my papers.

Question. You can state, general, whether that march was pushed with vigor, no time lost, as if you had some object in view, or whether it was delayed and what was the cause of the delay.

So far as my own command is concerned I have no recollection of any delay. My halts were all made for specific purposes, and when they were accomplished, when I had got supplies and when we had made the road ready at the river and we crossed the river and marched, my recollection is that we marched direct to Athens, where I was delayed for want of supplies. I made no halt afterward except one day at Huntsville, waiting again for supplies, until I reached Battle Creek.

Question. On your arrival at Stevenson, on the 12th of July, where were the other divisions of the Army of the Ohio?

I found General McCook's division near Stevenson, and we left a division (I think General Mitchell's) at Huntsville, under the command of General Smith. I believe General Nelson's division was at Athens when I passed through. I do not remember where General Wood's division was; I think he was repairing a railroad, but I do not know exactly where, and there was a brigade at Battle Creek.

Question. Were not Athens and Battle Creek about the poorest places for supplies you encountered?

Battle Creek certainly was one of the poorest of places, and I remember having a great deal of difficulty at Athens about forage. On the march there were places which were worse for supplies. The road from Huntsville to Stevenson is a very bad one for supplies, and it was a very barren, mountainous country at the beginning of the march, shortly after we left Iuka, I think.

Question. When you were living on half rations at Battle Creek what exertions were made and how to obtain supplies from the country?

We sent out parties regularly for forage and driving cattle. We hired the Tennessee refugees that came into camp to go out and drive in cattle and haul in forage. I cannot remember precisely what extent of country, but we sent as far as we deemed it safe. At one time we sent back to Stevenson and out upon the Stevenson road and had forage hauled to the road; that would be some 25 to 30 miles in that direction. Up the Sequatchie Valley we could not send very far.

Question. How far on each side of your line of march from Huntsville to Battle Creek did you draw supplies of forage and provisions from ?

We got no supplies on the road from Huntsville to Battle Creek except those that were sent to us by railroad. We were short of supplies when we started, and obtained them on the road at the point to which they had been sent from Huntsville. The supplies which we got on the march from Huntsville to Battle Creek we gathered in the immediate vicinity. We did not delay at all. We had no time to send any distance; we gathered what we could.

Question. What was the amount of your train on the march from Baldwin to Huntsville ?

I cannot say.

Question. General, what force had the enemy opposite you at Battle Creek and at Stevenson, as you estimate it ?

We were never able to ascertain in any reliable way what force they had there. We could infer only from the names of officers who sent notes and dispatches that were sometimes brought into our camp across the river that there was some considerable force there, a brigade we supposed, as General Heth was there at one time; he signed himself as in command. I never saw 200 men there. Some distance back from the river they were encamped and entirely covered by woods. Their pickets were in view every day, and sometimes held conversations across the river when there was no one there to stop it.

Question. What force was there at Chattanooga at the time you arrived at Battle Creek ?

My instructions were, and I considered it an important part of my business, to try to ascertain what force was really at Chattanooga. It was a considerable time before we got any sort of information that we deemed reliable. The men that I used as spies were not capable, at least many of them, of estimating a large force. My own idea as to the only way of ascertaining the number of men was to ascertain what officers were there. Upon my arrival at that place I really did not know anything at all about the force at Chattanooga, except the common rumor that there was a "considerable force" there.

Question. From your knowledge of the officers there and from reports of your scouts what did you make the number to have been ?

I can only state now what my impression is. I cannot fix the date at which I received the information, but I suppose when I reached Battle Creek there were about 8,000 to 10,000 troops at Chattanooga.

Question. You state that General McCook's, General Nelson's, General Wood's, and your own division made the first movement toward North Alabama, and that General Thomas afterward came up. What do you estimate the strength of these divisions at ?

My estimate of our force at that time was about 30,000 men.

Question. Was General Mitchel's division also in North Alabama and what was its strength and did this form a part of the Army of the Ohio ?

General Mitchel's division was at Huntsville when I passed through, so I understood. I also understood that it did form part of the Army of the Ohio. I never was with General Mitchel's division, and had no opportunity of knowing anything personally as to its strength. I supposed it was about equal to the other divisions.

Question. You said the distance from Stevenson to Chattanooga was 40 miles. How many days' provisions would have been necessary to have made a dash at Chattanooga ?

That would depend upon so many contingencies that I scarcely know how to answer. To have marched to Chattanooga with no opposition and with forced marches it might have been done in two days, but to have marched there and encountered such obstacles as an enemy could have interposed in that country I think it would not have been prudent to start with less than eight or ten days' provisions, and unless we were quite sure of succeeding when we got there it would be unsafe with that.

Question. Was not a movement on Chattanooga with ten days' subsistence as practicable as Bragg's movement across the Tennessee with ten days' and only three wagons to a brigade?

I think that Bragg's movement was a very extraordinary one certainly, and that the other movement would have been a very extraordinary one. As far as I understand the movement, I think that Bragg's was more feasible than the movement on Chattanooga with eight or ten days' supplies. Bragg had a railroad behind him. Bragg knew that he could avoid the enemy. Bragg had a people who sympathized with him very much through whose country he was to march, and I suppose he had an accurate knowledge, for I suppose that he obtained all such information possible of all our forces and our strength.

Question. State what reasons you have, general, for saying that Bragg knew he could avoid the enemy.

I suppose that Bragg knew the position of our forces and that he knew he could avoid us. Bragg having his troops concentrated and ready to move could by keeping his own counsel start just when he pleased. He knew that we could not or would not attempt to intercept him without concentrating our forces, and I think it was not possible for us to have concentrated our forces so as to intercept him.

Question. Was there not time between the knowledge of the fact of his crossing the Tennessee and his arrival at Sparta to have concentrated our forces?

I think it is possible that our forces might have been concentrated at Sparta before General Bragg reached there. I am not sure of that, but think it is possible; still I do not think that would necessarily have intercepted General Bragg.

Question. How could he have avoided our army concentrated at Sparta?

He might have kept still farther to the east and have avoided it, or he might have attempted to come west and avoid it.

Question. Had he turned to the east would it not have thrown him upon a line of country in which he would have found great difficulties to subsist his army, and had he turned west would it not have brought it to the front of Nashville instead of to its rear?

I do not know the nature of the country into which he would have been thrown by going farther east. He might have obtained supplies by the road from Chattanooga to Knoxville had he gone far enough, and if he had turned to the west I suppose he would have been tempted to go to Murfreesborough ahead of us. He might have got to Nashville by that route.

Question. Is it not now well known that all the rebel troops that could be spared were in demand at Richmond for the struggle with McClellan during that summer and that very few troops could be spared at the Southwest?

Question objected to by General Buell.

General BUELL. Mr. President, if it gives the witness the privilege of speaking from report it cannot be known as a matter of notoriety. If the witness is expected to speak from his own knowledge, very well. I will give a reason why the question cannot be answered. I can cite an example where the rebel troops were at a point where they were not absolutely necessary. For example, the expedition of Breckinridge's division against Baton Rouge. That was not an expedition of such vital importance that those troops could not have been spared for other points where the presence of an additional force was of vital consequence.

General SCHOEPP. As I understand, General Buell objects to the question so that he may answer it himself.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would remark that so far as any historical fact is concerned we are entitled to use it as we would any other fact. The struggle between McClellan and the rebel army at Richmond last summer is history, and we may introduce it in illustration of any fact that may come before this court. I apprehend that General Buell will not persist in his objection when he comes to think of it; it certainly is not tenable. So far as the illustration goes it is entirely out of the line of argument.

General BUELL. The question would require a distinct answer, yes, or no. It did not require that the witness should travel out of the path to explain his opinion—if he had that opinion—that all the forces at the service of the rebel Government were required and actually were in front of Richmond to stop the advance of McClellan's army. I had no idea of suggesting anything to the mind of the witness, and I do not think I did suggest anything that he could have been expected to state in answer to the question.

(The recorder is in doubt whether the foregoing remark of General Buell, marked in the margin, is fully reported.)

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Before General Buell goes I would remark that where a fact is notoriously a fact you can draw your conclusions from it, and it is proper for a witness to do so. For example, recollecting the terrible struggle we were engaged in in the front of Richmond, was it not reasonable to suppose and do you not believe that all the troops were drawn from the Southwest in order to support the rebel Government at Richmond?

General BUELL. For my own part I can answer that it is not a matter of notoriety that all the troops that could possibly be spared were sent to Richmond to support the rebel army. There was a sufficiency of rebel troops there to accomplish their object. Whether they had there all they could collect I do not know, or whether they could not have spared some of their troops for other purposes I do not know.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the question should be put.

On the opening of the court General Crittenden replied as follows:

No, sir; I do not think it is well known.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Do you understand that to be the fact?

I do not. I understand that a great struggle was going on there, and that the Confederate Government were using every means possible to maintain themselves there. I also understand at the same time they were struggling with equal pertinacity and assiduity to maintain themselves everywhere else where they had armies.

Question. With the army numbering over 30,000 men at the time there were but 10,000 at Chattanooga you say a movement on that place was not practicable?

I have not made that statement. A movement on Chattanooga with our army, which numbered 30,000 men at the time that there were as I supposed not more than 10,000 men at Chattanooga, would not be practicable at all with ten day's rations. At that time our army was scattered over a considerable extent of country. Portions of it could not have reached Chattanooga in less than six or seven days, I should think. That is my understanding of the position of the army at that time. Had the army of 30,000 men been within 40 miles of Chattanooga while there were but 10,000 men in Chattanooga I should think the enterprise could have been carried out, notwithstanding all the difficulties, and that Chattanooga could have been taken.

Question. Were there any other reasons than a lack of supplies which prevented the concentration of the army there in time to bring about that result?

I know of no reason which delayed the concentration of the army except the want of supplies, which was occasioned by the breaks in the railroads and some work that some portions of the army were required to do in repairing railroads; but had the army been concentrated at Stevenson I am very far from supposing that a much larger force would not have been thrown into Chattanooga by the rebels at an earlier day.

Question. You stated in your examination-in-chief that you considered it would have been unsafe to go to Chattanooga if there had been nobody there to resist. Please give your reasons, general.

I would have considered it unsafe to march with the command which we had at Battle Creek to Chattanooga if there had been no enemy there to oppose us, because we were cut off from our source of supplies and could not have expected to find supplies at Chattanooga. We should have been compelled to go back for supplies, and would have incurred some risk in passing through that country from even small parties of guerrillas. We might have lost some transportation and could have accomplished nothing.

Question. You say the country across the mountains from Chattanooga was very destitute of provisions. Was the Sequatchie Valley, the route Bragg's army took, also destitute; and, if not, did it not make it almost sure that Bragg would come out at Pikeville or Sparta?

The Sequatchie Valley, I understand, was not destitute of provisions or supplies. I saw only a portion of it. I was not far up the Sequatchie Valley; as far as I did go it is a narrow valley and not very much cultivated nor very abundant in its supplies. I cannot say that I considered it certain at all that General Bragg would come out at Pikeville or Sparta. To tell the truth I was not sure that he would not come down the Sequatchie Valley in pursuit of McCook and myself.

Question. At McMinnville had not the Army of the Ohio its subsistence assured by railroad communication; and could it, with McMinnville as a base, supply itself at or near Sparta had it been concentrated there, the distance being only about 25 miles?

The Army of the Ohio concentrated at McMinnville had its supplies quite secure, but with its supplies at McMinnville and the Army of the Ohio at Sparta I should have considered its depot of supplies as very insecure.

Question. Will you give your reasons, general?

If General Bragg, on the road from Chattanooga to Sparta or McMinnville, were at liberty to take what road he pleased, and with such a force of cavalry as he had with him, it might have been possible for General Bragg to reach McMinnville before the army at Sparta could come back to defend its supplies.

Question. Do you not know that General Bragg's army arrived at Sparta very much demoralized from exhaustion from that march up the Sequatchie Valley?

I do not, sir; I understood that General Bragg's army suffered a great deal throughout that march; I do not remember to have heard that they were very much demoralized at that place.

Question. If his army suffered in that march up the Sequatchie Valley what would have been its condition if it had attempted to cross the mountains by any of those roads which you characterized as being destitute of provisions and I believe also of water?

If the Sequatchie Valley is a very rich valley he could not have suffered much coming up. If he had crossed the mountains he would have suffered the same hardships, I suppose, and encountered the same difficulties that we encountered.

Question. How long a time after the 20th of August, the date you gave Bragg to have crossed the Tennessee River at Chattanooga, would it have required to concentrate the Army of the Ohio at or near McMinnville?

I do not know precisely where the various portions of the army were at that time, but in seven or eight days, I suppose, if they had all supplies and had been ready to march, the entire army might have been concentrated there. This opinion is, of course, a mere guess as to the time it would have required. I do not know where the different portions of the army were precisely, nor the distance from McMinnville to these various points, nor the roads by which the different portions of the army would have been compelled to march; but in six or eight days, if everything had been ready, I suppose they might have been concentrated.

Question. Can you state what the Army of the Ohio was doing between the 12th day of July, when you arrived at Battle Creek, and the 20th of August, when Bragg crossed the Tennessee River at Chattanooga?

I do not think I arrived at Battle Creek till the 13th. My impression is I arrived at Stevenson on the 12th and at Battle Creek on the 13th. I can only state what that portion of the army I was with was actually doing, and that I have already stated. I know that a portion of the army was at Murfreesborough, where a battle had been fought. General Nelson was sent there. The roads were broken, and I know General Smith was sent—I think to Tullahoma; I do not know with what forces. Most of that time General Mitchel's division was at Huntsville, and I believe General Buell's headquarters were there until near that time, or from the 12th of July until about the 20th of August. It was somewhere about that time he changed his headquarters. A portion of the army was during that period of time at McMinnville. General Thomas and General Wood were there I think; that is my best recollection; but what they were all doing I cannot state, sir. They had to march some distance to get to these different points.

Question. Do you know that the Therman road was practicable for baggage wagons and artillery trains for a large army?

I have no personal knowledge of the Therman road. I only know from the fact that was brought out during my examination here that an army did pass over that road.

The Commission adjourned to meet March 4, 1863, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CINCINNATI, Wednesday, March 4, 1863.

The Commission met pursuant to adjournment. All the members present; also the judge-advocate and General Buell.

Cross-examination of General CRITTENDEN continued.

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Question. You say in your examination-in-chief that if the Army of the Ohio had been massed at Sparta it would have been practicable for Bragg's army to have marched on McMinnville without its movements being known; please explain how and by what routes this movement could have been made in the face of the Army of the Ohio.

My idea of the manner in which it would have been possible for Bragg's army to have reached McMinnville with the Army of the Ohio concentrated at Sparta, and before the army could have known certainly what direction Bragg's army was taking, would be in a movement somewhere about Spencer, where I understand there was a road running to Sparta and a road running to McMinnville. I do not see such a road upon that map, but my recollection is that there is a road from Spencer to McMinnville and a road from Spencer to Sparta; so that it would have been possible even for Bragg's army starting from Pikeville to have deceived the army at Sparta as to its destination until it substantially reached McMinnville. I think that armies of any considerable force, while lying near together, by feints and demonstrations may almost always deceive the opposing general as to their movements or at least leave him in a state of great uncertainty.

Question. Are you acquainted, general, with the stream Caney Fork? If so, please state to the Commission the character of that stream.

I have no personal knowledge of the stream at all. I have never seen it.

Question. Have you ever seen any reports in reference to it and the character of the country about it that would justify you in stating to the Commission what it amounts to?

I do not think I have, sir. I have heard only general opinions with reference to the stream itself; I have heard that it was a difficult stream to cross.

Question. You say supplies were plenty at Lebanon; suppose the Army of the Ohio had been massed at that point before or after Bragg passed Sparta, would it not have been in a position to oppose his advance into Kentucky or his farther advance into Tennessee?

If the Army of the Ohio had been massed at Lebanon I should have considered that it made it a more hazardous thing for General Bragg to attempt the passage of the Cumberland River where he did actually cross than if the Army of the Ohio had been massed at Nashville; but I am inclined to think, without any accurate knowledge of the distances, that General Bragg could still have crossed the river, and I should have considered the Army of the Ohio in a worse place at Lebanon than at Nashville for any future operations.

Question. Supposing General Bragg's army to have numbered 35,000 or 40,000 men and subsisting on the country through which they marched, was it possible for him to move upon one road; and if the Army of the Ohio had been massed at Lebanon would he have been forced to concentrate his forces so as to meet us?

I have not a sufficient knowledge of the country to know whether General Bragg could have marched his army and have subsisted on one road. I am inclined to think he would have been compelled to have arranged for such a march beforehand, if the country had sufficient supplies and with the large cavalry force he had. The people sympathized with him and would bring him over supplies. I suppose it would be possible, marching rapidly as he did, to subsist his army through that country. With such an arrangement as that I think he would not necessarily have been compelled to mass his forces for the purpose of fighting at Lebanon. I think it was practicable for him to have passed the Cumberland.

Question. Are you sufficiently acquainted with the details of the army and the exigencies of the service at the time as to be able to tell the Commission why out of an army of 62,481 men 50,000 could not have been massed at some point in Tennessee to have opposed the advance of an army of 35,000 or 40,000?

The knowledge I had of the Army of the Ohio at that time has been pretty well shown in my examination here by my estimate of the strength of the divisions. In my statement as to the divisions which compose the army I did not include General Morgan's force. My acquaintance with the details of the service would enable me to account for a very considerable difference between the effective force of an army in the field and the returns. General Rosecrans told me the other day that he had more men absent from his army than he had present on duty—some 40,000 men on duty and some 50,000 men absent. The only reason that I could assign, from my knowledge of the facts and my impression of the strength of the army, why 50,000 men could not have been concentrated was that there was no such force there in the Army of the Ohio.

Question. What was the force concentrated at Nashville at the time General Buell fell back toward Bowling Green?

I do not know what force General Negley had, who was I think in Nashville at the time of General Buell's arrival there, nor do I know what other forces had come into Nashville; some I think came in from Columbia. I cannot say to what extent the strength of the army was increased. My estimate of the force with which we marched to Nashville was about 30,000 men; but the strength that we acquired in Nashville I did not learn; I passed directly through Nashville.

Question. You state that General Negley crossed the mountains from Chattanooga to Altamont and Winchester. You are probably aware that General Negley commanded only a brigade and marched in a season when water was plenty. Is it your opinion that Bragg could have marched his army by that route in September?

I stated I think that I understood General Negley passed over that road. I have no knowledge of the fact. I ought to have so stated; whether I did or not I cannot say. I have no knowledge of the road, and only infer it is a practicable road for an army from the fact—assuming it to be a fact—that an army had actually passed over the road. It would make a great difference in going over a mountainous country whether water was scarce or abundant. I did not know the strength of General Negley's command, whether it was a brigade or a division. I supposed that General Bragg could have marched his army over that road, as a brigade had passed over it, because I crossed the mountains in the latter part of August with two divisions, when there was no water on the mountains, literally none for animals. I also had an additional reason for inferring that that was a practicable road from the fact that I knew General Buell had ordered General McCook up the Sequatchie Valley to that road, and my impression was that his object in sending General McCook there was that he might watch that road and hinder Bragg if possible from taking it.

Question. Do you recollect, general, what estimate General McCook placed upon the rebel force after the Army of the Ohio left Nashville and whether he did not fix the number at 25,000 or 30,000?

I do not remember, sir, hearing General McCook make any estimate.

Question. Did you not hear General McCook say in Bowling Green that there were but 25,000 or 30,000 ragged rascals there and that we ought to go and whip them?

I cannot remember hearing General McCook make such an assertion.

Question. Was not the Army of the Ohio exceedingly demoralized after it left Nashville, and was not that in a great measure in consequence of a general feeling of disappointment at not having been permitted to meet the enemy?

I think the morale of the army was very much improved after reaching Nashville—in truth, after reaching Murfreesborough. I think the army generally expected that they were going to battle on their march into Kentucky; therefore, of course, they were not demoralized, because they were going to fight.

Question. Were not the straggling and desertion almost without a parallel in the Army of the Ohio in that march from Nashville to Louisville?

There was considerable straggling and desertion; I suppose desertion is the proper term, though the men who left merely absented themselves without leave and as a general thing came back. There were a number of Kentucky regiments who passed near to their homes on that march, and I ascribe most of these desertions to that cause. I think the desertions were more than paralleled at Louisville after the junction of the two armies.

Question. Did not the Army of the Ohio lose from 8,000 to 10,000 men from desertion alone in that march and at Louisville?

I cannot say what the loss of the Army of the Ohio was from that cause.

Question. Is not that loss taken into account in the statement General Rosecrans made to you?

General Rosecrans gave me no particulars at all. I presume that every loss was included, from every cause, in his statement.

Question. What measures were ordered by the commander of the Army of the Ohio to put a stop to the men straggling or deserting from their regiments prior to the battle of Perryville and what did you do in your division to arrest desertion?

We had frequent orders. I cannot remember precisely what the orders were, but straggling or desertions of that kind seemed to provoke the general commanding more than anything else. Orders were again and again issued and rear guards were established and commanders were held responsible for their men. There was no particular measure that I adopted, that I remember now, except that I kept a rear guard to bring up stragglers and notified my subordinate officers that I would hold them accountable for their men—that they must keep them in their ranks. I am not positive, but I think we had to each regiment a rear guard to keep the men in their ranks. Many of the commanders adopted the rule to make the colonel commanding ride in the rear of his regiment to see that the men did not straggle. I am not sure that the general commanding did not issue an order to that effect, though I will not be positive about it.

Question. You say the army concentrated at Louisville could not have resisted Bragg with the Army of the Ohio for its support and on the heels of Bragg; was there ever any danger that Bragg would attack Louisville?

I think there was the greatest danger that Bragg would attack Louisville. All the information that I received on the march from Bowling Green to Louisville certainly indicated that the people at Louisville and the officers anticipated an attack upon the city by Bragg. General Nelson I know felt the greatest apprehension, and I have no doubt at all that General Bragg could have reached Louisville and have taken it before General Buell got there. The information which I also received was that Kirby Smith had united his forces with Bragg's at Bardstown, which made it of course still more practicable for Bragg to have taken Louisville.

Question. What time did you learn that Kirby Smith had not joined General Bragg at Bardstown?

I cannot remember when I first learned that Kirby Smith had not joined General Bragg at Bardstown.

Question. What was the strength of the Army of the Ohio when it moved from Louisville on Bardstown?

I do not know certainly the strength of the Army of the Ohio at that time. My own command I suppose was about 25,000 men; that was diminished considerably by desertion, but I do not know to what extent. I suppose the other corps of the army, and there were two of them, were about as strong as mine. I knew nothing about them, however.

Question. What reason did General Buell give you at Bardstown that Bragg must make a stand at Perryville?

I am not sure that General Buell gave me any answer at all. I am rather inclined to the opinion that I was present at a conversation between General Buell and General Thomas, in which General Buell suggested that Bragg must make a stand there and that Perryville was a point at which he might make a stand; and my impression is that he also suggested in that conversation that it was possible for Kirby Smith to unite his forces with Bragg at Perryville. My recollection of this conversation is somewhat vague. It was a hurried conversation. I was but a few moments in the room, and marched directly afterwards. I should never probably have remembered it but that a fight did actually take place at Perryville.

Question. Is it not your opinion that Bragg anticipated a junction at Perryville with Kirby Smith, and not finding him there was forced to check the Army of the Ohio until he could form such a junction?

I have no reason to suppose that Bragg expected a junction with Kirby Smith at Perryville any more than at any other point where they were likely to come together, and I really do not know why Bragg fought at Perryville, with Kirby Smith so near him, unless he thought it was the best way to check the pursuit of the Army of the Ohio by a violent attack and then retreat to Kirby Smith.

Question. Did General Buell when you left Springfield designate the place you were to encamp at that night?

It is my impression that he did, sir. I do not remember precisely whether General Buell gave me the order or whether I got it from General Thomas. I know I expected to encamp at Haysville, and was astonished when we turned from the road at Haysville and went to Salt River.

Question. Please look at the instructions of October 7, given to General Thomas, and tell the Commission whether those instructions were literally carried out; if not, please state the particulars in which they were not carried out.

Those instructions were not literally carried out. We were ordered by the instructions to march precisely at 3 o'clock on the morning of the 8th without fail. We did not march till 7 o'clock with the First Division, at 9 o'clock with the Second, and 11 o'clock with the Third Division, because, as I have stated I believe, the command was all night almost getting into camp, at least a portion of it, the rear division. This order was not received by me, and I knew nothing of its existence till very near the time named for marching, 3 o'clock in the morning. I believe these instructions in other respects were literally carried out, except that I do not think General Thomas reported in person on the morning of the 8th at General Buell's headquarters; of that I can't be positive, but my recollection is that he was with me or in my sight until late in the day or night.

Question. These instructions were issued at 7 p. m. At what time ought they to have reached you?

I cannot state, for I do not know where General Buell was when those instructions were written. I do not know the distance from his headquarters to our camp. I last saw General Buell on the road from Springfield to Perryville, at the fork in the road where we turn off to go to Louisville. At that point General Buell would perhaps be 8 or 10 miles from Haysville, which would make it 13 or 14 miles that the order would have to come, and if the order came from that point it would not probably take more than two or two and a half hours, and if from near Perryville not more than two hours.

Question. At what time in the morning of the 8th of October was your corps in line of battle near Perryville?

My First Division I think was in line of battle between 10 and 11 o'clock, from 12 to 1 the Second Division got into line of battle, and somewhere between 3 and 4 o'clock I think the entire corps was in line of battle. I cannot be positive, but that is my best impression. Certainly between 9 and not later than 4 o'clock my divisions all got into line of battle.

Question. State, as near as you can recollect, at what hour General Gilbert's corps was in line of battle.

I cannot state when General Gilbert was in line of battle. I did not see his corps at all during the day.

Question. You will please inform the Commission the direction of your line of battle at that time with reference to General Gilbert and Perryville?

My corps was in line of battle and at right angles with the road by which we marched, the road leading from Haysville to Perryville, with Perryville directly in front, perhaps $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 miles distant. General Gilbert was on my left, and I understand General McCook was on the left of General Gilbert.

Question. By whose orders, general, was your line of battle formed, and did it make part of the general plan?

I do not certainly remember whether I got my instructions from General Thomas on the field or from General Buell. I supposed of course it was a part of the general plan, though my instructions only required me to ascertain where General Gilbert's right was and to form my line so that my left should join Gilbert's right.

Question. Were not your forces suffering for want of water, then guarded by the enemy, and how long could you have stood in line of battle without making the attack for the purpose of relieving them?

My own forces had an abundant supply of water the night before. They had been ordered to supply themselves and fill their canteens. I do not think my own forces suffered particularly for want of water that day. I do not know how long we could have staid there without water; not a great while certainly.

Question. At the time General Gilbert notified you by order of General Buell that a reconnaissance was about to be made that might bring on a general engagement, as General Thomas was present and in command, how do you account for this order being sent to you?

Orders were frequently addressed either to General Thomas or to myself, frequently to both. I do not know why General Gilbert sent this to me. Possibly it was sent to me because an aide-de-camp of mine was there, and it might have come with an orderly of my own who accompanied this aide. However, I suppose General Gilbert would not have considered it material at all whether he directed the order to General Thomas or to me. General Thomas saw the order as soon as I read it.

Question. How do you account for General Gilbert's note dated 4 o'clock, when a severe action with McCook's corps was commenced and in progress, and Gilbert's the supporting corps, in which he stated that his "children were all quiet and by sunset he would have them all in bed, nicely tucked up, as we used to do at Corinth"?

General BUELL. Mr. President, I object to that question in its present form; it hardly does justice to General Gilbert. His corps was scarcely a supporting corps, unless it was specially so directed in an emergency. Like the other corps it had its proper position in line, but it was not in any proper sense a supporting corps.

The WITNESS. I accounted for it then as I account for it now, by supposing that General Gilbert did not know the serious battle that was going on any more than I did myself. I inferred from his note at the time that there was nothing more than a skirmish going on.

Question. Have you read General Gilbert's report of that battle and do you find the knowledge exhibited in that report in accordance with this note addressed to you?

I think I have read General Gilbert's report, but I do not remember it so as to be able to answer the question, nor am I positive that I have read his report; only I must have read it, because I always take a deep interest in such things and generally read all the reports.

Question. On what was your opinion predicated, as stated to General Thomas, that "at last we had the rebels, and that they could not possibly get away"?

It was predicated upon the idea that they were in Perryville and that our army was there too. I made that remark after I learned that our army was there and in line of battle, and I believed that we would destroy them if they undertook to fly and that we would whip them if they fought. I thought that we had got too near to them for them to run with any safety and that they must fight.

Question. You call the battle of Perryville a partial engagement; how many were killed and wounded there; do you recollect?

I do not remember that I called it a partial engagement. It might be called a partial engagement, as all the forces were not engaged. I do not remember the exact number killed and wounded. It was a very severe battle. My recollection is that General Rousseau in his report states that he lost from his own command some 1,800 killed and wounded. I will not be positive about that, but that is my recollection. I do not remember the entire number lost in killed and wounded.

Question. Were not 819 killed and between 3,000 and 4,000 wounded?

I cannot answer the question. My recollection is not certain as to that. I know it was a very severe battle and a bloody one, and I suppose it is about that number that were killed and wounded.

Question. You say that in a line of battle extending some 5 or 6 miles it is not strange that a partial engagement should take place without involving the whole army; is it not, however, remarkable that such an engagement, resulting in the death of over 900 men, in the wounding of more than 3,000, and the loss of very many valuable officers, occurring within $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of headquarters, connected by the signal corps, without the knowledge of the general commanding till it was all over?

General BUELL. I object to the question, Mr. President. The question does not state the facts. The facts are not such as the question assumes. I did have knowledge of the battle before it was all over, and if the evidence does not show it already it will show that I adopted measures with reference to it. How great the loss may have been up to that time I am not able to say and it is hardly possible to ascertain.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. I would simply remark that General Buell assumes, and this is not the first instance of the kind, that the question makes the evidence; in no case does it do so. It is for the witness in his answer to say whether it is so or not. I think the objection is not well taken.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the question should be put.

On the opening of the court General Crittenden proceeded as follows:

Certainly, if these things were so, I should consider it very remarkable.

Question. You say you heard more furious cannonading than at Perryville before Corinth in an artillery duel; was such fighting without the knowledge of the general in command there?

I do not know whether the general commanding had knowledge of the fighting or not. At Corinth, however, I should infer that he did. We heard the cannonading there from one end of the line to the other. I do not know where the general's headquarters were, but I presume he could hear the cannonading, though I have no knowledge of the fact.

Question. Did you ever know of one corps being warmly engaged, severely punished, and eventually driven back, while another corps stood calmly by looking on and rendering no assistance?

General BUELL. Mr. President, I certainly must object to this manner of examination. It is not fair, sir. It is more fair to me than it is to others who are involved in this investigation. The question insinuates something which is not true. It is not true in any sense that there was a corps by General McCook's looking idly on while it was engaged. The reports show that the corps next to it was quite sharply engaged itself, and sustained a loss, if I remember rightly, of as many as 1,000 men. And the corps did render assistance; that assistance may not have come in as good time as might be desirable, but it did render assistance. The question misrepresents the whole matter. It is most unfair. There is no necessity for pursuing this investigation in this way. As far as the question applies to me I do not think it affects me at all, but it is not fair to others who are not here to defend themselves; it is not fair to the country; it does not represent the matter fairly and honestly.

The JUDGE-ADVOCATE. The question is based upon some evidence that I have great confidence in and believe.

The court was cleared; when, after discussion, it was decided that the objection should not be sustained.

I knew of this fight at Perryville, and I know my own corps was there and offered no assistance. They were calm enough, because they did not know that the other corps had been engaged in a battle and was severely punished and driven back. I certainly never knew any corps standing by, with a knowledge of such facts, looking on without rendering assistance.

Question. Do you know that there was an order issued by General Buell to attack the rebels on the morning of the 9th; if so, at what hour of the day and what day was that order issued?

I believe I have filed before the Commission the only orders I did receive that I had to attack the next morning. My recollection about them is that one was an order from General Thomas, dated from General Buell's headquarters, which I think was written on the night of the 8th, that I might have my command ready to attack at daylight the next morning, and a note from Colonel Fry on the morning of the 9th asking what delayed the attack. I had received no order to attack at that time. About the time of the receipt of that note we commenced to advance, and did go into Perryville. I cannot be positive as to the time that note was received. Whether the order to advance emanated from General Buell or from General Thomas I cannot remember now. General Thomas was present when the advance began. I do not know from whom I received the order to begin to advance.

Question. Did the enemy retreat from Perryville on the evening and night of the battle?

I have so understood since.

Question. What answer did you make to Colonel Fry's telegram or message to know why you had not commenced the attack?

I cannot remember; but I have no doubt, if I answered it at all, it was because I had received no order at that time. I took the note, however, as I did all orders and notes of that kind, immediately to General Thomas, and it is possible I may have left General Thomas to answer it, he being present on the field and my commanding officer.

Question. State the movements of your division [corps] and the parts of it day by day from the morning of the battle of Perryville till the next and the retrograde movement in pursuing Bragg, and by whose orders these various movements were made.
